Even in relation to the refusal of the Sacraments and to excommunication, we believe that Parliament would be wise in refusing altogether to meddle, and in saying that these are matters which must be left to each Church to determine for itself. As a matter of fact, we believe that nothing is rarer, or likely to be rarer, than a use of such weapons as these for political purposes in such a country as Ireland. The Roman Church now hardly ever excommunicates by name, did not excommunicate by name even Victor Emanuel, and hardly ever refuses a communicant, except when great scandal would be caused by not refusing one,—as when a man or woman has long been living an openly sinful life, generally known to the congregation. Personal excommunications are weapons which the Church hardly ever dares to use, and when she does dare to use them, it is for purposes plainly and conspicuously moral and spiritual. In our day, there is no case of “undue” spiritual influence which could be determined to be so by Judges of a different faith and a different political creed, with any chance of commanding popular respect and adherence to their judgment. Therefore, we say that the attempt to bar out undue spiritual influence is a blunder, which we should have liked to see the Government deliberately eschew, and which, as it is to be made, may, we hope, be as little used as possible by the Judges. It is certain that whenever any man is found guilty of “undue” spiritual influence he will be regarded as a martyr, and will gain far more proselytes in prison than he could ever gain on the platform.

MINISTERIAL AND INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY.

LORD SALISBURY did not take much by his belligerent questioning of Lord Granville on Monday, in relation to Mr. Chamberlain's speech. It is quite new doctrine that a Minister may not individually entertain views going far beyond those to which he and his colleagues give effect. Lord Beaconsfield confessed very frankly to the assembly which entertained him at Knightsbridge, after his return from Berlin, that he individually had been in favour of making the kind of declaration which would have involved us in war with Russia, if it had not prevented her from invading Turkey in 1877. Doubtless, Lord Beaconsfield did not publish that opinion of his till after the policy of England had been determined beyond recall, and published it then only as matter of history. But this proved at least that in the opinion of the Tory Prime Minister it was matter of course that a Minister might, if he thought it for the public welfare, assent to a policy far short of that for which he would have accepted the responsibility, if he could have converted his colleagues to his own view. It is not, therefore, the mere fact that Mr. Chamberlain holds views of his own on the subject of Reform with which probably his Birmingham constituents have long since been familiar, which need embarrass him as a Minister in accepting any measure which he honestly thinks it for the advantage of the country to propose and pass. And if Mr. Chamberlain's own private opinions on this subject have long been known in Birmingham,—as we believe they have,—there can be no reason in the world why Mr. Chamberlain should make a mystery of them now, when he is speaking as a Member to his constituents, and not even affecting to commit any one of his colleagues. It does not in any way disqualify a man for supporting one measure, that he himself, if he could persuade the country to agree with him, would carry not only that measure, but something considerably larger in the same direction. The larger policy includes the smaller; and there is no sort of inconsistency in a man who would like to give the country twice as much, if he could, coming forward cordially to support the offer of half what he himself would give, as proposed by his colleagues. Mr. Chamberlain's Radicalism doubtless goes beyond the Radicalism of the present Government,—as it certainly goes beyond ours,—but even if it does, there is nothing for him to be ashamed of in holding views more Radical than any to which the Government he has joined is prepared to give effect.

What, however, appears to us in much more questionable taste than Mr. Chamberlain's avowal that he himself would be personally favourable to proposals which no one expects the Government to endorse, is the remark on which Lord Salisbury laid hardly any stress,—that if the country had to accept "a composition," instead of the full claims which Mr. Chamberlain makes on its behalf, it would nevertheless not accept that composition as "a discharge." That seems to us a much more important and much more embarrassing statement than any profession by Mr. Chamberlain of his own abstract individual opinion. Let us consider the difference. A Minister who did not conceal from the country that he himself, had he found public opinion ripe, might have advocated a larger measure than the one to which he agreed, might yet very well say that, considering the inexpediency of frequent constitutional changes, and the great importance of using such political machinery as you have in the most efficient manner rather than always pottering at the substitution of one machinery for another, he would not be a party to any speedy disturbance of an organic change of this kind once arrived at with his consent. Indeed, that is precisely what we should expect, and justly expect, from any Minister who assented to an important Reform Bill such as the country looks for probably in the next Session. If the measure proposed seemed to any Member of the Cabinet altogether inadequate to the emergency, we should expect him to resign his seat rather than give it his support. If the measure did not seem inadequate to the emergency, we should expect him to give it all the support in his power, and it certainly is not giving it all the support in his power to declare publicly that in case it falls below a certain specified point, the country will not accept it as a discharge of the political liabilities incurred. It seems to us that no measure of this kind ought to be accepted at all which is so insufficient that immediately on its passage, agitation for something larger should be renewed. Yet Mr. Chamberlain's speech means, if it means anything, that if the Reform Bill of this Government falls short of the point of giving universal suffrage, equal electoral districts, and payment of Members, he will not approve of its acceptance by the country as a discharge of the immediate liabilities of the Liberal party, but will favour the instant renewal of agitation for something more. This seems to us a very indefensible position for any Minister to take up. On the one hand, we now know that if the Reform Bill falls short,—as it certainly will fall short,—of Mr. Chamberlain's own recommendations, there is one Minister in the Cabinet who is not even prepared to accept it as a sound settlement. On the other hand, as it is nearly the youngest Member of the Cabinet who desires to see the agitation renewed the moment the last farthing which can be extracted from the present Government is gained, we have the prospect that the present Government will immediately split up into sections, one of which will be headed by the youngest and, perhaps, the most vigorous of its number. What heart can there possibly be in passing a Bill already denounced by one of the ablest of its advocates as a mere composition, which he, for one, is not going to accept as a discharge of the obligations of the Liberal party to the nation?

Consider only the position in which Mr. Chamberlain has placed not simply himself, but the Government, in relation to the Conservative party, in case a Bill is brought in falling far short,—as, of course, it must,—of the claims he makes on behalf of the party of Reform. Sir Stafford Northcote will explain to the House that the Reform Bill proposed to it is not, in the opinion even of all the Ministers themselves, a sufficient settlement. The President of the Board of Trade, he will tell the House, has beforehand encouraged the Radical party not to accept it as a fulfilment of the obligations of Liberals, and has, in fact, virtually assured all those who refuse to accept it as a fulfilment of those obligations, of his personal sympathy, if not of his leadership. Here, then, Sir Stafford Northcote will remark, is a Government one of the youngest and most vigorous of whose members has given fair notice that he regards the measure now before the House as a mere basis for new agitation, without even affording a temporary resting-place. Is that what either the Conservatives or the moderate Liberals can possibly approve? Do they want to keep large constitutional questions always open, and open in such a sense that one of the foremost reformers in a Cabinet which proposes one measure, is already committed to the utter insufficiency of that measure, and the demand for something much more drastic? How can Mr. Chamberlain as a statesman himself accept what he has promised his constituents to consider a mere dividend on the reforms which the country needs and asks for? Can the House seriously take from the Government a Bill which one of the Ministers has pledged himself to treat as a mere stepping-stone to something further? If Mr. Chamberlain the Minister gets what he proposes, Mr. Chamberlain the agitator promises to appear at once on the scene, and make the best use in his power of what Mr. Chamberlain the Minister has conceded. Is that a prospect which any House of Commons can regard with satisfaction?

It seems to us that Mr. Chamberlain, for whose abilities and character we need hardly say that we feel the sincerest respect, has in this matter committed a grave, though, no doubt, in so young a Minister, a pardonable error. He was quite within his right in declaring his unchanged private opinion, but he was ignoring dangerously his responsibility as a Minister, when he declared that whatever the Government might propose short of his own view, he did not wish the public to accept as a discharge of Liberal liabilities. That menaces us with Radical half-heartedness and Radical reserves, as likely to undermine from the outset any proposal which does not come up to the principles advocated by Mr. Chamberlain himself. It assures the public that in the case of any Bill falling short of these principles, there must be a divided Cabinet, and large unsettled questions left to hang over the heads of Parliament, even though the Bill should be passed. It is clear, indeed, that Mr. Chamberlain the Member for Birmingham weakened deliberately the hands of Mr. Chamberlain the Minister, when he encouraged his constituents not to accept as a discharge of Liberal pledges any measure which did not come up to the ideal of his own private views.

BISHOP COLENZO.

FEW men have had a stranger fate in life than Bishop Colenso. He made his reputation first as a second wrangler who wrote very excellent mathematical school-books. To this he added a reputation for moral earnestness which was thoroughly well deserved, but which took a somewhat misleading form, when it made him appear before the world as a disciple of the late Frederick Denison Maurice, with the essential genius of whose writings Dr. Colenso can never have had any deep sympathy, since his own mind was much more impressed by such matters as the blundering numeration of the Book of Exodus than the moral revelation it contained. Later on, he developed the rationalism,—or shall we say the mathematical matter-of-factness?—of his Scriptural criticism, in the book which excited so much more interest than it deserved, and which really only proved what all genuine scholars knew,—that the historical part of the Pentateuch is a human composition, by no means exempt from error, though it contains the most satisfactory evidence that a divine revelation was the source of the great migration which it chronicled, and that a primitive Theocracy was the basis of the wonderful and undying faith in the guidance of Providence which threads together the whole of Jewish history in all its various phases. More important, in our opinion, were some of Bishop Colenso's subsequent theological confessions, which showed that Bishop Gray had interpreted less inaccurately than we at the time believed, the rather shallow rationalism of some of Dr. Colenso's theological publications. Then, too, it was Dr. Colenso's strange fate to be saved from the consequences of the very prejudiced judgment of his ecclesiastical Superior, by the discovery of the old blunder committed by the Crown in granting to him and to his nominal metropolitan, bishoprics which really conveyed no ecclesiastical jurisdiction, so that he was saved from deposition by the discovery of the lawyers that he had no proper See from which to be deposed. The late Lord Romilly's proposal to try the charge of heresy against him, if it were really contended that by that heresy he had forfeited his right to the salary promised him by the Council of the Colonial Bishoprics Fund, was declined by that body, so that the invalid judgment of deposition passed by Bishop Gray was never reviewed upon its merits in any Court. Thus the Bishop of Natal, though he retained his position, won his victory by a kind of legal accident, which not only disqualified his supposed superior for sitting in judgment upon him, but made of himself also a Bishop unattached. This seemed almost a freak of fortune.

But the greatest and for Dr. Colenso the most fortunate change of phase through which he ever passed was yet to come. So soon as the settlers of Natal began to quarrel with the native chiefs, Dr. Colenso shone out in his true light,—that of a true friend and protector of the Zulu people, who, though he never concealed from them their transgressions, would never allow the might of the Western civilisation to blind his eyes to the right of the weaker race. In the contest with Langalibalele, and in the contest with Cetewayo, Bishop Colenso never flinched from the high position which he took from the first,—that of a thoroughly informed spectator, who insisted on equal justice for both sides; and would not hear of winking at the transgressions of the settlers, or permitting the grievances of the natives to go unavenged. In the latter part of his life, Dr. Colenso sank the mathematical reasoner, the rationalistic critic, and the earnest but rather shallow theologian, almost entirely in the position of the spiritual judge, who insisted on doing justice between Zulu and European, so far as his own indomitable will enabled him to do it. To the Zulus, he was, indeed, a fair representative of that ideal of divine humanity set forth by the prophet in the inspired words,—“a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest, as rivers of water in a dry place, and as the shadow of a rock in a weary land.” The practical earnestness of the man came out in the highest form when he had to plead against the wrongs done to Langalibalele and to Cetewayo; and it is no exaggeration to say that the Zulu people will regard the loss they have suffered with dismay, and will look back on Dr. Colenso with the deepest reverence. He was a man whose greatness we should never have known, if he had not passed out of the phase of mathematician and critic into the phase of the political guardian of a race beneath his own in civilisation. It was as a just man that he became great, and possibly his justice was made all the truer and purer by the injustice which no doubt he suffered,—or, at all events, believed that he suffered, and, we think, with truth,—at the hands of brother-ecclesiastics, both in Africa and in England. The calmness and dignity with which Bishop Colenso treated the procedure of Bishop Gray,—a procedure which seemed to us at the time singularly unfair,—during the trial for heresy, were striking enough then. We now know that they were significant of the still greater qualities which Bishop Colenso displayed in the latter part of his career. There was so much magnanimity in him, that to find himself the victim of injustice only made him the more scrupulously anxious never to commit or sanction injustice himself. And, doubtless, the rather barren controversies in which he passed the earlier part of his episcopate did much to train him for the great position of mediator between the Zulu and the Teutonic races, which he held with so much dignity and so much benefit both to his own countrymen and to the Zulus, at the end of his laborious and beneficent career.

THE PARNELLITES AND THE IRISH VICEROYALTY.

WE should, under certain circumstances, have a good deal of sympathy with the Parnellite proposal of Wednesday to abolish the Viceroyalty of Ireland. Mr. Justin M'Carthy's Bill is a great deal more logical and more far-reaching than it looks, and if Ireland were as loyal as Scotland, or even sullenly aware that the Union must continue, the idea underlying his measure might be a practicable or even a beneficial one. His Bill is not, as is imagined, one for abolishing the Viceroyalty only, but for transferring all Executive power in Ireland from Englishmen to Irishmen. Mr. M'Carthy's proposal is that the statutory powers of the Viceroy of Ireland should be transferred to a responsible Parliamentary Minister for Ireland, who should be invariably selected from among the Irish Members returned to the House of Commons. There would, in fact, be an Irish Secretary of State in Parliament, who would combine in himself the statutory powers of the Viceroy and of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Moreover, the same great officer would exercise also the “regal” power, such as patronage, appertaining to the Viceroy. Although Mr. Trevelyan shrewdly asked where that power was to go, he knew quite well that in the absence of the Viceroyalty it would revert to the Crown, to be exercised on the advice of a responsible Minister, who could only be the Minister for Ireland. Being responsible, his advice must be taken, just as in Indian matters the Secretary for India's advice is taken. The total result, therefore, of Mr. M'Carthy's scheme would be that the Head of the Irish Executive would be an Irish Member sitting in the Commons; and Mr. M'Carthy calculates that he would want to keep his seat, and to be popular with the majority of Irish Members, who, he thinks, will at the next election be mostly Parnellites. The distinctively Irish party would, therefore, in his belief, control the Irish Minister, distribute his patronage, and direct executive affairs, very much in their own way. We should say, judging by the example of Scotland when the Lord-Advocate happens to be strong, that, given Mr. M'Carthy's data, this calculation would prove correct, and that the Bill, like most Bills favoured by Mr. Parnell, was for his purposes exceedingly adroit. The Member for Cork has seen, what so many Irishmen fail to see, that Irish Members could influence a Minister sitting among them, and probably dependent for his seat upon their favour, much more directly and more strongly than they can influence “the Castle.” Nor, if Ireland were as loyal and as well represented as Scotland, should we at all object to that solution of the problem. We have long been convinced that only Irishmen can govern Irishmen well, for only Irishmen understand them, and know when their action is a result of thought and when a display of perversity; and that the governing Irishmen should be Members of the House of Commons, sitting in Westminster, and taking counsel together and arranging their own affairs, subject to the general vote of the United Kingdom, is what we all desire. If only that were possible, and compatible with unity, there would be an end of trouble.

But then the conditions are not present. In the present temper of the majority in Ireland, and with the projects avowed by the most popular Irish Members, Mr. M'Carthy's plan would, from his point of view, and possibly from an accurate point of view, hand over Ireland to a party which avows itself disloyal to the core. We are not among those who deny the right of insurrection for adequate cause and with a good object, and we do not wish in this article to use any opprobrious terms, but as a plain matter of fact, acknowledged by themselves, the Irish Extremists are hostile to the Union and to the general government of the kingdom. At present, they are in a minority; but they hope to be in a majority, and if their hopes are realised—a point upon which no man can be certain, though Mr. Healy's contest for Monaghan may throw on it some light—the habitual control of the Irish Minister, and, therefore, of Irish patronage, pardons, rewards, and all statutory powers, would fall to the enemies of the Union. The Minister might be the best of men, and loyal to the core; but he would want the Irish votes, and would be sure that if he lost them, he would lose his seat too. He would be under continual pressure of the strongest kind, a pressure which would never sleep, and which would gradually fill all Irish offices with anti-Union men, hidden or avowed. The very Judges would be National, and the Stipendiaries friends of the National League. That would never do, even if we could be sure that these men would stop short of rebellion, for it is the melancholy peculiarity of Ireland that her "patriots" dislike and disregard the execution of the Law. The laws would never be carried out, and we should have anarchy protected and justified by half the official world. We have to keep order in Ireland, as well as to keep Ireland within the Union, and order can only be confided to those who are heartily its friends.

Mr. McCarthy's Bill, therefore, belongs to that world, wherever it is, where so many Irish measures must be kept, the world in which ideas are executive even when opposed to facts, and we must fall back on the humbler proposition to improve the Viceroyalty by confiding it ultimately to Irishmen. Nothing which has occurred within the past four years has altered our opinion of the justice and necessity of that change, which we advocate in the face of our full consciousness that the country will never be better served than by Earl Spencer. It is impossible to exaggerate the claim which he has established on the whole kingdom by his firm administration, by his judgment, and above all, by his self-devotion. He has abandoned the most attractive position in the world, that of a wealthy English Peer, to assume an office which never yields personal fame, which is often as repugnant as that of a gaoler, and which demands as its first condition entire indifference to a pressing risk of assassination. The Lord-Lieutenant, in the eyes of a class in Ireland, is a wolf, to be killed whenever killing is safe. He is excepted from the operation of the Sixth Commandment, and is in more danger every day than if he were charging a battery. As Mr. Trevelyan said, "his life, from the moment of his landing, in the disposition of a class is not worth one moment's purchase." That Lord Spencer, under such circumstances, rules calmly, without hatred as without fear, is sufficient evidence of his qualities; but, nevertheless, we should prefer an Irishman. Even Lord Spencer lacks the insight into Irishmen which comes to Irishmen by instinct, takes every movement too seriously, and does not allow sufficiently for the gamin element in the national character. He accepts threats too much au grand sérieux, and leaves on Irishmen the impression that he is English, which is equivalent in their apprehension to one who does not understand. An Irishman who governed them worse would yet be better liked. We do not believe even yet that no trustworthy Irishman competent to fill the post could be found, and rather than not find him would modify some of the conditions of the post itself. There is no reason why the Head of the Executive in Ireland should be either a Peer or a rich man, or surrounded with a Brummagem kind of Court. The most powerful man in Ireland is at most a poor country gentleman, for whom a subscription is being raised. Let the Viceroy be simply a great official, like a Lord Chief Justice or Commander of the Forces, and if he is a strong man, governing well, he will have reverence enough. That change of itself would immensely widen the area of selection, now narrowed till the first difficulty of a Premier, when a vacancy occurs, is not to select among applicants, but to induce any sufficient man to apply. The Times talks of the irrational hatred felt for "the Castle," and no doubt much of it is mere hatred of civilised control, but what would its language be if Britain were confided to the ten cleverest Catholic Irishmen in the House? Their action apart, would the Times consider a good deal of popular distrust, and therefore of popular hatred, so entirely unreasonable? The Irish say—not the Parnellites alone—"You English profess to understand us, yet you cannot find, among all our millions, five or six men whom you think competent, even under your own direction, to govern us. Either, therefore, you misjudge us to a degree showing inherent incompetence, or you know in your secret hearts that every able Irishman is your enemy." The Vice-royalty must be retained; but, nevertheless, there is, as matters are now arranged, an element of truth in that objection.

THE PROGRESS OF THE CORRUPT PRACTICES BILL.

NEITHER the magnitude nor the number of the questions raised by the Corrupt Practices Bill grows less, as the House of Commons becomes better acquainted with its provisions. But, though Members are not the least blind to what they are doing, they are, on the whole, anxious that it should be done. The truth, probably, is that corruption has become a burden to those who employ it, and that they are quite willing that some check should be put upon it, provided that it leaves them possessed of the same relative advantages that they had before. There is not much doubt, we fear, that in this respect their wishes will be fulfilled. No matter how stringent and effectual the law may be made, there will still be constituencies in which the mere possession of money will be an advantage to a candidate. It has been too long the one quality which the electors reverence, for them to think lightly of the man who has it, even though his opportunities of employing it are reduced almost to nothing by a tyrannical statute.

The second clause, which in an amended form was passed on Tuesday, makes "treating" a corrupt practice; and, by the first clause, the guilt of treating attaches not merely, as under the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, to the candidate, but to every person who provides, or pays the expense of providing, any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision, for the purpose of corruptly influencing votes, and to every person, whether an elector or not, who accepts or takes any such meat, drink, entertainment, or provision. As Mr. Raikes pointed out, it will be necessary, now that this wider definition has been adopted, to look very carefully at the penalties enacted by the subsequent clauses. If the interpretation affixed to treating by the Judges is as comprehensive as the words which define it appear to the lay mind, eating and drinking at the expense of another person must no longer make a part of human life. The whole country is mapped out into Parliamentary constituencies; every man, woman, or child is either an elector or a non-elect; and our whole earthly existence is covered by the words "before, during, or after an election." No doubt, the "meal, drink, entertainment, or provision" must be given for the purpose of "corruptly" influencing votes. But it will often be difficult for the sinners themselves to say whether corruption was or was not their object. The motives with which one man gives a glass of ale to another, or bids another "get something to eat" at his expense, may be very mixed. We are not arguing against the clause. Treating has played too large a part in the degradation of English constituencies to make it expedient or even possible to show any tenderness. But the measure of severity is a different matter, and we fear that if treating in its milder forms is visited with unduly heavy penalties, either very few persons will be convicted of treating, or an irresistible demand will grow up for making the law less stringent.

On Tuesday an amendment of Mr. Lewis's to the third clause was debated at some length, and in the end the Attorney-General consented to modify the clause in Mr. Lewis's sense, though not to the same extent. As it stood, it provided that where, on the trial of an election petition, "any corrupt practice has been proved to have been committed by, or with the knowledge and consent of," a candidate, he shall for ever be incapable of sitting for that constituency, and for ten years be incapable of sitting in the House of Commons. Mr. Lewis proposed to leave out the words "any corrupt practice," and to insert the word "bribery," his argument being that between bribery and undue influence there was a great and conspicuous distinction, and that it was absurd not to recognise this distinction in meting out punishment. This brought up the question of treating once more. Mr. Rathbone contended, very truly, that treating might be, and often was, as demoralising as any more direct form of bribery. Sir Richard Cross admitted the demoralising influence, but dwelt on the difficulty of saying where innocent treating ended, and demoralising treating began. The Attorney-General consented to make a difference between "treating and undue influence," and other corrupt practices, and in the former case to hold the candidate responsible only for acts done by himself, and not for those done "with his knowledge and consent." It is not very clear why the Attorney-General made this concession, since if a candidate knows and consents to the employment of treating or other undue influence, he is morally quite as much to blame as if he had himself resorted to it. We should have thought it better to make the punishment for the lesser forms of corruption lighter than those for bribery. However, the change met with the approval of the House, Mr. Lewis's amendment was thrown out, and the Attorney-General's adopted.

The next question that came up was the amount of the penalty. The Attorney-General had already declared his preference for seven instead of ten years, as the extent of a convicted candidate's incapacity of sitting for any constituency; but Mr. Raikes proposed to reduce the incapacity of sitting for the particular constituency in which the offence has been committed from life to ten years. The Attorney-General argued that nothing short of perpetual disqualification would guard against the danger that illegal practices might render a candidate popular in a constituency, and so conduce to his benefit years after he had been guilty of them. The old difficulty then presented itself. There is influence and influence, and what is only proper punishment for one kind of influence is excessive punishment for another kind. Mr. Clarke quoted the case of a Member who gave a holiday to his workmen on the following day, and was unseated for doing so; and Mr. Rylands asked whether it was fair to declare a candidate for ever incapable of representing a locality with which he was connected, through a mere act of kindness or inadvertence such as this? The Attorney-General's answer was that Parliament must mark with a heavy penalty the offence of intentionally corrupting a constituency, and this being so, he could not enter into any question of lessening the life disqualification. But this reply does not really dispose of the difficulty. May not there be acts which it is necessary to punish, lest worse things be done under cover of them, and yet not necessary to punish severely, in view of the almost infinitesimal blame that may attach to them? It seems to us that in this, as in other parts of the Bill, what is wanted is greater elasticity. The definition of an offence is necessarily rigid. The enumeration of the acts which come under a definition is necessarily precise; but the degrees of guilt in the persons committing these acts are very various, where other offences are concerned. A corresponding variety in the sentences is ordinarily secured by leaving much to the discretion of the Judge. Sometimes, perhaps, the limits assigned to this discretion may be too comprehensive; but, on the whole, it is found well that the Judges should be invested with it. Manslaughter may be only just distinguishable from murder, or it may be quite adequately punished by a day's imprisonment. What but a Judge's discretion can possibly meet with a range of criminality so extensive as this? It is very much the same with undue influence. Between acts which on paper seem hardly distinguishable there may, to the practised eye of a Judge, be an immense gulf. The fault of this Bill is that it gives the Judge no means of adapting the penalty to the degree of guilt; and the change we should suggest would be that the disqualification created by clause 3, and by many subsequent clauses, should be for life, or for so many years, or for such lesser term not less than so many years, as the Judge in his discretion shall think fit. If we entrust to the Judges the very delicate task of determining whether a candidate has or has not committed such and such offences, why should we withhold from them the not more delicate and equally necessary task of estimating the degree of guilt he has incurred by committing them?

THE CHARITABLE TRUSTS BILL.

THERE is, we fear, no chance that Mr. Shaw Lefevre's Bill will become law this year. Looking at the opposition it has excited, it seems hardly probable that it will reach the Select Committee to which the Government proposes to refer it after the second reading. Yet the case for the Bill is unanswerable, and the need for it urgent. Unfortunately, the public at large knows nothing about the matter, while many of the people who do know, like to keep things as they are. The Charity Commissioners are an unpopular body,—to a great extent, we believe, from their own fault. They are too official, and do not co-operate cordially with those who are anxious to check and expose abuses. On the other hand, they are disposed to take a doctrinaire view of the pecuniary interest of Charities, and sometimes with the object merely of increasing funds, use their powers in relation to charitable property in a way very injurious to third parties, and even to the objects of the charity. Thus, it is not long since the Commissioners had to be forcibly restrained from converting fuel allotments set out under old Inclosure Acts into private property, without regard to the value of the land to the labouring population for recreation and for allotment gardens. Again, in some cases they have acted with great harshness towards persons holding property of a charity by some old-fashioned tenure—such as renewable leases—well understood in the neighbourhood, but lacking the full protection of the law. They have, consequently, very few friends, whilst every trustee and every officer of a charity with whom they interfere is their enemy. Add to this unpopularity of the Commissioners the fact that hatred of waste is not a national virtue, and that there is a half-acknowledged liking with many people for the haphazard species of charity which it is the main object of legislation to uproot, and we have, perhaps, a sufficient explanation of the difficulties encountered in proceeding with the pending Bill, though in discussion few would be found to oppose its principle.

The subject is certainly sufficiently large to be interesting. The annual income of the Endowed Charities of the United Kingdom amounts to no less a sum than £2,200,000. In this total is not included the property of the Universities and Colleges, of Eton and Harrow, of Cathedral Foundations, of Friendly Societies, or of Societies supported by Voluntary Contributions; nor are the huge possessions of the City Companies taken into account. About half the income we have quoted belongs to Educational foundations, to Medical charities, and Nonconformist and Church endowments. The other half, upwards of £1,000,000, is devoted to "charity" in the popular and least exact sense of the word,—to the relief of the poor by means of doles of money, food, or clothes, by means of almshouses, and of apprenticeship premiums. It is with the gigantic property thus employed that the Charity Commissioners are in the main concerned. At present, much of it is frittered away, generally doing no appreciable good, and sometimes working positive harm. On the other hand, no one will deny that there is much to be done for the benefit of the poor, and of the community at large, for which money is sorely needed. What a long way, for example, will £5,000 go towards preserving an open space, how incalculable is the benefit resulting, and how very difficult it is to get the money! The rescue and dedication to the public of Epping Forest cost only about £280,000, but little more than a quarter of the annual income of the Endowed Charities. It is a pity that such a work should be accomplished (as it was) by means of a tax upon bread, however small, if it could be achieved by the expenditure of charitable funds. The supply of free libraries and baths, improved dwellings for the artisan class, and other boons at present insufficiently and grudgingly provided at the expense of the rates, would be an employment of charitable funds which would confer great and widely appreciable blessings. While, at the same time, such things are wanted, and large benefactions exist in an almost useless state, there is ample ground for public interest in the subject, nay, for a public demand for reform.

It will be said, however, that the difficulties in the way of anything like a broad adaptation of charitable foundations to the needs of modern society are very great, and that what is really practicable is already within the power of the Charity Commissioners. This is a mistake. The powers of the Charity Commission in any effective shape apply only to small Charities. The legislation which called the Commissioners into existence, the Charitable Trusts Act of 1853, had for one main object the prevention of litigation, by which the property of Charities was squandered. In this object it succeeded. Lawsuits concerning the administration of charitable property have since 1853 been impossible without the consent of the Commissioners, who have kept a tight hand upon them. But although Chancery suits were an expensive remedy, and the cure effected by them was sometimes worse than the disease, yet they were remedial in their nature, and the legislation which practically put an end to them should have provided an efficient substitute. This it failed to do. No power of modifying charitable trusts, in such a way as to make them minister to the wants of the present day, was reposed in the Commissioners. All they were empowered to do was either to certify to the Attorney-General cases in which application should be made to the Court of Chancery, or to lay before Parliament proposals for the better administration of the charity. By Mr. Lowe's Act of 1860, a more substantial power was given with regard to small Charities. When the income of a charity does not exceed £50 a year, the Commissioners can frame a new scheme for its management. But when the income is over this amount, they must obtain the consent of a majority of the Trustees of the Charity before exercising a like power. It may well be imagined that the worse a Charity is managed, the less likely are the Trustees to consent to a new scheme. Practically, therefore, at present the Commissioners can do nothing useful with any considerable Charity, except invoke the aid either of the Attorney-General and the Law Courts, or of Parliament. From the former course they shrink, on account of the expense to the Charity. The latter is nugatory, since the Commissioners are not directly represented in Parliament, and no facilities are given for the confirmation of their schemes by an Act. Large Charities may, therefore, defy the Commissioners with impunity, and it is not surprising that Mr. Lefevre was able to cite to the deputation which recently waited upon him curious instances of waste and mal-administration. Thus, there is a Charity in Berkshire with an income of £220, to be expended under its trust in providing bread to be put into a basket every Sunday, to be set on the gravestone of the founder, in the church, during divine service, and after the service to be distributed to the most indigent and helpless poor of the parish. One hundred and fifty-four persons receive two pounds of bread apiece every Sunday. There is an influx of the thriftless into the parish, and probably it would be found that cottage-rents are proportionately higher than in adjoining villages. In another case, in the Midland Counties, Mr. Lefevre tells us, out of an income of £1,300 applicable to almshouses, £575 is spent in the remuneration of a Governor and a Deputy-Governor to rule over twelve almspeople, and this while the Charity is in financial difficulties, owing to the agricultural depression. The climax of absurdity in management is perhaps reached in the case of a third Charity, in Middlesex, possessing an income of £80, expended in doles. This very moderate income is distributed by a firm of solicitors in London, who act on behalf of another firm in Bristol, to whom they remit the income as it comes to hand, receiving it again minus the costs of the two firms. There are trustees, —indeed, three new ones were recently appointed. Two of these, however, are solicitors in Bristol, and the third, although at the time of his appointment Vicar of the parish, has now removed into Hertfordshire. The inhabitants of the parish have strongly protested against the mode of distribution, but the Commissioners are powerless to act without the assent of the trustees, who are well satisfied with things as they are.

Mr. Lefevre's Bill proposes to meet such cases as these by enabling the Commissioners to frame new schemes for the application and management of charitable funds, without the consent of the trustees, in the case of Charities with a gross income of more than £50, as freely as they have hitherto done in the case of smaller Charities. No new principle is involved in this change. It is simply a question of machinery. The Law Courts have now the power to reform Charities. But the action of the Courts is cumbrous and costly. The Government proposes to substitute a less expensive and more suitable agency. It is difficult to see how objection to such a course can be justified. But it is not difficult to understand why it exists. A principle which cannot be applied owing to defects in mechanism, is a thing of which no one is afraid. To give it practical effect is a very different matter. Those who wish, from whatever motive, to maintain unsystematic and casual charity, are undoubtedly well-advised in opposing the substitution of an accessible and cheap, for a slow and expensive, agency. But it is desirable that the public should realise that it has a strong interest in the matter. An income of £1,000,000 devoted to the benefit of those who need help should be applied economically and reasonably. It is impossible to conceive that an over-worked legal tribunal is the proper machinery for the purpose. Parliament has decided to the contrary, by creating a special administrative Department for the work. If there are defects in its constitution or working, they should be remedied. An inquiry before a Select Committee, such as the Government desires, would give an opportunity for protesting against the action of the Commissioners when it has been oppressive or unwise, and would probably prevent such action in future. But it is halting between two opinions to create and maintain such a body, and yet so to limit its sphere of action as to render it almost useless.

THE MASSACRE OF THE INNOCENTS.

ONE fact comes out very painfully in the history of this ghastly tragedy at Sunderland. The public under-rates rather than over-rates the danger from a crowd, and especially a crowd descending. So far from the consequences of a "rush" being exaggerated in the popular imagination, they are not sufficiently appreciated, the truth being that whenever a crowd debouches from the gallery of a theatre, or of a music-hall, or of a church, there arises a momentary possibility of a great catastrophe. No special cause for a "rush" is necessary. If anything, no matter what, arrests the flow of human beings, and yet it does not stop, lives may be instantly in danger. There never was, so to speak, a more unreasonable calamity than this slaughter of children. The accounts vary, as usual, but all agree that in the enormous gallery of the Victoria Hall, with its 1,500 children, there was no alarm of fire, no panic, no cause for a stampede, and in truth no stampede at all. The children were either called to receive some presents of toys, from a man who, feeling their pressure, descended rapidly to the floor, or they ran down of their own accord to share the gifts, but in either case the running was of the normal kind. The children moved quickly, but not more quickly than is common. It is proved that many of them passed quite safely into the body of the house. Nevertheless, the moment the bolt of the half of the swing door was dropped, whether on purpose or accidentally, and the crowd became too large for the narrowed space, a block was created, the children as they descended fell upon one another, and were welded instantaneously into a mass of flesh so solid that breathing became impossible. So tremendous was the wedging-power of the descending crowd that the children were crushed together as by a machine, bones and lungs gave way together, and the first rescuers were positively afraid to act rapidly, "lest," says one of them, "they should pull the bodies to pieces." It seems almost incredible that tripping children, few over twelve years of age, and a majority about eight, descending by a staircase seven feet broad, should have exerted such pressure, or have been so unable to stop themselves; but it is not difficult to comprehend it, if we think of the children not as individuals, but as a mass. We shall then find, as is said on the spot, that as long as the column of childhood descended, a steady pressure was exerted on the block of humanity formed by the first falls equal to that of a three-ton weight advancing at three miles an hour, a pressure which nothing made of human material could oppose, which was as irresistible as that of a hydraulic machine, and instantly packed human beings like sardines. Breathing was impossible under such conditions, and the poor little children died of asphyxia—in most cases, let us trust, painlessly—in all with such bewildering rapidity, that the tragedy was over before those in the body of the house, only a few feet off, were aware that anything dreadful had occurred. Within six minutes at the outside, layer upon layer of children had been flung, packed, and killed, till the official total, which may be under the truth, exceeds one hundred and eighty. Let it be remembered that while the poor little things' weakness was against them, and their softness, before the crushing impact from above, their lightness was in their favour, and we may understand the risk incurred on hundreds of staircases every week, or, indeed, in the case of theatres, every day. A crowd in movement, however light or however slow, is in its effect a column of water, incompressible till it stops, before which everything, even the human frame, must perforce give way. The pressure would, if there were no opening, have driven the bodies through the very doors, and as it was did raise the pile six, seven, or eight feet into the air. The weight of such a column is a simple matter of calculation, and for every hundred adults descending the gallery stairs of a great church, there is a pressure of two and a half tons, flowing, rather than moving, at a walking pace, —enough to crush men like flies.

We do not know that special blame for the tragedy attaches to any one in Sunderland, unless it be to the giver of the conjuring entertainment. The hall itself is unusually well built, with a broad staircase, numerous landing-places to check any rush, and wide doors swinging both ways. There is, it is said, a sharp curve on the staircase towards the bottom, which prevented the children seeing the danger before them, but this would rather check than accelerate the descent. If a caretaker did bolt half the door, which is denied, he did it from stupidity, under the fancy, so constantly entertained, that the sight of a narrow space will make a crowd more careful and go slower. The parents, who are blamed for want of care, had no reason to suppose the numbers collected would be so great, and are accustomed every day to see their children go in flocks to schools where half of them run down-stairs twice a day. They are unaccustomed to the idea of escort, they saw no more danger in the Hall than in a school, and probably they never gave the matter a thought. Mr. Fay ought, indeed, with his experience of a lifetime, to have recollected the mobile nature of a crowd, and to have provided more caretakers to govern and direct his troops of infants; and we suspect, from one bit of his letters, that he was not quite easy in his mind. He tried to decrease the descent by putting the children in the immense dress-circle, only half-way up the Hall; but the custodians of the Hall would not allow this, unless he raised his prices of admission. Whether they acted from a fear that the seats would be injured, or from some fancy as to etiquette, their action had much to do with the catastrophe. Mr. Fay, however, though he did not provide enough men to guard against what he must have known to be a possibility, presses with considerable force, as reasons for his confidence, the unusual size of the Hall, and the experience of eight entertainments of the same kind, during which no accident had occurred. He, in fact, expected nothing but the ordinary rush, and he looked after everything himself, and can hardly be treated as guilty for not doing what no manager of a theatre does,—that is, assume that the balance of probability is on the side of accident, and provide accordingly. The moment the calamity was known, every one seems to have behaved admirably, and the tone of the town since has been the true one, that of sad but helpful resignation to an inexplicable Will.

For it is an inexplicable Will, especially to those who believe, as we do, that God governs, as well as reigns. What should we say of a man who, merely by putting a thought into Mr. Fay's head, the thought to stand at the gallery-door and see the children out in batches, could have prevented that ghastly massacre, and did not put it? Yet that must be true of the Almighty, if any one of our ideas about his attributes is true, if he foresees, if he is all-powerful, if he has free-will. Apart from the suffering—suffering often to the good, for it was probably the kindest parents who sent their children to the show—why does he allow all that monstrous waste of life among the innocent, that destruction of potential usefulness? The only answer is the simple and unsatisfying one that we know nothing about the matter, and never shall know all, though we may know much more than we do now. Man cannot know the policy of God, which is not shown as changed, but as always the same, in these great catastrophes. They do but concentrate a process which never stops. Taking Asia and Europe together, the half of all children born die before they are two. It is certain that more children died in London in the week of the catastrophe unnoticed, than died in Sunderland to the horror and pity of the world. It is quite probable, though there are no statistics, that more children died in the United Kingdom still-born on Saturday than died in that staircase shambles. Vast, unending, inexplicable waste of life, never utilised even for a little while, is the law of the planet, the will of its Creator, as little to be made intelligible by thought as the endless mystery of non-educative pain. Theology gives us no more light on the subject than Science does, and though it is best, or at least most comforting, to think that the children are the happier for escaping this life and its miseries, there is no proof of that,—rather evidence from analogy that they lose an opportunity which would have been to their profit. Why not, if the world, and life in the world, are, as we all suppose, of any use at all? Men are not the better for escaping, but for fulfilling, duties. There is no explanation whatever to be found, nor is there any need of one. If man acknowledges God at all, he must acknowledge a Being whose wisdom must be so far above his own that failure to perceive it is failure in the creature, not in the Creator. It may not be an absurdity, though it seems one to us, to recognise God, and yet think that he can err, but it is certainly a folly to think that we can detect error in him. The theologian, like every other man, is studying the Infinite, and when he has thought himself out, he can only acknowledge that he is always at last face to face with a mystery past his solution. Thought sometimes only helps us to pile up more figures on the recurrent decimal.

THE THOUGHT-READING WAGER.

"NONSENSE dies hard," says Mr. Labouchere, and he is perfectly right; but no nonsense dies harder than the nonsense of infatuated prejudice. Amongst literary men, those who know Mr. Henry Sidgwick and Mr. Labouchere,—the two who wrote to the Times on the Thought-reading wager,—very few, we suspect, would prefer Mr. Labouchere's judgment on a matter of evidence of this kind to Mr. Sidgwick's. Mr. Sidgwick has as cool and sceptical a temperament as Mr. Labouchere himself, but he has in addition a very much larger knowledge of the subject under investigation, and knows how absolutely childish it is to speak of such a power as some persons impute to Mr. Bishop as a miraculous and all but incredible thing. We say this without having formed any definite opinion ourselves on the subject of Mr. Bishop's powers, and, indeed, with a strong prejudice against a man who mixes up common conjurors' tricks with the professed attempt to illustrate obscure psychological powers of this nature. If he is, as we have been told that he is, a gentleman who never gained a penny by the use of such power as he possesses,—one intellectually interested in the question of Thought-reading, but not in the least professionally interested in that question,—then we should certainly suppose that in the accounts of the case, as the various correspondents of the Times state it, there is no pretence at all to impute fraud; but, then, in that case, why on earth does he try the patience of his audience by illustrating common sleight-of-hand? Of course, if we have been misinformed, if Mr. Bishop is gaining anything by the public experiments in which he plays a principal part, the matter must be put on a totally different footing. It is always reasonable to be incredulous about the claim laid to extraordinary powers by those who gain a good deal by being supposed to possess those powers; and we should regard Mr. Labouchere's non-appearance at St. James's Hall on Tuesday week as perfectly excusable, if he really regarded Mr. Bishop's refusal to be limited to any particular subject—Mr. Firth, M.P.—as the refusal of a professional gentleman who wanted to evade a test to which he felt himself unequal. But if, as many declare, Mr. Bishop has nothing to lose by failure, and nothing to gain by success, except the pleasure of establishing the existence of a certain rare class of psychological facts which are declared to be impossible by the dense sagacity of men of the world, we think that Mr. Labouchere ought to have gone to St. James's Hall, and judged for himself whether or not he could not agree with Mr. Bishop's Committee on some one "subject" satisfactory both to himself and to Mr. Bishop. His evasion of that test ought, we think, in that case to count for more on the one side, than Mr. Bishop's refusal to have his power judged absolutely by his success or failure in any one case, should count for on the other side.

However, the real interest of the wager is less in the test itself,—for comparatively few people can know how far Colonel Statham is above all imputation of collusion, on the one hand, and how far, even if he be above all imputation of collusion, the conditions were so rigid that Mr. Bishop had no other means than "thought-reading" of discovering the number of the note, on the other,—than in the extreme difficulty of proving an extraordinary fact to the satisfaction of the general public which it seems to demonstrate. We can imagine, indeed, a test which might perhaps be sufficient. Suppose twelve of the gentlemen whom Mr. Labouchere named in his first letter,—the letter printed in the Times of Friday week,—viz., Sir John Lubbock, Sir Lyon Playfair, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Mr. Dillwyn, Mr. W. Fowler, Mr. Jacob Bright, Mr. Brodric, Lord Edward Cavendish, Mr. Albert Grey, Sir Henry Holland, Mr. Cohen, and Mr. A. J. Balfour, were all to experiment with Mr. Bishop, each of them writing down for himself a number of not less than five figures, and keeping his mind upon the figures thus written down, while Mr. Bishop attempts to read his thought on the subject, then we should say that if the experiment succeeded fully, say in two cases out of the twelve, even though it should fail more or less in the other ten, the existence of a power not to be accounted for by guessing, would be demonstrated beyond question. But then it would be almost impossible to get these conditions fulfilled. Some of these gentlemen might probably decline to mix themselves up in a matter to which they would think ridicule likely to attach, and even if they served, and if the test succeeded in two or three cases out of the twelve, we are disposed to think that its failure in several cases, and still more in a majority of cases, would be excuse enough, with most of the public, for attaching no importance at all to the results of the experiment. The truth is that there is nothing so impossible as to persuade ordinary men of the world that what they call "common-sense" is no sufficient guide to the obscurer phenomena of human nature.

We have said that we have ourselves formed no opinion at all as to the nature of Mr. Bishop's feats, not having had the means of doing so, and that we feel a strong prejudice against the conglomerate of conjuring tricks and professed thought-reading which Mr. Bishop exhibited to his audience at St. James's Hall. But this we will say, that to all who have studied the subject, evidence literally abounds of the existence in rare cases of powers of thought-reading much more remarkable than any alleged in the case of Mr. Bishop. Now, as we do not like to make this sort of statement without any kind of verification, we will take a modern instance, from the writings of a Bristol medical man, Dr. Davey, who published a paper in the Journal of Psychological Medicine, for April, 1831 (Part 1 of Volume VII. of the Journal), which records the case of a patient of his, investigated by him in concert with two other Bristol medical men—Dr. Andrews and Dr. Elliot. Dr. Davey records the results of his investigation in this rather obscure medical journal of which no one has ever heard half as much as the world has heard lately of Mr. Bishop. Here is his description of Mrs. Croad's state:—

"In 1870, it is stated, 'she became totally blind,' in the following year deaf, and in 1874 speechless. The paralysis, which was limited to the lower extremities, involved, in 1879, the upper limbs; but at this time the loss of sensation and motion is limited to the left arm, the fingers and thumb of the left hand being but partially affected. The right hand and arm have recovered their once-lost functions. She is now able to articulate, though with difficulty, from, as it appears to me, a tetanic rigidity of the temporal and masseter muscles, by which the mouth is kept, to a large extent, fixed and closed. It was in October last [i.e., October, 1880] that I was asked to see Mrs. Croad. I found her sitting in a semi-recumbent position on a small bedstead, her head and shoulders resting on pillows. The eyelids were fast closed, and the left arm and hand resting by the side. The knees I found then, as they are still, bent at an acute angle, the heels closely pressed to the under and upper parts of the thighs. . . . Since October, and through the months of November and December, 1880, I have subjected Mrs. Croad to many and various tests with the view of satisfying myself as to the truth or otherwise of the statements given to the world of her blindness, sense of touch, and marvellous sympathies. To my near neighbours—Drs. Andrews and Elliot—I am much indebted. The various tests referred to were witnessed by them in my presence, and with the effect of assuring us that she (Mrs. Croad) was and is enabled to perceive, through the aid only of touch, the various objects, both large and small, on any given card or photograph. After an experience extending over some nine or ten weeks, during which the 'tests' were many times repeated, and, now and then, in the presence of several medical and non-medical (ladies and gentlemen) friends, there remained (I believe) not the least doubt of this 'transference of sense' from the eyes of Mrs. Croad to her fingers and the palm of her right hand. It need not be supposed that I and others were content to believe in Mrs. Croad's blindness, and to take no specific precautions against any possible trick or deception—far from this. On solicitation, she very kindly assented to be blindfolded, after a very decided fashion; and so blindfolded, that neither deception on her part nor prejudice nor false judgment on ours were—either the one or the other—possible. The blindfolding was accomplished thus: a pad of cotton wool being placed on each orbit; the face was then covered by a large and thickly-folded neckerchief; this was tied securely at the back part of the head, and—even more than this—more cotton wool was pushed up towards the eyes, on either side of the nose. Not content, however, the aid of two fingers of a bystander were called into requisition, and with these a continued pressure was kept up, during the 'testing' outside and over the neckerchief and wool and above the closed eyes. At this stage of the proceedings the room was, on two different occasions, very thoroughly darkened. Under such circumstances it was the testing commenced, and continued to the end; the result being, as theretofore, in the highest degree, conclusive and satisfactory. The transference of sense from one organ to another as an acquired and spontaneous condition of being must, on the evidence here adduced, be accepted as a demonstrated and certain fact. I would state here, that on receiving a picture card or a photo' from a bystander she (Mrs. Croad) places it on and about the chin or mouth, and perhaps draws it across the forehead, but the minute examination of the card is, apparently, the work of the fingers of the right hand. These several acts are, for the most part, followed by a quiet and intense thought, a well-marked concentration of mind on the picture or whatever it may be, when, after a short time, she writes on a slate kept near her, a description—sometimes a full and detailed one—of the card, its colouring, and the several objects thereon. I have seen some forty or fifty picture-cards and photographs described by Mrs. Croad at different times with various degrees of accuracy, during the whole period I have known her. Occasionally her rapid and precise perception, or, if you prefer the word, conception, of the picture, and of the many yet minute and trifling objects going to form its entirety, is really startling. I have but seldom seen her wholly at fault, though she has met with her failures."

Now, this seems to us a much more marvellous power than that of thought-reading; but this is not all. Mrs. Croad appears to have had the very power which Mr. Bishop attributes to himself, in a very much higher degree:—

"Sitting quietly by or near to Mrs. Croad, my attention has been again and again rivetted on the manner in which Miss Croad holds communion with her mother. Miss Croad does very certainly move her fingers over and about the face of her mother, but few, if any, letters or words are formed by her. Watching her very narrowly on several occasions, I felt at length assured that Miss Croad's communications were altogether unlike those made by either visitors or friends. The latter named formed letters, and with these words, and so conversed—if the expression be allowed—with Mrs. Croad; but it is not so with her daughter. Impressed with the fact as above stated, I spoke to Miss Croad of it, when she told me that as the rule it was requisite simply that she put herself in a close or personal contact with her mother to convey to her what was wished, or to give her a knowledge of this or that, as the case may be. Now so marked a mental sympathy or concordance as this is altogether without or outside the experience of most of us; and it is therefore well worthy the attention of those present who have the courage to investigate, what I may well call, unorthodox medicine. . . . As a further illustration of Mrs. Croad's peculiar and clairvoyant gifts, it should be stated that at my second interview with Mrs. Croad, and in the presence of Dr. Andrews and others, certain of my own personal and private convictions on a particular subject became, as it would seem, in a strange and exceptional manner, known to Mrs. Croad. She asked me if I would allow her to tell me a secret in my own life history, and would I be offended if she wrote it on her slate. I replied 'No.' That written on the slate was and is a fact, than which nothing could or can be more truthful and to the point. Dr. Andrews is prepared to verify this; the others present on this occasion were but little known to me."

Here we have one of the most remarkable amongst numbers of instances of thought-reading, known to all students of the more abnormal facts of psychology,—an instance encountered by steady-going professional men, in the ordinary course of their profession, and never produced on platforms for the amusement of the crowd at all. Dr. Carpenter, in his remarkable work on "Mental Physiology," has admitted the probability of the existence of some such power as this, on the evidence in his own possession; indeed, Mr. Bishop declares that Dr. Carpenter has verified the real existence of some kind and degree of this power in Mr. Bishop himself, and has stated his belief that Mr. Bishop's powers have been tested under strictly scientific conditions. Now, we do not pretend to have any specific opinion of our own upon Mr. Bishop's case, and have absolutely no right to any such opinion. But we do say that nothing is more marvellous than the assumption of a mere man of the world like Mr. Labouchere, that because the phenomena have never come within his knowledge, they are incredible. To him, apparently opinions like Dr. Carpenter's are not even entitled to a respectful recognition, for he does not refer to them in his second letter of Wednesday last, unless it be in the remark that "nonsense dies hard." At all events incredulity dies hard; though, perhaps, in Mr. Bishop's case there may be good reasons why it should.

It is very possible, not to say likely, that those who came away from St. James's Hall convinced, as apparently was Professor Lankester, that Mr. Bishop had simply juggled successfully, are right. But undoubtedly there are plenty of facts on which eminent medical men have come without having any motive whatever for credulity, and to which they have been compelled to give their attestation, such, for instance, as those we have quoted from Dr. Davey's address to the Bath and Bristol Branch of the Medical Association, far more remarkable, and far more difficult to bring under any of the known laws of nature, than the achievements of Mr. Bishop, even if these achievements be what Colonel Statham and Colonel Trench affirm, and what Mr. Labouchere denies.

M. JULES CLARÉTIE'S PLAY AT THE GAIETY THEATRE.

THE seemingly small portion of the French-play-going public which selects the serious series of the Gaiety performances has an intellectual treat offered to it in M. Jules Clarétie's comedy, Monsieur le Ministre, which was played for the first time on last Monday night. The house was dismally thin, the empty, lightless boxes producing a depressing effect, and the piece was not very warmly received. Most of the persons present, who had seen the play in Paris, expected to see Marais in the rôle of Vaudrey (the Minister) and Landrol in that of Guy de Lissac, the philosophical friend of Vaudrey, who fulfils the office of Chorus and Commentator with easy philosophy and witty cynicism. Those favourite actors were, however, replaced by Messieurs Bertal and Lagrange, who acted their parts well; still, the audience was cold, and very weary of the prolonged entr'actes, which, considering that the décor is as shabby as usual all through, and that the fifth act is played in an almost empty room, are inexplicable. It would not, however, be fair to set down the coldness of the audience to lack of appreciation; it arose in a great measure from an almost embarrassing expectation; the piece is so very little dramatic, that those who did not know this beforehand were expecting the satire motivé—M. le Ministre really is that—to develop into a play, until the only bit of genuine drama in it had come and gone. It is not more talky than Le Demi-Monde; it is not more exclusively concerned with personages who appeal to our intellectual sympathies only, and who do not arouse in us the faintest sentiment of respect, than Dora or Fédora; it is not more subversive of our notions of justice, divine, human, or even poetical, than most

French plays and almost all French novels, though the only man who approaches the ideal of an honest gentleman retires from the scene with a wife who has deceived him, to the knowledge of two of the other persons concerned, and amid the derisive conviction of all the rest. It is simply, as a spectator observed, "Very fine indeed, but hardly a play." The story, much more complicated in the novel, is simple on the stage. M. Vaudrey, a Deputy, goes with his wife to Grenoble, to "inaugurate" a statue to a local celebrity, and is there received by his friend Guy de Lissac. In the midst of the fêtes, Vaudrey learns that the Pichereau Ministry is overthrown, and the new chief offers him the Portfolio of the Interior. The local authorities, very drolly represented, come to congratulate him, and some people—who turn up afterwards to contribute to the satirical meaning of the piece—instantly press their claims. Vaudrey is triumphant and excited; Adrienne, his wife, is submissive, rather than pleased; Guy de Lissac is observant, sarcastic, good-humoured, and cynical. The chief interest of the first act is in the talk between the friends, by which we learn that a certain Mademoiselle Kayser, the niece of a needy and pretentious artist in search of commissions for his "projet de peinture régénératrice," has been present at the inauguration, and that Vaudrey has never taken his eyes off her. Lissac's former relations with this lady make him uneasy about his friend, and a fine point is the cold disdain of Marianne's recognition of him and of his perception of her game. Vaudrey, whose weakness is a little too pronounced, presents her to his wife, and appoints to see her at his new official residence the next day but one. The second act passes at the Ministère, and shows us Vaudrey taking possession, Guy de Lissac as his secrétaire-général, Adrienne busy with her installation in the grand apartments so often vacated, the place-hunters on the war-path, and Marianne steadily pursuing her ends. A long scene between her and De Lissac, in which she is calmly defiant, and we discover that she loves the Duc de Rosas, a grandee "du pays du Cid et de Don Quichotte," who has left her because she has been "si bête" as to confess, not all the truth, but "une faute." Lissac says, "une seule!" and Marianne remarks, in a sentence which is a fair sample of the wit and the morals of the piece,—"Eh! mon cher, quand une femme a failli plusieurs fois, et que, tout-à-coup, elle aime, toutes les fautes n'en font plus qu'une, car tous les hommes n'en font même plus un." Then comes a passage which reveals the perverted notion of honour on which most modern French plays turn. Lissac is a devoted friend of Vaudrey, who has just given him the best place within his disposal; he knows Marianne to be a dangerous adventuress; he admires and esteems Madame Vaudrey, whose praises he sings in the first act; he has perceived the effect that Marianne has produced upon his friend; at a later period he makes a noble sacrifice for Vaudrey; nevertheless, he receives Marianne's avowal of her intentions thus:—

"Marianne.—La Providence, qui a l'air de me faire des excuses, m'a mise sur le chemin de votre Ministre, qui m'a remarquée. C'est un provincial, un naïf. En tout cas, c'est un Ministre. Il a une puissance, momentanée, peut-être, mais qui peut un servir à moi, ou à mon oncle. Je viens tenter de refaire ma vie, dans un autre sens. Je n'ai pas de projets arrêtés. Au fond, tout m'est égal. Qui vivra verra. Vais-je vous avoir pour ami, ou pour ennemi?"

Lissac.—Je garderai la position que vous m'avez faite; je serai neutre.

Marianne.—Alors, pas de dénonciations à M. Vaudrey, pas même de confidences?

Lissac.—Pour qui me prenez-vous, Marianne?

Marianne.—Est-ce qu'on sait? Les hommes sont si lâches!

Lissac (galamment).—Excepté un.

Marianne (insolente).—Mais celui-là est si loin!"

So Vaudrey's friend leaves him to his fate, and when, after a scene of admirable finesse, acted to perfection between the Minister and the adventuress, but for which flirtation would be too innocent a name, Marianne goes out by the private door—to which a satirical allusion has previously been made—Lissac merely remarks, to the audience, "Déjà!"

The progress of the intrigue is distinguished by no novel feature, the inevitable compression for stage purposes doing away with the fine and skilful treatment of the novel from which the play is taken; the Duc de Rosas turns up, Marianne resumes her power over him, and he suspects Vaudrey, who has made himself accountable for Marianne's debts, contracted on the liberal scale usual under such circumstances. Political affairs are as complicated as pecuniary ones; Vaudrey's friends freely discuss, in his wife's salon, his relations with Marianne, and a society journal gives the alerte by a paragraph distinctly intimating those relations. Marianne and the Duc de Rosas are both present at an entertainment at the Ministère, when the Minister's wife receives an anonymously sent copy of the scurrilous but well-informed print; and then comes the one really dramatic situation. The crowd is dispersed through the apartments, the intimes are collected in one room, when Adrienne, wild with jealous fury, rushes in and calls upon her husband to clear himself, and turn Marianne out of the house; he tries to calm her in vain; she orders Marianne off; the Duke de Rosas advances, demands the truth from Marianne, who unhesitatingly swears to a falsehood, and he then says to Adrienne, "On vous a menti, madame, et la preuve, c'est que dans huit jours, si votre mari ne m'a pas tué, Mlle. Kayser sera Duchesse de Rosas." The exit of the Duke, who is supposed to behave sublimely, but whom everybody present knows to be a dupe, and of Marianne, whose quiet triumph is of the fiendish order, leaving Adrienne clinging to her husband's arm, and striving to receive the crowd flocking into the room with composure, is a fine scene. The concluding act gives Marianne a splendid opportunity, but is not really dramatic. The duel has taken place, Vaudrey has been severely wounded, and has kept his bed for some weeks under pretext of inflammation of the lungs; the Duke and Duchess have called to inquire for him every day, and his political enemies have been making their hay during the sunshine of their adversary's misfortune. All Paris knows all about it; the doctor has come to pay his last visit, one of congratulation. Adrienne, having nursed her husband with the usual devotion, is about to separate from him with the usual stoicism; Lissac has undertaken that Adrienne shall "receive" the Duchess, so as to stop the tongues of the world and support her deception of the Duke, and has promised to hand Marianne her compromising letters in return for the Minister's bonds, which she has got out of the hands of an enemy to whom Vaudrey had refused a place. In the meantime, Gralet, who is bidding for the political succession to the Minister, is to speak against him on that day in the Chamber, and Lissac and Vaudrey prepare a surprise. The Minister, supposed to be still confined to his room, slips off in a cab to confront his antagonist unexpectedly in the tribune, and the scenes between his friend, his mistress, his wife, and his intimate enemies take place in his absence. Those scenes are eminently characteristic; the dialogue between Lissac and Marianne bristles with sarcastic epigrams, and the exit of the victorious Duchess is a triumph indeed; for Marianne rejects the money which Lissac tenders her, and which he has sold his estate to raise, on the ground that her husband has already given it to her. Lissac asks her if the Duke knows what she wanted it for, and she replies that he did not ask. Then she makes a great point:—

"Lissac (railleur).—C'est un bon garçon.

Marianne (hautaine).—C'est un gentilhomme. Oui, et si étrange, si sincère, si loyal, si grand seigneur, qu'il ne peut pas être ridicule!"

Adrienne, who has observed the transfer of papers, insists on knowing the truth from Lissac, and then comes a truly astonishing finale, one which finds favour from a French audience, but went very near to ruining the play with its first English one. The inexorable Adrienne, who has turned a deaf ear to Vaudrey's assurances that he has never really loved any one but herself, and that his temporary infidelity was mere madness, is suddenly converted by the discovery that Vaudrey has had to pay for his folly in money, as well as in peace and reputation. Then Adrienne cries, "Ainsi, elle recevait de l'argent? Il la payait? Mais alors [avec un grand cri de joie], il ne l'estimait pas! il ne l'aimait pas!"—and, Vaudrey entering at the moment, she throws herself into his arms. "Tu pardonnes, donc?" asks M. le Ministre; and the wife, whose train of reasoning is obscure to foggy insulars like ourselves, who fail to see what esteem has to do with such relations, exclaims, "Oui,—et j'oublie!" With this solid security for future fidelity and unchanging bliss, and the resignation of his Portfolio by M. le Ministre, to the surprise and gratification of the place-hunters, who set off to leave their cards on Gralet, the play comes to an end. But Lissac has administered strong consolation to Adrienne. On the haughty exit of the Duchess, the outraged wife says:—"Ah, cette femme! Et l'on dit, que le vice est toujours puni. Le voilà qui sort triomphant!" Lissac answers:—"Patience! Elle a joué sa vie! La voilà dans la cage! avec le tigre royal. . . . Et s'il se reveille!" This is a fine comment on Marianne's own words in the decisive scene with Lissac, which reveals the intensity of her character and the social and political cynicism, is the measure of the piece. Lissac has complimented her on her beauty; she has replied that she owes it to her happiness, her success:—"J'ai réalisé le triple rêve de ma vie; le mariage la fortune, et l'amour." Lissac says:—"Mais le Duc est jaloux, il est violent; le jour où il apprendra la vérité, ce ne sera pas drôle!" This is Marianne's answer:—"Il me tuera. Je le sais parfaitement. Ce danger ne me déplaît pas. Je m'ennuierais, peut-être, sans cela, et autant cette mort qu'une autre. Elle est moins banale. Et puis, je l'aime. . . . Au petit bonheur!"

It takes all the charm of the fine acting of the Gymnase Company to disguise the bitter taste of this comedy under its subtle and all-pervading wit; and the little interlude of a free-spoken workman, who comes in to mend a lock in Marianne's apartment, and frankly imparts his political opinions to that lady and the Minister, unconscious of the identity of the latter, was a sensible relief to the cynicism of the subject. This little part, so true, so homely, so convincing, acted to exquisite perfection by M. St. Germain, cheered up the audience, and took off the strain.

The strength of the piece lies in its wit,—in the file-firing of sarcasm and epigram, in the dialogue bristling with points, in the characteristic small touches which enliven the picture of political life, contemptible to a painful degree, and of a socially pestilential condition of things. Are these, or are they not, actualités? The Parisian public has accepted them without protest, and seems well content with them. If they are the truth, then the epoch is what the late Bishop of Orleans called it, "celle de la pourriture." The acting of M. Lagrange as Lissac is almost too finished; very soon one knows precisely where and how his points will be made. M. Bertal's Vaudrey is very good; the weakness of the character is the author's, not the actor's, work. The small and unpleasant rôle of the Duc de Rosas was rather too formally and solemnly acted by M. Barbe; Marianne was represented by Mdlle. Rejane altogether admirably. How such acting as this lady's makes the playgoer wish for something like it at home, and shrink from the coarse daubing that is imposed upon us as art! Her only charm of face is expression, but that suffices; her flexible voice, perfect enunciation, command of every nuance, tone, gesture, and look; her quiet self-control, her perfect repose and as perfect action, when one or the other is called for; her easy manners, as natural to the adventuress as to the Duchess; her profound cynicism, her hardihood, never bold or coarse, but simply immovable; her scorn of Lissac and Vaudrey, her calculating cruelty, and hardly veiled contempt for her victims, the insolence that dominates all around her, and the vide au fond of her own life, form a study of art which no one who has seen it is likely to forget. The way to enjoy this performance thoroughly is to read the play in the first instance, so that one does not lose the wit of the dialogue in the swiftness of its flashes; and then, having seen it, to read it again, with the light of the fine acting of Mdlle. Rejane cast on its subtle, cynical, intellectual power.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

LIBERALISM IN THE SOUTH.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Living in a very large and growing southern town, may I ask you to insert the appended letter, if you agree with me, as I think you will, on the importance of the question which it raises? This much I know, that it represents a just and growing feeling of angry dissatisfaction, at all events in this part of the world. The letter has been written to a member of the Ministry, and may for the rest speak for itself. Names are omitted. It may be added, however, that the writer had no intention of suggesting that leading ministers could themselves find time for attending Liberal dinners in the country during the session. He asked for their help in securing the attendance of some of those who both would and ought.—I am, Sir, &c., PUBLIUS.

[COPY.]

DEAR —,—The promptness as much as the courtesy of your personal reply to my request tempts me to write to you once more upon the general aspect of a question interesting to us both. The special case is past praying for; but I wish it were possible to impress upon the Liberal chiefs the serious consequences of their neglect of the South, while the "sturdy Liberalism" of the North waxes fat upon their constant feeding. I have lived here three years, and in another Conservative stronghold for two years before that, and in both places have been equally impressed by the natural strength of the Liberal plant, and by its sore need of watering. We have had many meetings and many "dinners," but never once, after efforts of all kinds to bring them, have we seen or heard in the flesh any one of those Liberal leaders, old or young, whose names fill the minds of men. They always make excuse, directly they are asked, and the effect upon the rank and file and upon local lieutenants is painfully discouraging. Here we cannot get beyond Mr. — and Mr. —, excellent men, no doubt, in their way, but not calculated to stir enthusiasm. Their "local connection" makes them less, not more, interesting. For our coming annual dinner, for which I asked your help; thirty-five invitations to leading Members of Parliament have met with thirty-five refusals. —'s note, which your secretary kindly sent me, has given me cause for amused disappointment, with which feeling alone I shall placidly watch the young man's future career. A more frankly cynical confession of indifference to the Liberal cause (upon which he is so eloquent on platforms which may be useful to him), except as regards himself, I never saw. Whatever the failings or virtues of the Conservative cause, devotion of the active kind is not wanting there. In the North or in the South, its prominent men are always ready and willing. There has been and is a strong Liberalism in this town, strong enough, on the formation of one of those "Local Houses of Commons" which have lately been growing, to make a Liberal majority (by me, at all events, unexpected), in spite of indifference on one side and exertion on the other. But we are losing ground, I believe entirely through the contrast to which I have called your attention; and the next Parliamentary election, which might have been won, will be lost. Followers will not believe in what does not interest leaders apart from themselves. For myself, I have no political purpose or ambition to serve, but for four years I have given money, time, and speech to the service of the party, besides suffering seriously in my own profession from my outspokenness. The result of this last failure to get any of the right help is that I am resigning all connection with the work, and my place on the County Committee and the Local Associations, and for the future confining myself to my own last. I may have been but a humble ally, but ex uno disce, at all events plurimos.—Faithfully yours, —. June 19th, 1883.

"NATURAL RELIGION."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The interesting passage cited in your last number from a private letter by the author of "Natural Religion" reminds me that, as far as I know, it has never been yet pointed out that the motto or text chosen by the author for his book is, in fact, a garbled quotation.

On the fly-leaf appears the motto, with the name of Wordsworth subjoined, "We live by admiration." What Wordsworth wrote, in the Fourth Book of the "Excursion," is as follows:—

"We live by Admiration, Hope, and Love;
And, even as these are well and wisely fixed,
In dignity of being we ascend."

Now, we clergy are often justly blamed for preaching from single verses or portions of verses of Scripture, as if they contained the whole truth of the matter. I think we may fairly retort the blame, in this instance. What Wordsworth meant to teach is most certainly not represented by the first four words of the first line. It is precisely the omission of the two things—Hope and Love from the passage that, as it seems to me, leaves the new religion proposed for the world by the ingenious author, a sterile and ineffectual thing.—I am, Sir, &c.,

ST. PETERSBURG, OR PETERSBURG?

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I was scarcely prepared to find even the answers to my query in the Spectator leaving me in just the same doubt as before upon a point so simple. In private, I have asked the question of grave authorities without any apparent chance of agreement; in public, I quite expected to be rebuked for what I feel to be ignorance. Petersburg, or St. Petersburg? Mr. A. L. Mayhew, in your number of this morning, answers the first. "A Russian" says the second, and rebukes me a little in a way which I might feel, but for Mr. Mayhew's more decisive (because more reasoned) answer the other way. Privately, I have received a very interesting letter, from which I may quote the following:—"The Russian name of the Russian capital is 'Sanktpeteropol'; the official French name (teste, Le Journal de St. Pétersbourg, 'Mémoires de l'Académie Impériale de St. Pétersbourg,' vii. série, t. xxiii, pp., 279 ff. 409 ff.) is St. Pétersbourg. The German official name is 'Sanktpetersburg'" (authorities quoted).

Granting, then, that my correspondent and "A Russian" (what Russian?) are likely to be correct, does not the initial difficulty remain? And does not it look like the truth that the Russians' official name for their own city is a corruption? (Nobody calls the Roman Basilica, Peter's, "to save trouble.")

In that case, the writer in the Times, Mr. Mayhew, and the young lady are borne out, and with them the curious scholarship of the Frenchman, unofficial. The city of Czar Peter was as much called after him as Washington after the famous American. As there was no St. Washing, the latter name survived. When and how was the saintly prefix first discovered for the Russian city? An editorial answer would be persuasive. So far, I am no wiser than I was, but it certainly looks very much like a new version of an old question. Do not officials sometimes blunder?—I am, Sir, &c.,

HERMAN MERIVALE.

[We fancy Mr. Merivale is right. The legal name is now undoubtedly St. Petersburg, but the Rev. T. Milner in his "Russia" quotes a letter from Peter calling his capital, still unbuilt, Petersburg (p. 204).—Ed. Spectator.]

MR. WALTER CRANE'S PICTURE IN THE GROSVENOR.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you allow me space to make a slight correction? It is in regard to a statement about a work of mine, in a notice of the Grosvenor Gallery appearing in the Spectator of June 9th, to which my attention has only now been called. Your critic seems so surprisingly well informed as to my personal movements, that I feel it is a pity he should not be equally so in regard to my pictorial practices and intentions. I am sure he will be relieved to hear that "Diana and the Shepherd" was not designed in Italy, and that there is not "an olive tree" in the picture.

Whether your critic has not, in the free assumptions he has thought fit to make in regard to my work, himself furnished, to use his own words, "another example of how futile it is" "to rely upon his imagination beyond a certain point," I must leave your readers to judge.—I am, Sir, &c.,

VIVISECTION IN OXFORD.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Mr. Oxenham has touched on a point of great importance to all non-resident M.A.'s, namely, the difficulty of procuring information of University progress. Might I venture to suggest to the authorities that all important matters should be published in the daily papers, for if this suggestion was carried out, we should know what was going on, and by our votes be able to stop such deplorable results as we may anticipate will take place in the new torture-chamber at Oxford?—I am, Sir, &c.,

A CRICKET SLIP.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Who is to guard the guardians? The writer of a notice of "Contradictions," by Miss Peard, in your number of last week, charges her with her ignorance in describing a cricketer as "caught at slip from a skyer," a fate which he declares to be next door to an absolute impossibility. Allow an ancient cricketer to turn the tables in Miss Peard's name. Of all the fates that await an uncertain batsman, none, especially in the long slip, is more common.—I am, Sir, &c., H. KATENKAMP.

[We still doubt whether the term can be so applied. A "skyer" is a ball hit or driven with the batsman's full force, but with the left shoulder not sufficiently forward. A very late hit to leg might just conceivably send a skyer to the slips, but any ordinary catch in that part of the field cannot be so called.—Ed. Spectator.]

A CORRECTION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to correct two misprints in my letter of last week? "I do not write to supplant," &c., should be "to supplement;" and "But, in my case," should be "But, in any case."—I am, Sir, &c.,

POETRY.

IDYLLS OF THE ILIAD.—IX.

ÆNEAS.

ZELEIA, Lectum, spurs of Gargarus,
Shoot out their pine-clothed ridges to the north
Of Ida, rolling to the western sea,

And waves that laugh on Lemnos. In between
There lies an emerald meadow, sloping down
From caverned grottoes such as Proteus loves,
A thousand paces' breadth, this way and that,
To the white margent where the sea-mews shriek.
Here, while the heat yet quivered o'er the place
Which once was Troy, a battered band of men,
Stained with the stains of toil and fight and fire,
Came wearily, and guarded in their midst
The piteous relics of their vanished homes;
Motherless children, childless mothers, men
Whose manhood age had quenched, and lifeless things,
Vessels and raiment, and the secret sheen
Of jewels, and whate'er in yon dark hour
Each perilled life held dearest, nor was lack Of pious reverence for the household gods,
Whose power the mightier power of Zeus had foiled.
Chiefest of all, in birth, in mien, in arms,
Æneas, goddess-born, with either hand
Guided the feeble steps of sire and son,
Troy's past and future. Stern his brow, and sad
With thoughts of lost Creusa, Priam lost,
And lost the joy of battle with his peers.
Yet somewhat of a light was in his eye,
And brave resolve, and, as the coming dawn
Glimmers behind the blackness of the night,
So through the settled sorrow of his gaze
His steadfast purpose shone. Around him thick
Gathered the crowd, as shipwrecked mariners
Gather around the man who, all night long,
Through sea, and surge, and surf, has held the helm,
Undaunted, and, amid the crash of oars
And parting planks, has cheered their sinking hearts
To safety. So Æneas stood, and spake:—
"Comrades, brave hearts, ye who have dared to live
When Priam, Pergamus, and hope are dead,
And all the sweet of life is changed to sour,
Hear me, and mark the words that I shall say.
For not without the guidance of the Gods
Reach we the shelter of these hills, the home
Of Dardanus, and cradle of our race.
Yea, and when great Poseidon came between,
And snatched me from Achilles and from Death,
Great words of promise sounded in mine ears,
That Pergamus and hope should live again,
And, if not Priam, yet a greater name
Of me, and kings that shall be born from me,
Sons of my sons, an empire without end.
And if some after bard shall sing the deeds
Of Hector, and the great ones that are gone,
I also in the mouths of men shall live,
Not unremembered, and the tale of Troy
Shall be but preface to a nobler tale,
Named from Æneas, and Æneas' crew.
Hear, then, this counsel, which my wiser sire,
Known to you all as little less than god,
Confirms. Build we, beneath these sheltering hills,
Stout ships, to bear us to our Western home,
The land of promise, which the dim presage
Of Oracles, and voice of all the Gods,
Has granted to our destinies, and named
Hesperia, Heaven-pledged haven of our rest.
These kindly grots, meanwhile, a safer Troy,
Shall house our weakness; and yon piny wood,
For many an age the Mighty Mother's haunt,
Lending its sacred timbers to our need,
Shall hallow all our voyage by her grace,
And speed us to our goal. Only be men,
After this sunset of your fortunes, face
A night of labour, and the morrow's sun
Shall rise, and lighten with a wider flame
All after-time, nor ever set again."

So spake Æneas, and the valley rang
With loud assent; and all that winter through Rang Ida's ranges with the fall of trees,
And sound of axe and hammer, and the toil
Of men, the destined Masters of mankind.
And with the spring they spread their sails, and sought
Hesperia, Heaven-pledged haven of their rest.

ART.

THE GROSVENOR GALLERY.

[LAST NOTICE.]

IN this last notice of the Grosvenor Gallery, the majority of our remarks will be confined to the pictures in the east gallery, the two smaller rooms, and the entrance-hall. But there are two or three compositions in the large, west gallery which must first be briefly mentioned. Mr. Frank Holl's portrait of John Tenniel is a striking and characteristic piece of work, but it lacks that finer dramatic quality which used to distinguish this artist's paintings; and it is worth while to observe here that in the portraits which Mr. Holl exhibits this year, both at the Academy and Grosvenor Gallery, there is to be traced a distinct decrease of refinement, and a very marked increase of conventionalism. The work is as strong as of old, but not nearly so individual; and its individuality, as we have often pointed out, made most of its charm, for its method was in many ways an abominable one, consisting as it did of an almost total abnegation of local colour, and an excessively exaggerated use of light and shade. But in his flashy chiaroscuro, Mr. Holl's mind worked intelligently and sympathetically. He gave us lime-light portraits, it is true, but his flashes of the lantern were accompanied by flashes of insight; and if in the depth of his shadow and the brightness of his lights many minor details of form and feature vanished, there was sufficient left to give us a clear interpretation of the sitter's personality. But now he is halting between two stools; he has, apparently, been so overwhelmed with work, that he cannot find time to feel, as well as to paint; and nearly every one of his portraits exhibited this year have upon them that stamp of mechanical similarity which, desirable as it may be in a rifle or a billiard-ball, is almost wholly destructive to a work of Art. It is worth while to enlarge upon this point a little, for Mr. Holl is one of the finest portrait-painters in England, and one whom we can ill afford to let fall from his high estate. As we have been of the number of those who, from his earliest efforts in this line, recognised his powers and praised his ability, we are in some sort entitled to say now, at a time of almost universal panegyric, that he is degrading his genius to the level of common-place. In another two years, if his work continues to decrease in quality as it has done for the last two years, he will be simply a less accurate and second-rate Ouleus. It is bad enough for a painter who has a distinct power of touching our sympathies to confine himself to the reproduction of any Tom, Dick, and Harry who will pay for a portrait; but it is far worse that he should get into a conventional manner of turning out Toms, Dicks, and Harries by the dozen. This is the Nemesis of portrait-painting for an artist,—that it is almost inevitably bound to result in the destruction of the sympathy which is as the very life-blood of his heart. For an artist's sympathy is by its very nature of a somewhat exclusive, personal kind, and destroying its personality destroys its power; and its personality must be destroyed if it is allowed no opportunity of asserting itself in work of a different character. So long as Mr. Holl made all his deans, doctors, and divines look equally dramatic and disreputable, his work, though he frequently failed in giving a true interpretation of his sitter, always succeeded in giving a true interpretation of its artist, and so was always of real power and real value; but now that he is too hurried, or too weary to think or feel much beyond how soon he can paint this sitter, and get on to another, his portraits have become as dull as they were previously dramatic, and are as like one another as sausages that are turned out of a machine. One cannot blame the artist, for the public, which would have left him to starve when he put his soul into his work, now floods him with commissions for ten years because he is the fashion; but long ere the ten years comes to an end, the public, like the unwise old woman in Tennyson's poem, will have killed its goose with the golden eggs, and there will be no more golden eggs. We will not attempt to criticise or to estimate the worth of Mr. Whistler's two contributions, but will only say that his admirers will find two good examples of this painter's work in the west gallery.

Mr. John Collier's picture of "Pharaoh's Handmaidens" deserves notice, as a piece of singularly vivid realistic work. It is not quite easy to see what intention the artist has had in painting it, for it can hardly be called a subject-picture, and the three naked, brown girls are not specially beautiful or interesting; but, like all Mr. Collier's work, it is well painted, and has a certain sincerity of speech, which is, perhaps, almost too marked for the artistic merit of the picture. Very certainly there is no mystery here, nor does the artist probably find anything mysterious in any subject which his pencil depicts. He is perhaps to be likened, in portrait and subject-painting, to Mr. Brett in landscape; he sees very clearly, very accurately, and very minutely; he does not see very far or very much, and this is because he cannot believe that there is anything which he does not see.

Mr. Napier Hemy's "Old Putney Bridge in 1882" is a fine, vivid, and faithful study of the most picturesque bridge over the Thames; it is now either pulled down, or in process of being so. Mr. Hemy is one of those artists whom the public have always treated with a neglect which, though somewhat uncalled for, is easily explicable. There is an element of strangeness in his work which is apt to affront the ordinary picture-buyer, who likes nothing that he cannot understand; and this strangeness of Mr. Hemy's is of neither a sentimental nor a sympathetic kind, it is more an intellectual than an emotional quality; one almost needs a special mental key to comprehend his paintings, and the artist, besides, is one of those who utterly disdain to follow in one narrow track of subject. He paints now devotional processions in an old French town, now a fishing-boat coming into harbour after the bad weather, now "Old Putney Bridge;" and this capriciousness, for such it seems to many people, even where it does not offend is apt to cause the picture-buyer, who is always something of a specialist, to pass the work by. More and more, year by year, it is noticeable how success in art is gained by concentration rather than diffuseness, by the cultivation of some little tiny grass-plot of feeling or incident, rather than a wide outlook over the wider thoughts and passions of mankind. Like the dropping of perpetual water, the artist who hammers away sufficiently long at a tree, a cloud, a nose, or a petticoat, will end by securing his public, and all who love specially trees, noses, clouds, or petticoats, will go to him for their artistic sustenance.

Mr. J. R. Reid's picture of "The Yarn," like most of his other works this year, shows increased power and skill. The picture suffers a little from a defective rendering of the values in foreground and distance, the near and distant objects both appearing to be painted in the same plane. Compare the broken pitcher, which is the nearest thing in the foreground, with the group of figures behind it and the house in the extreme distance, and it will be seen how all three objects or groups of objects are treated in exactly the same manner, and have an exactly equal value. Indeed, Mr. Reid occasionally loses sight so entirely of the distinction between distance and proximity as to give more detail to the objects which are further away; for instance, the house at the end of the street in this picture shows more details than the wall, which stands half a mile or so nearer to the spectator; for the rest, this is a very pleasant and faithful picture of the realistic school, and has that sort of homely, quiet humour about its figures which Mr. Reid excels in depicting.

Mr. David Murray's "Haymaking in the Scotch Fens" is a very fine example of impressionist art; a more vigorous attempt to tackle a very splendid effect of stormy sunlight we have rarely seen, and the whole picture is full of carefully-observed truth; look especially at the lighting of the figures, the reflected gleams in the water, and the mingled gloom and sunshine which shadow and brighten the marsh. Mr. Howard Campion has a good landscape here, entitled, "Midwinter, Brittany," which deserves a word of notice for its originality of treatment; as does the decorative frieze of boys and dolphins designed by Mr. W. E. F. Britten for the Earl of Leconfield. Signor Costa sends only small landscapes to this Gallery, but his work, even on so small a scale, is intensely interesting, and, despite its minuteness and delicacy, possesses a breadth of manner which might teach many of our painters a much-needed lesson; still more might they learn of the delicate iridescence with which Mr. Costa paints his foliage, his meadows, and his flowers. Mrs. Stuart Wortley's "Partridge Shooting" is a marvellously vivid piece of landscape-painting, executed with a sort of slapdash pre-Raphaelitism which would be insolent, were it not so accurate; it is not a pleasant picture, for it is at once both hard in effect and exaggerated in colour, and it lacks all touch of sympathy for Nature, but it is uncommonly well painted and carefully drawn, and the attitudes of the sportsmen are all absolutely right,—the sort of work, we imagine, which it would pay a sporting publisher to reproduce in chromolithography.

BOOKS.

THE LADIES LINDORES.*

The Ladies Lindores must be tested by the scenes in which Caroline Lindores appears. The rest of the story is of the kind to which Mrs. Oliphant has so well accustomed us. She is always readable, but never so entertaining as when she lays the scene in Scotland, and describes for us the little laird of the modern kind, not Scott's kind; the Scotch lord, with his pride and his ambitions; the old Scotch lady, with her originality, independence, and devotion to her House; the Scotch servants, with their fidelity, their whims, and their ways; and the whole life of the Scotch country-side. We catch the true impression of that life, and we know the figures she draws. She blunders often, as in the description of Beaufort, who is impossibly limp—limpness is a usual defect of Mrs. Oliphant's men—and of Lord Lindores, who is reasonable and unreasonable at once; but it is impossible to imagine sketches more life-like than those of old Rolls, the pragmatic butler, who accepts imprisonment for his master's sake, but gratifies himself with a tour to Edinburgh beforehand, and calculates whether by accusing himself he shall lose so very much; of Miss Barbara Erskine, the high-spirited, punctilious, yet sensible old aunt; of Lord Rintoul, the weakly, yet coolly selfish and sensible young lord, who would sacrifice his sisters to increase the family prestige, but follows his own fancy in marriage; of the ordinary young laird, John Erskine, who is the hero in spite of himself; and of the most modern of Marquises, Lord Millefleurs, who loves the dissipation of daring adventure, and though a chubby lad who says "don't you know?" and has no mental power except that of keen observation, is still somehow dignified and important. That sketch is a test of Mrs. Oliphant's wonderful observation, and, but for a trace of caricature, into which a little inner contempt for grantees of the kind tempts the author, would be quite perfect. All these things, however, except the Marquis, together with the pleasant, lively story, the fine descriptions, and the humorous, half-satirical asides, can be found in any of Mrs. Oliphant's novels. The separateness of this one lies in the character of Caroline Lindores. She is a thoroughly modern girl, cultivated, addicted to literature and to sentiment, and deeply in love with an English barrister, the weak young Beaufort mentioned above, when her father, who has unexpectedly inherited a poor Scotch earldom and is mad to win an English peerage, orders her to marry Pat Torrance. Pat Torrance is a hulking brute of a laird, impossibly arrogant, and cruel, who has inherited by the mother's side the vast wealth of a railway contractor, and can, therefore, help on Lord Lindores' plans. Though born in his huge house, he is as vulgarly vain of his possessions as if he had been new to them, and he thinks "Lady Car," with her air of distinction and intellect, will be the finest among them. She shrinks with horror from the brute, who drinks already, and whose only good quality is physical courage and his only acquirement horsemanship; but her father is too strong for her essentially weak nature, and she marries the wealthy boor. Thenceforward her life is a torture to her. She cannot endure her husband, and Torrance, touched in his vanity by her abhorrence, insults her incessantly, suspects her friends, and at last proposes to invite Beaufort, in order that he may watch and enjoy her suffering. "You will never go wrong," he tells her, as he mentions his plan, which she, with her fatal keenness of perception, thoroughly understands. Then, as she shrinks in despair and fear, Torrance dies. He is a mad rider, often half-drunk, and always quarrelsome; he makes, while passing a dangerous "scaur," a blow at Rintoul, who had remonstrated on his sister's behalf, and partly through Rintoul's clutch at the bridle, partly through his own headlong violence, falls over the precipice and is instantly killed. Lady Lindores and her daughter drive over to console Carry, and find her apparently stupified by the accident, until the very servants say that unless she can cry she will lose her reason. "Carry, Carry!" says Lady Lindores, —

"You are putting too much force upon yourself—it is unnatural; it will be all the more terrible for you after." Carry stood stooping over her mother, holding Lady Lindores' head against her bosom. She smiled faintly, and shook her head. "Has it not been unnatural altogether?" she said. . . . Edith's impulse was to escape from a problem which she could not deal with. "I will go and see the children," she said. "The children—poor children! have you seen them, Carry? do they know?" said Lady Lindores, drying the tears—the only tears that had been shed for Torrance—from her cheeks. Carry did not make any reply. She went away to the other end of the room and took up a white shawl in which she wrapped herself. "The only thing I feel is cold," she said.—"Ah, my love, that is the commonest feeling. I have felt sometimes as if I could just drag myself to the fire like a wounded animal and care for nothing more."—"But, mother, you were never in any such terrible trouble."—"Not like this—but I have lost children," said Lady Lindores. She had to pause again, her lip quivering. "To be only sorrow, there is no sorrow like that." She had risen, and they stood together, the fantastic firelight throwing long shadows of them all over the dim and ghastly room. Suddenly Carry flung herself into her mother's arms. "Oh my innocent mother!" she cried. "Oh, mother! you only know such troubles as angels may have. Look at me! look at me! I am like a mad woman. I am keeping myself in, as you say, that I may not go mad—with joy!" Lady Lindores gave a low terrible cry, and held her daughter in her arm, pressing her desperately to her heart as if to silence her. "No, Carry—no, no," she cried.—"It is true. To think I shall never be subject to all that any more—that he can never come in here again—that I am free—that I can be alone. Oh, mother, how can you tell what it is? Never to be alone: never to have a corner in the world where—some one else has not a right to come, a better right than yourself. I don't know how I have borne it. I don't know how I can have lived, disgusted, loathing myself. No, no; sometime else I shall be sorry when I have time to think, when I can forget what it is that has happened to me—but in the meantime I am too happy—too—" Lady Lindores put her hand upon her daughter's mouth. "No, no, Carry—no, no; I cannot bear it—you must not say it," she cried. Carry took her mother's hands and kissed them, and then began to sob, the tears pouring from her eyes like rain. "I will not say anything," she cried; "no, no—nothing, mother. I had to tell you to relieve my heart. I have been able to think of nothing else all these hours. I have never had so many hours to myself for years. It is so sweet to sit still and know that no one will burst the door open and come in. Here I can be sacred to myself, and sit and think; and all quiet—all quiet about me."

Now, is that natural? If it is not, the story is a failure artistically, for this is the supreme scene of it, it has been carefully led up to, and "Carry" persists in her attitude to the end, pleading with her lover Beaufort to marry her indecorously soon, lest by any turn of fate her happiness should again evaporate. It is very difficult to answer the question—That a woman so situated might be glad, glad exceedingly that her husband was dead, is natural enough; and no doubt Carry has the truthfulness to herself which characterises women of the modern education, but still, is this outburst probable? Torrance was the father of her two children, and though a horrible brute, was neither faithless nor a criminal. He was a man to fear rather than despise, except with cold, intellectual contempt, full, as his dependents acknowledged, of a rough manliness. It seems to us that, in the moment of release, the wife, because of her release, would have felt a new pity born, and would have experienced, if no sorrow—that was impossible—some human sense of shock. If she did not, she would have been harder and stronger than Carry Lindores, who, remember, with all her desire for cultivation, was a feeble and timid creature. Test the scene by placing it on the stage. The audience would never bear it, not because of the rough tearing-away of the conventional dress for feelings, but because they would know by their own hearts it was not true, that the realism was too bald. Many a man and woman suffers by a life till its extinction would be a joy, and more would not for worlds revive a torturing life which has passed away; but to all, if sane, the first relief restores the naturalness of feeling from which human affection springs. Carry, be it remembered, is thoroughly good, does not hate her children because they are his, avoids her lover while her husband lives with painful care, and is in no more danger of turning murderess under her worst trial than of going mad. Her burst of exultation over a violent death would never have come, though a delicious sense of relief from torture might gradually have supervened upon the shock. There is a defect of art, we are certain, in the description, which we regret, because we are always pleased when Mrs. Oliphant steps out of her beaten track, and lets her genius have a rush, as she did, for example, in the splendid scene in Philip Musgrave—otherwise not a strong novel—in which the gipsy mother finds that her sons, in whom she is wrapped up, have involuntarily—for one is mad—killed each other. We doubt if there is anything finer in dramatic literature than that chapter, which could have been written only by one who is something more than a novelist. That scene, however, is true; while this is false, especially false to the carefully described nature of the woman who thus exulted. We are not asking of Mrs. Oliphant any hypocrisy. Let her portray the truth as she finds it, and Carry's horror of her husband may well be literally true; but this joy because he is dead, felt at the first moment in a passionate rush of exultation, is not true. Mrs. Oliphant may have seen it, but she saw it in an exceptional nature, as unlike to Carry Lindores as to the rest of mankind.

AUT CÆSAR AUT NIHIL.*

THE clever author of German Home Life has in Aut Cæsar aut Nihil given us a story which is powerful, ambitious, and interesting, but is yet, from the artistic point of view, amorphous, and in other respects unsatisfactory. Its length is portentous, to begin with. It consists of three volumes, and each of these in turn contains as much matter as a volume and a half of ordinary fiction. Then the asides, and the digressions, and the comments on character are preposterously numerous, and in the end become almost as tedious as the critical chatter of an insipid girl in a picture-gallery. Finally, though there is, as there could not fail to be, smart writing in Aut Cæsar aut Nihil, it is unequally distributed over the whole. There is as much of it in the first half of the first volume as there is in the remaining two volumes and a half. The truth would seem to be that the Countess von Bothmer, in her anxiety to utilise for the purposes of fiction so tragic an event as the assassination of Alexander II., has written hurriedly, and in consequence spoiled what would otherwise have been an excellent historical romance. Were it not for the marks of haste that are painfully evident in the second and still more in the third volume, we should have inferred from Aut Cæsar aut Nihil that its author, while she can do justice to character in mass, class, or caste, has not the finer touch that is necessary for individual portraiture. As things are, we shall suspend our judgment on this point until she presents the public with another and, it may be hoped, a smaller and more carefully executed story.

What makes our disappointment with Aut Cæsar aut Nihil all the keener, is that there is in it enough of boldness of conception alike of plot and of character to make the fortune of half-a-dozen works of the kind. The Countess von Bothmer presses into her service German and English, Greek and Russian, the anti-Jewish crusade and the frivolities of the Kursaal, the amours and the assassination of Alexander II. She gives us cabinet portraits of Nihilism in all attitudes and all costumes, in all places and in all ranks,—patiently setting up revolutionary type in the slums of St. Petersburg, waltzing in rouge and paste diamonds at an Imperial ball, talking scandal and making proselytes at a German watering-place. By far the most powerfully drawn character in the book—if only the Countess could have let him speak for himself, instead of doing most of the speaking for him—is the Baron Mellin, the inscrutable visionary and relentless disciple of Herzen and Bakounine, to whom everything of the character of human emotion and weakness comes as grist to the mill of “the cause,”—the personal devotion of impulsive Bianca Martello, the beauty and racial enthusiasm of Esther Rodostamos, Julie Kerezoff’s thirst to avenge a dishonoured visitor, Helena Perowsky’s determination to punish the Imperial lover who has deserted her. The author might, we think, have spared us the Perowsky episode. There is something singularly repulsive in the idea of a woman of an almost saintly character submitting to a mock marriage to a brutal and brainless Tartar noble, and becoming the mistress of the Czar, even although she satisfies her conscience by trying to consider her rôle as that of Egeria, consoling and sustaining the Imperialist Numa, worn-out with anxiety, and battling with rebellion in household, court, and nation. Nor can we conceive such a woman, simply because she is discarded for a younger sister, at once seeking the vulgar revenge of the murderess. Of the female characters that figure in Aut Cæsar aut Nihil, we admire most the “three generations of fair Owens,”—Léonie, the sweet French Canadian, married to a shifty and coarse-grained Irish squire, who dabbles in speculation, and, like the Great Frederick, is not “superstitiously veracious;” Hero, her daughter, sacrificed to an Italian scoundrel; and finally, her grand-daughter, poor, impulsive Bianca, who, with the blood of so many races coursing through her veins, is just the moth to be attracted to Mellin and his Nihilist candle. We may safely lay the flattering unction to our souls that the best of the Countess’s male characters are English. Lord Dovedale, who will not take a final “No” from Esther Rodostamos, is by no means a bad specimen of the modern English aristocrat, healthy, stoical, and, it must be added, a trifle Dundrearyish and even dull. We must protest, however, against the spice of ‘Arry which the Countess puts into the character of good-natured Reggie Hudson. Loquacious though he is, indolent though he has been, he is still an English gentleman, and we cannot believe that he would descend to the atrocious vulgarity of “Second-best Sunday-go-to-meeting togs, Lincoln and B., and patent-agonies.” Gerald Fitzgerald, the male guardian angel of the Owens, who vacillates between Hero and her daughter, is, after Mellin, the best character in the book. He has the patience and self-control of a cultured Englishman, and preserves them wonderfully, in spite of extraordinary provocation from a singularly shrewish and vituperative mother. As we have said, there is so much that is good, yet so much also that is only the raw material of goodness, in Aut Cæsar aut Nihil, that one cannot help wishing Mr. Hardy could have aided the Countess with her plot, and Mr. James could have given the finishing-touches to her portraits.

There are not so many quotable passages in Aut Cæsar aut Nihil, as in German Home Life. The Countess von Bothmer has not the English language and English ideas—at least, modern English ideas—altogether at her command. Otherwise she would not horrify us with talking, at this time of day, about “Will Shakspeare,” nor would she give us such strenuous satire, as “The mean ambitions, the vulgar aspirations, the coarse contempt, and uncultured ridicule of those a step, or it may be several steps, lower in the social scale, hardening their hearts, snubbing their noses, and widening their mouths, from generation to generation of prosperous shop-keeping, gig-driving, face-grinding, and money-grubbing progenitors, present an aggregate of complacent and unlovely ignorance appalling to contemplate.” The Countess, as is well known, has no slight power of saying “good things,” which, however, we decline to consider epigrams. “That risky product, an only child” is not bad, though it is spoiled by the variety of meanings borne now-a-days by “risky.” “Those mystic instincts of self-devotion which make Christianity more especially the religion of maternity,” is richer and truer. Daudet might have written this, which the Countess puts in the mouth of Julie Kerezoff, “There was nothing I did not do and would not have done for her. I even lent her my false hair.” Still happier is Hero’s comment, “It would have been so much pleasanter had there been no necessity either for the false hair or the free confidence.” We like Countess von Bothmer best, however—at least in Aut Cæsar aut Nihil—in what special correspondents style “graphic” work. Here is a piece of description which recalls that now forgotten writer, the author of Granby :—

“The road led by a gradual ascent through an avenue of Spanish chestnuts which presently became a dense forest. Here and there a ranger wished them good-day; now and again a woodcutter, driving a donkey that looked like a perambulatory faggot-stack, crossed their path, and, with a rough and ready greeting, disappeared down a sunlit glade. A fresh breeze was rippling the surface of the young wood; the shining leaves seemed to be babbling and prattling in their joy that the winter was over and past, and the song of the turtle heard once more in the land. The driver asked if the Herrschaften would get out and walk, explaining that the footpath was nearer, easier, and pleasanter. Mr. Owen, scenting an attempt to evade the bargain, and crediting their clumsy Jehu with a desire to impose and cheat the unwary Briton, felt indisposed to move. The young men were glad to stretch their long limbs, cramped with the exigency of a conveyance which not even the maddest cultus for courtesy-titles could classify as the conventional ‘carriage.’ Hero, folding up the frivolous sunshade, descended with alacrity. The earth beneath their feet appeared to give way; they did not really touch the ground, but trod upon the dried leaves of immemorial autumn, elastic and springy, with a fine woodland odour, familiar (and dear) to all pedestrian lovers of sylvan scenery. The chequered shade lay in bright moving patches, flecking the ground with intermingled sunlight and shadow, like little tricky translated cloudlets chasing each other over the ground in frolicsome pursuit. Against the clear blue sky, the fresh young leaves of this season fluttered joyously in the light mountain breezes. Hero, walking bareheaded through the upland forest, in her simple white dress, attended by a knight and a squire of goodly thews and sinews, suggested Una with far more justice than the pink-lined parasol had recalled Narcissa; and something of the contrition he felt for having wronged her, though only by a passing thought, made itself apparent in the inflection of Fitz’s voice.”

There are, too, power and promise, though marred by over-strenuousness, in this piece of dreamy characterisation :—

“Life, in Russia, is bounded by large horizons. Once outside St. Petersburg or Moscow, or any other town which the traveller may choose to recall or imagine, vast, limitless plains stretch away in level uniformity, monotonous, melancholy, immense. The solitary peasant, the lonely shepherd, gazes up at you from his sheepskins or his toulouse, and, in an accent pitched to a minor key, wishes you, in soft, pathetic inflections a wondering 'Good-day.' Why should you put yourself to the expense and inconvenience of travel, expose yourself to the extortion of innkeepers, the heat of frowy hostels, cheating moujiks, and exorbitant charges? And vaguely commiserating you,—whom he reckons one of the great ones of the earth, in your pictured difficulties,—the herdsman gazes in your face, prince or potentate though he dreams you to be, with the sympathy and pity of a gentle brotherly soul. In the villages you pass through, it may be that now and again some Russian Volskied falls upon the ear. Weeks afterwards you will find yourself haunted by its pathetic rhythm, by its yearning refrain, and you will wonder why this half-barbaric song has the power to absorb you, and touch you by its appealing, plaintive melody. It is as though some unknown spirit of wildness stretched its arms forth across the dreary miles of waste and wild, murmuring: 'I, too, despite our widely-differing experiences, am thy brother. From the deep forests and silent plains, from Siberian mines and Tartar steppes, from the dim Caucasian peaks, from Aryan myths and empires of utmost Ind, shrouded in the mists of immemorial ages, I call to thee, across Time and Space, out of the depths of my unheeded century-old solitude!' In this vast, mysterious country, where all the Russias, and each, has its qualifying adjective, where the styles and titles of Cæsar read like the projected geographical course of a college term on an extended scale, the very impossibility of things suggests the possible. Rigorous ice-bound nature broods above more ardent aspirations than warm Italian skies ever ripened into an easy enthusiasm; and, beneath a winding-sheet of snow, men's blood burns in fierce revolt, frozen though for the nonce it be into seeming silence. Under gigantic conditions, to count the pigmy items is impossible. Temperate or torrid zones may reckon with fate, but the frigid must overleap half a world, and trust to chance or fate for the result. There is a point at which cold becomes heat; and the frost-bitten sufferer seems to endure the torments of the fiery furnace. In such a condition was Russia at the time of our story. The snow-clad volcano might burst forth in destructive eruption at any moment, and those who know how thin was the crust of the crater, were prepared to see the signal-flames, like those of some giant watch-fire on a mountain peak, shoot up into the midnight skies, the token amidst surrounding silence, obscurity, and gloom, of a far-spreading conflagration. In old times, it took a hundred horses and seven days to travel from St. Petersburg to Moscow. To-day, the journey is performed by train in fifteen hours, and your fellow-travellers will probably be as 'mixed' as the company to be met in an American 'car.'

* Aut Cæsar aut Nihil. By the Countess M. von Bothmer. 3 vols. London: Longmans, Green, and Co., 1883.

MR. CHURCH'S "HEROES AND KINGS."*

MR. CHURCH'S literary cunning in selection, translation, and paraphrase, does not in any degree desert him. A more charming supplementary volume to his other Greek tales it would be impossible to find, and we only regret that as yet at least it is not published in a shape uniform with the long series of Classical tales which have done so much to render for English readers the spirit of the Greek and Latin legends. The form, indeed, could be hardly prettier than it is. Both type and illustrations are as good as ever, and the cheapness of the book is something marvellous. But there are many who will wish to possess this delightful series of Classical tales as a whole, and for them we hope that there may be given at some future time an edition of the present volume uniform with those which have preceded it. This volume may be regarded as supplementary to the tales from Homer and from Herodotus, though its first and longest tale, "The Voyage of the 'Argo,'" is taken from Apollonius Rhodius, who, if he may be said to be of the school of Homer, lived so long after him that he bears nearly the same relation to Homer that some of our modern Chaucerians bear to Chaucer. Partly however for that very reason, the story of the Argonauts is well worth telling in connection with the Homeric tales. One sees in it glimpses of that later day in which it was written, but those glimpses heighten the effect of the Homeric episodes which fill up the middle portion of Mr. Church's book. The scepticism of Idas as to the importance to be attached to the wrath of Zeus, is one of such signs of the later origin of the story of the 'Argo'; the complaint of Aphrodite as to the selfishness and hardheartedness of her son Eros, is another; and the beautiful passage in which Medea takes leave of her bed-room, when she is about to trust herself to Jason and the Greeks, is a third. No one, we think, could compare it with the leave-taking of Hector and Andromache in the Iliad, without being conscious that the pathos of the later book is cast in a more self-conscious mood than the pathos of Homer:—

"All that night the King sat with his nobles, meditating harm against Jason and the heroes; for he knew that the thing had been done by craft, and also that his daughter was concerned in the matter. And Medea also sat grievously troubled in her chamber, fearing the wrath of her father; and oft-time she thought that she had best kill herself with poison. But at last Heré put it into her heart that she should flee, taking the sons of Phrixus for companions. Then she arose from bed, and took the medicines that she had from their chest, and hid them in her bosom. And she kissed her bed and the posts of her chamber-doors and the walls. Also she cut off a long lock of her hair to be a memorial of her to her mother. And when she had done this she cried with a lamentable voice, 'Farewell, my mother, and thou, Chalciope, my sister! Would that this stranger had perished before he came to the land of the Colchians!' Then she went out from the house, the great gates opening before her of their own accord, for she had anointed them with a mighty drug; and, being come into the street, she ran very swiftly, holding her robe over her head, till she saw the light of the fires where the heroes sat feasting all the night in the joy of the victory that Jason had won. Then she came near, and, lifting up her voice, cried to the youngest of the sons of Phrixus, whose name was Phrontis. And Phrontis heard her, and knew the voice that it was the voice of Medea, and told the thing to Jason. Then Jason bade the heroes be silent; and they listened. Thrice she cried, and thrice did Phrontis answer her. And the heroes loosed the ship and rowed it across the river; but ere ever it came to the other shore Jason and the sons of Phrixus leapt from the deck on to the land. And when Medea saw the brothers, she ran to them, and caught them by the knees, and cried to them, 'Save me now from King Æetes! yea, and save yourselves also, for all things are now known to him. Let us fly hence in the ship, before he come upon us with a great army. But first I will give the Fleece into your hands, having laid to sleep the dragon that guardeth it. But do thou, Prince Jason, do as thou didst promise, calling the gods to witness.' And Jason was glad when he saw her, and took her by the hand, and lifted her up, and spake kindly to her, saying, 'Dearest of women, now may Zeus and Heré his wife, that is the goddess of marriage, be my witnesses that I will take thee to wife so soon as we shall have returned to the land of Greece.'

Compare this even with a passage of much less power than the parting of Hector and Andromache, a passage contained in the present volume, the interview of Ulysses with the soul of his mother in the shades, and we shall see at once how different the temper of the pathos is,—how much less of the spirit of self-pity natural to a self-conscious age, it contains:—

"So Ulysses abode in his place; and the soul of his mother came near, and drank of the blood. And when she had drunk, she knew her son, and said, 'My son, why hast thou come into the land of darkness, being yet alive? Hast thou not yet returned to thy home?' To her Ulysses made answer. 'I came hither to inquire of Teiresias of Thebes, and my home have I not seen. Truly trouble hath followed me from the day that I first went with King Agamemnon to the land of Troy. But tell me, how didst thou die? Did a wasting disease slay thee, or Artemis smite thee with sudden stroke of her arrow? And my father and my son, have they enjoyment of that which is mine, or have others taken it from them? And my wife, is she true to me, or hath she wedded some Prince among the Greeks?' Then said his mother, 'Thy wife is true, and sits weeping for thee day and night. And thy son hath enjoyment of thy possessions, and hath his due place at the feasts of the people. But thy father cometh no longer to the city, but abideth in the country. Nor hath he any couch for his bed, but in winter-tide he sleeps, even as sleep the slaves, in the ashes near unto the fire, and when the summer comes, in the corner of the vineyard upon leaves. Greatly doth he sorrow, waiting for thy return, and the burden of old age lies heavy upon him. But as for me, no wasting disease slew me, nor did Artemis smite me with her arrows; but I died of longing for thee, so sorely did I miss thy wisdom and thy love.' Then Ulysses would have laid hold upon the soul of his mother. Thrice he sprang forward, eager to embrace her; and thrice she passed from out his hands, even as passeth a shadow. And when he said 'How is this, my mother, art thou then but a phantom, that the Queen of the dead hath sent me?' his mother answered him, 'Thus it is with the dead, my son. They have no more any flesh and bones, for these the might of the fire devours; but their souls are even as dreams, flying hither and thither. But do thou return so soon as may be to the light, and tell all that thou hast seen and heard to thy wife.'

In this story of the visit of Ulysses to the shades, Mr. Church loses not a few, we think, of the many delicate effects of the original, by narrating in the third person what Homer gives us in the first person as the direct narrative of Ulysses to the Phæacian king. Mr. Church leaves out, for instance, not unnaturally under the circumstances, Ulysses's own expression of anguish at the shadowiness of his mother's form and at the failure of his attempt to embrace her; and this deprives the passage of much of its naturalness, as well as of some of its tenderness. Again, there is a special effect of simplicity conveyed by the language in which Ulysses is made to narrate his mother's address to him, a simplicity lost when the words are no longer put into his own mouth. As Homer gives it, the shade of his mother says to Ulysses:—"But it was yearning for you, and for your words of counsel, and for your gentleness, noble Ulysses, which broke my heart." That, as an address from the mother to the son, repeated by that son himself to a third person, has a simplicity that is absent from an impersonal narrative. Still, even in the form of an independent tale, which Mr. Church could not well have avoided, the contrast between the style of the late disciple of Homer and the style of Homer himself is extremely striking. And we are sure that the effect, both of the later and of the earlier style, is heightened by giving them both in the same volume.

* Heroes and Kings: Stories from the Greek. By the Rev. Alfred J. Church, M.A., Professor of Latin in University College, London. London: Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday.

We may congratulate not only Mr. Church, but ourselves also, on the success with which he has followed up the hint given him in these columns, and rendered for us that most quaint and humorous as well as splendid passage in the twenty-first book of the Iliad, in which the Gods descend to encounter each other on the plains of Troy. Mr. Church has never given us a passage of greater spirit and vivacity, and has rendered, as indeed he was sure to render, the touches of humour with the most admirable vividness and fidelity. The conception of the battle of the Gods seems to have been suggested by the antique belief that when a river rises to flood, it is by the will of the river-god that this happens, so that the flooding of Scamander is represented by Homer as a voluntary act of the local river-deity done to curb the rage of Achilles—an act which directly brings on the intervention of the scandalised deities on the other side:—

"Furiously did Achilles rage over the plain, and he drove the sons of Troy before him as a man driveth sheep, till they came to the river of Scamander. And when they leapt into the river seeking to escape him, even as locusts fly before a fire that devours them, then Achilles leapt in also, pursuing them. His spear he left on the bank, and slew them with his sword, smiting them this way and that, till the water was red with blood. Very wroth was the River to see such slaughter, for he loved the sons of Troy, and first he put courage into the heart of Asteropæus, the Pæonian; but him Achilles slew, for all that he was the son of a river-god and a great warrior that could throw a spear with his left hand even as he threw it with his right. And when the River saw that Asteropæus was dead, and that Achilles was slaying many of the Pæonians—for these were troubled, their chief being dead—he took upon him the shape of a man, and spake to Achilles, saying: 'Truly, Achilles, thou excellest all other men in might and deeds of blood, for the gods themselves protect thee. It may be that Zeus hath given thee to slay all the sons of Troy; nevertheless, depart from me and work thy will upon the plain; for my stream is choked with the multitude of corpses, nor can I pass to the sea. Do thou, therefore, cease from troubling me.' To him Achilles made answer: 'This shall be as thou wilt, O Scamander. But the Trojans I will not cease from slaying till I have driven them into their city and have made trial of Hector, whether I shall vanquish him or he shall vanquish me.' And as he spake he sped on, pursuing the Trojans. Then the River cried to Apollo: 'Little thou dost the will of thy father, thou of the Silver Bow, who bade thee stand by the men of Troy and help them till darkness should cover the land.' And he rushed on with a great wave, stirring together all his streams. The dead bodies he threw upon the shore, roaring as a bull roareth; and them that lived he hid in the depth of his eddies. And all about Achilles rose up the flood, beating full upon his shield, so that he could not stand fast upon his feet. Then Achilles laid hold of a lime tree, fair and tall, that grew upon the bank; but the tree brake therefrom with all its roots, and tare down the bank, and lay across the river, staying its flow, for it had many branches. Thereupon Achilles leapt out of the water and sped across the plain, being sore afraid. But the River ceased not from pursuing him, that he might stay him from slaughter and save the sons of Troy. So far as a man may throw a spear, so far did Achilles leap; strong as an eagle was he, the hunter-bird that is the strongest and swiftest of all birds. And still as he fled the River pursued after him with a great roar. Even as it is with a man that would water his garden, bringing a stream from a fountain; he has a pickaxe in his hand, to break down all that would stay the water; and the stream runs on, rolling the pebbles along with it, and overtakes him that guides it. Even so did the River overtake Achilles, for all that he was swift of foot, for indeed the gods are mightier than men. And when Achilles would have stood against the River, seeking to know whether indeed all the gods were against him, then the great wave smote upon his shoulders; and when he leapt into the air, it bowed his knees beneath him and devoured the ground from under his feet. Then Achilles looked up to heaven and groaned, crying out: 'O Zeus, will none of the gods pity me, and save me from the River? I care not what else may befall me. Truly my mother has deceived me, saying that I should perish under the walls of Troy by the arrows of Apollo. Surely it had been better that Hector should slay me, for he is the bravest of the men of Troy, but now I shall perish miserably in the river, as some herd-boy perisheth whom a torrent sweeps away in a storm.'"

Nothing could be more graphic than that. Indeed, we hardly know a better piece of English in the language. But that is only the beginning of the fray among the deities, high and low, who concern themselves with the fate of Troy. We must give one more passage from the same fine story, that in which Artemis unwisely endeavours to persuade Apollo to assist the Trojans, and suffers for her temerity:—

"And he turned to depart; for he feared to join battle with the brother of his sire. But his sister, Artemis, the great huntress of beasts, was very wroth when she saw him depart, and rebuked him, crying: 'Dost thou fly, Far-Shooter, and yield the victory to Poseidon? For what then hast thou thy bow? Never let me hear thee boast again, as thou hast been wont to boast in the hall of thy father, that thou wouldst do battle with Poseidon!' No answer made Apollo; but the wife of Zeus spake to her in wrath, 'How thinkest thou, shameless one, to stand against me? No easy one am I for thee to match, for all that thou hast a bow, and that Zeus hath made thee a devouring lion for women to slay whom thou wilt. 'Tis better for thee to hunt deer upon the hills than to fight with them that are stronger than thou.' Then did Heré lay her left hand upon the hands of Artemis by the wrist, and with her right hand she took from her her arrows and her bows, and smote her with them about the ears as she turned away, smiling the while; and the arrows fell from the quiver. And the goddess fled, leaving her bow behind, even as a dove flieth from before a hawk to her hole among the rocks. Then spake Hermes to Latona: 'I will not fight with thee, O Latona! 'Tis a hard thing to strive with them that Zeus hath loved. Boast as thou wilt among the immortal gods that thou hast conquered me in battle.' So he spake; but Latona gathered together the bow and the arrows that had fallen this way and that way in the dust. And Artemis came to Olympus, to the hall of Zeus that is paved with bronze; and, weeping sore, she sat on her father's knee; and her veil was shaken about her with her sobbing. Then her father took her to him, and laughed, and said: 'Who, of the dwellers in heaven hath so dealt with thee, my child?' And Artemis said: 'It was Heré, my father, that smote me—Heré, that always maketh strife and quarrel among the immortal gods.'"

That could not have been given with more effect, unless, indeed, by continuing the story a little further, instead of ending so abruptly with the complaint of Artemis against Heré—in her complaint against whom, by the way, Homer does not exactly attribute to her the statement that Heré "maketh" strife and quarrel, but only that it has been the decree of fate that from Heré the strifes and quarrels of the Immortals shall proceed,—and this partly explains the perfect frankness with which Artemis lays the blame on the Queen of Olympus. We wish Mr. Church had added the short sequel in which Homer relates simply how the one party of divinities went back to Olympus in great dudgeon at their discomfiture, and the other exultant at their feats of arms. It would have put a more natural conclusion to this most naïf passage in the story of the Homeric mythology. For the tale of Periander of Corinth we think Mr. Church might have substituted some more characteristic legend from Herodotus. But the story of Polycrates of Samos, with which the volume concludes, is one of the most effective of the Herodotean tales.

On the whole, we have not had any more attractive volume from Mr. Church; and we sincerely hope that the enterprise of his publishers in bringing out a little volume so perfect in shape, at so low a price, may be rewarded by the large sale which it seems to us to deserve.

THE NEGRO IN AMERICA.*

It must be admitted that these volumes are calculated to appal even a reader who is genuinely interested in the subject of which they treat. Eleven hundred large-octavo pages are not a trifle, and when a very cursory examination shows that these pages bristle with lists of names, tables of statistics, and official documents, the ardour of the enthusiastic student cannot but be somewhat damped at the very outset of his task. Unfortunately this first impression, this foretaste of weariness, does not pass away, but is rather intensified by the laborious perusal of this bulky work. The author, Mr. George W. Williams, is, in some respects, eminently fitted, but in others as eminently unfitted for the labour he has undertaken. He is himself a Negro of the finest physical type, as can be perceived from an attractive portrait which serves as a frontispiece to the first volume; and the description of him on the title-page as "first coloured Member of the Ohio Legislature, and late Judge-Advocate of the Grand Army of the Republic of Ohio," is a sufficient testimony to his mental capacity. His subject, it is needless to say, is one which he has treated not perfunctorily, but con amore, and every page bears witness to the industrious thoroughness of his research; but he is altogether wanting in the purely artistic and literary instincts, in the power to arrange facts coherently and to describe them effectively; the consequence being that what he has produced is not, in the strict sense of the word, a history at all, but a mass of raw material which, though it may be of inestimable service to the historian of the future, will leave little but weariness and vexation of spirit with the reader of the present.

In the space at our command we can only touch upon one or two salient points, and we may at once dismiss as mere surplusage the whole of the first eleven chapters of "Preliminary Considerations." These considerations deal with such subjects as the unity of mankind, primitive Negro civilisation, the Negro kingdoms of Africa, the Ashantee empire, and the like, which, though having an interest of their own, do not seem to deserve so large a share as 114 pages in a work which professes to deal only with the Negro in America. The history proper begins with the second part, which deals with "Slavery in the Colonies;" and here Mr. Williams makes the mistake—quite fatal to effective treatment—of telling separately the story of the growth of slavery in Virginia, in New York, in Connecticut, and so on, instead of surveying the Colonies as a whole, and giving a broad and readily realisable picture of the growth of the "domestic institution" during the colonial period. The various records have so much more of what is common to all than of what is peculiar to any, that the history would have been both more interesting and more intelligible had its divisions been chronological rather than topographical, and the author would still have been free to vary the locality of his centre of interest with the course of events. It was not necessary to devote a chapter to New York in order to tell fully the story of the pretended Negro plot of 1741, or to Massachusetts to justify a sketch of the Negro poetess Phillis Wheatley; for these things would have found their place in a continuous narrative, and the plan adopted seems to combine the maximum of confusion with the minimum of advantage. Perhaps the best, if not the only argument for Mr. Williams's method, is that by mere force of reiteration the less-informed reader is impressed by the strong hold which slavery had taken of the Colonies long before the War of Independence, and by the large share of responsibility to be laid at the door of the Home Government for forcing the institution upon communities which, if not absolutely opposed to it, were anything but unanimous in their approval.

How thoroughly the feeling that the slaves were a separate caste, with interests apart from those of their masters, had become established at the time of the outbreak of the Revolution, is proved by the reluctance of Washington, and many of his friends—a reluctance only overcome when perseverance in it would have been fatal—to authorise the employment of Negro soldiers in the Revolutionary Army. The step would certainly never have been taken, had not the British General, Lord Dunmore, forced the hand of the Colonist leaders by his proclamation calling the Negroes to his standard. Only when Washington saw the formidable nature of the weapon which the enemy were appropriating did he consent to avail himself of it, and the result of his unwilling consent was, in all probability, nothing less than the success of his cause. Colonel Alexander Hamilton had declared of the Negroes, "their natural faculties are as good as ours," and, as Mr. Williams states, "the assertion was supported by their splendid behaviour on all the battle-fields of the Revolution. Endowed by nature with a poetic element, faithful to trusts, abiding in friendships, bound by the golden threads of attachment to places and persons, enthusiastic in personal endeavour, sentimental and chivalric, they made hardy and intrepid soldiers. The daring, boisterous enthusiasm with which they sprang to arms disarmed racial prejudice of its sting, and made friends of foes."

Logically, of course, the victory of the Colonists ought to have been the death-blow of American slavery. The necessary inferiority and subordination of the coloured race had been denied practically by the call to the Negroes to fight for their country, and had been exploded logically by the opening sentence of the great Declaration of Independence:—"We hold these truths to be self-evident,—that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain invaluable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." These words were not mere empty rhetoric, they fairly represented a large body of public opinion which was opposed to slavery, and which was prevalent not merely, or even prominently, in the North, but in many of the States which afterwards became strongholds of the slave-power. In 1778, two years after the Revolution, we read that "Virginia passed a law prohibiting the importation of slaves, and in 1782 repealed the law that confined the power of emancipating to the Legislature, only on account of meritorious conduct. Private emancipations became very numerous, and the sentiment in its favour pronounced." So rapid, however, was the deterioration of public sentiment, that in 1785, Washington, in a letter to La Fayette, stated that "petitions for the abolition of slavery, presented to the Virginia Legislature, could hardly obtain a hearing."

It is just at this point that a luminous narrative, tracing the various steps in the history of the consolidation of slavery in the United States, would be so valuable; but in place of this, we have little more than an undigested collection of documents, statistics, and reports of debates, out of which the reader is left to manufacture history for himself. Still, one thing is made obvious,—that the main factors in the movement were political, rather than social; that slave property was attractive less as a domestic institution than as a political engine; and that it was to the jealousy of some of the weaker Slave States, rather than to the greed of individual slaveholders, that the slave-power in the South owed its strength and coherence. Many even of those who defended the original Acts which made slavery part of the Constitution of the United States, regarded it as a thing destined soon to pass away; but the builders "built better than they knew," and the edifice they reared was destined to stand until overthrown by the shock of a second revolution.

The most interesting portion of Mr. Williams's work is that which deals with the rise and progress of the organised Anti-slavery agitation. Here we are allowed, in great measure, to leave mere names, figures, and documents, and to come into contact with men, women, and events; and the change is very refreshing. To Horace Greeley it seems to us that Mr. Williams is somewhat unfair. It was the idiosyncrasy, but certainly not the fault, of that distinguished journalist that he advocated abolition as a far-sighted politician, rather than as a fervid philanthropist. Slavery was a crime, but it was a blunder as well; and the man who exposed the blundering, was as useful and as praiseworthy as the man who denounced the criminality. The sketch of the noble William Lloyd Garrison is, it is needless to say, marred by no such defect of sympathy, and few narratives could well be more ethically inspiring than the record of Garrison's works of faith, and labours of love and hope. One thing concerning him that we did not know before we learn from this history,—that Garrison was not only a worker, a speaker, and a writer of strong, incisive prose, but a poet as well; and we cannot forbear to reproduce a sonnet with which he concluded his memorable manifesto in the first number of the Liberator, and which, if it did not end weakly, would be almost Miltonic in weight and dignity of emotion and expression:—

"Oppression! I have seen thee face to face,
And met thy cruel eye and cloudy brow;
But thy soul-withering glance I fear not now—
For dread to prouder feelings doth give place
Of deep abhorrence! Scorning the disgrace
Of slavish knees that at thy footstool bow,
I also kneel—but with far other vow
Do hail thee and thy herd of hirelings base.
I swear, while life-blood warms my throbbing veins,
Still to oppose and thwart with heart and hand
Thy brutalising sway, till Afric's chains
Are burst, and Freedom rules the rescued land,
Trampling Oppression and his iron rod;
Such is the vow I take, so help me, God."*

Not less interesting than the story of the Abolitionist agitators is the record of the labours of those who, in the face of obloquy, insult, and not unfrequently of actual violence, endeavoured, by emancipating the minds of their coloured neighbours from the thralldom of a debasing ignorance, to prepare them for a larger and more absolute enfranchisement. Few more thrilling narratives of the kind have ever been told than that of which the heroine was the young Quaker lady, Prudence Crandall, who, in the Free State of Connecticut, was consigned to a cell just vacated by an executed murderer for the offence of setting up a school for Negro girls. The pages devoted to her and her fellow-labourers are very fascinating, and if the whole work were equally readable, it would be a pleasanter task to review it. Unfortunately, it is not so, and in many important matters this book is as defective in matter as it is infelicitous in manner. For example, the information concerning the so-called "underground railroad," about which there must be so much of interest to be told, is of the scrappiest and most fragmentary character; and, still worse, the growth and history of the great Free-Soil party are all but entirely ignored. It will hardly be believed that in such a work as this there is only one brief passing allusion, certain to be overlooked, save by a careful reader, to this memorable political body, which, by pledging itself to the restriction of the area of slavery, would in the natural course of events have achieved its extinction; and which, by its success in the election which sent Abraham Lincoln to the White House, brought about a sudden and unanticipated triumph for the cause for which the Abolitionists had long been labouring. We regret to see that Mr. Williams's treatment of the great President is as chilly, as unsympathetic, and, we may add, as unintelligent as his treatment of Horace Greeley. We have often had to expound to Englishmen the absurdity and injustice of bringing it as an accusation against

* In Mr. Williams's version of this sonnet, the third line begins with the word "By," but this is so obvious a misprint, that we have substituted the reading given above, which is clearly the original one.

President Lincoln that he declared his main object to be the maintenance of the Union rather than the abolition of slavery; but we did not suppose we should ever have to expound it to an American and a Negro. Abolitionism, as such, had no locus standi in the programme of a constitutional President, because the "domestic institution" was constitutionally recognised in the States where it existed, and so long as they remained within the pale of the Constitution it could not be legally disturbed. The Emancipation Proclamation was in itself simply an act of war, and might as such have been made even by a President who had no anti-slavery convictions; but every one knows that Lincoln was the representative of the anti-slavery feeling of the nation, and that even had there been no war, the certain outcome of his restrictive policy would have been the speedy strangulation of the slave-power. No one knew this better than the authors of those Secession Ordinances which declared that Secession found its justification in the election of Lincoln. Mr. Williams, on the contrary, says,—“So the issues were joined in war. The South aggressively, offensively sought the extension and perpetuation of slavery. The North passively, defensively stood ready to protect her free territory, but not to interfere with slavery.” It is hard to speak with becoming patience of writing like this. The protection of the free territory was in itself an interference with slavery of a decisive kind, being nothing less than the reading of its death-doom; and to say of some Oriental despot that he deprived a wretched victim of food and drink, light and air, but did not interfere with his life, would not be one whit more nonsensical than the extraordinary distinction drawn by Mr. Williams in his last sentence.

We have said our say. The History of the Negro Race in America is not a good history, it is, in fact, as bad a history as we have ever read; but the subject is an interesting one, of which comparatively little is known on this side of the Atlantic, and, as we have said already, the store of materials which Mr. Williams has collected can hardly fail to be of invaluable service to some better-equipped successor.

CECIL LAWSON.*

THIS is a very gorgeous édition de luxe, of a very simple, short memoir, by Mr. Edmund Gosse. We confess that we think the matter somewhat slender to have been expanded to the limits of a folio volume, to have been bound in white vellum and gold, to have such gigantic illustrations,—to have, in short, all the surroundings of an important treatise.

Before mentioning the way in which the subject of the biography is treated, let us say a few words upon the illustrations, which probably formed its chief raison d'être. The first is a large, bold, and singularly coarse etching of Mr. Lawson, by his friend Mr. Herkomer, and has been executed from the latter artist's portrait of the deceased painter. As a likeness, it is, we should say, fairly accurate, but as a work of art, simply detestable; and as for the half-naked female, with her few clothes tumbling off her, and a veil over her face, as if in shame for the state in which she has been drawn, we can only say that she is as unlovely as she is uncalled for, and what on earth her meaning can be in the corner of the plate in which she is etched, above the portrait, we are perfectly at a loss to understand. Mr. Herkomer's ability is, when he chooses to exert it, very considerable, but in the present instance he has certainly done little justice either to himself or his subject; and the same may be said of the other etching which he contributes to this book, a reproduction of Mr. Lawson's picture of "The Hop-gardens of England."

The other etching is from an unfinished picture (also by Mr. Lawson) of "The Swan and the Iris," and is by Mr. Whistler. The subject is very slight, and the etching is slighter, but represents the spirit of the original with sufficient accuracy. The remaining illustrations are chiefly woodcuts from Lawson's earlier work, and there are also two facsimiles, one of a pen-and-ink, the other of a crayon drawing. Let us now consider Mr. Gosse's memoir of the painter.

In some ways this is one of the books which are apt to irritate more than they please. The uniformity of admiration and panegyric which seems to be necessary, in a memoir which is published directly after an artist's death, by a personal friend, is apt to exhaust, even if it does not disgust a reader's powers of admiration. But perhaps in the case of Mr. Lawson, it was well that such a work should be undertaken, and undertaken by one who had known him well. For this artist seems to have been one of those who was known to few, and who habitually concealed from the world his real nature. We doubt even after reading this account of his life, whether Mr. Gosse really understood the character of his friend; for the account he gives, though evidently sincere, and founded upon intimate acquaintance, is a little confused and perplexing.

A few facts, however, stand out plainly from the pleasant generalities of the writer, and we understand, after reading this account of Mr. Lawson's life and painting, that he was one of those men who probably could never have been generally popular, or generally successful. Art was to him not only a pursuit, but a passion, and he sought in it not so much a definite expression of any facts of Nature or life, as an embodiment of those undefined, perhaps undefinable feelings, which have troubled the minds of poets, and men of a poetic temperament since the world began. It may be doubted whether the life which closed so early (for Mr. Lawson was but thirty when he died) would have produced richer or better fruit, had its way been as smooth as it was stormy. It is at least some confirmation of this view, that the artist's best painting was done in a year of, and under the stress of, comparative failure; he painted better when the Academy rejected, than when the Grosvenor Gallery applauded him. There is another cause, though one intimately connected with this one, which was responsible for much of the shortcomings of his work. He had never received the technical training of a painter, had never learnt what he could do, and what he could not. In all his pictures, we find a confusion between means and end; they seem to be attempting to cover a greater amount of ground than the artist's powers quite enabled him to manage. They are, with rare exception, rather magnificent attempts than complete successes.

Mr. Gosse tells us a few interesting details of Mr. Lawson's early life. The artist was the fifth son of a little-known portrait-painter, and was born at Wellington in 1851. He began painting when he was four, and at that time copied one of Clarkson Stanfield's pictures in oils; at six, he began to paint the portrait of a lady who lived next door; and at ten, on being reprimanded by the mistress of a dame-school which he attended, for some childish blunder, astounded her by leaving the school, and returning with a canvas bigger than himself, to ask her whether a boy who could paint like that did not deserve to have more respect shown to him?

Mr. Gosse tells us, too, of his admiration and friendship for Fred. Walker and George Pinwell, and of the many studies of fruit and flower which he executed while quite a lad. He seemed to have sold these to the dealers at a very early age; "at fourteen he was a professional painter." The remainder of his life is a record of comparative failure, interrupted by two bursts of popularity. The first of these occurred in the summer of 1871, when he exhibited the "Summer Evening in Cheyne Walk" and "The River in Rain," two pictures which expressed with almost equal power the pleasant and the dreary side of our great national river. Again, in 1878, after having for several years had his large pictures rejected or skied at the Royal Academy, he rose at once into universal popularity at the exhibition of the Grosvenor Gallery, where two of the largest and, on the whole, best of his paintings were exhibited in places of honour.

The subsequent history of his life, is that of a man who was not made for success, and whom success, to some extent, unnerved and distracted. He cannot be said to have then begun to do unequal work, for his painting had always been of a fitful and uncertain quality; but he certainly did then begin to play tricks with his powers, and to rely upon his inner consciousness for the materials of his art. Though this latter period was one of decadence with the man, for the artist it was perhaps one of exaltation. For there had commonly been lacking from his earlier and completer paintings, the emotional power which appeared in such intensity in some of the dark landscapes of this later period; it is true that they surrendered many qualities of colour and defined form, but they gained in power and concentration of meaning, to a more than compensating extent. The strange part of the matter is, that when he was going up-hill, the painter felt little and did much; and when he was going down-hill, he felt much and did little. This is not the place nor the time to attempt any adequate description of his genius; indeed, we have perhaps even now said too much to be in keeping with the feeling of bereavement, which those who knew him have recently experienced. But it may be said in conclusion, that whatever were the defects of his art, they were those of a peculiarly generous and noble character, and arose from a genius which, like the English nation, "never knew when it was beaten," and which only regarded success as a stepping-stone to higher achievements. Of such temper as Mr. Lawson's are the men who do yeoman's service to Art, and who, by their failures as well as by their successes, help to swell the stream of noble feeling and thought which keep alive the beauty of the world.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The third number of the Scottish Review is marked by strength and solidity, and what, for want of a better word, we may call "Scotchness." These are especially the characteristics of two excellent papers, on "Early Scottish Burghs" and "Archæology in the South-West of Scotland," which are evidently the productions of men who are familiar with their subjects. There are good things in two moderate articles, on "Educational Endowments and Secondary Education" and "The Future of the Highlands," though they strike us as rather thin and hesitating. The most vigorous as well as the best written paper, however, is one on Lord Macaulay, which is really a very good piece of special pleading against Mr. Cotter Morison. The "husband's case" is very well stated in "Mrs. Carlyle's Letters," and we are glad to see Agnosticism treated by a thoughtful Scotchman, who has no weakness for pulpitering. A word of cordial praise is due to the "Summaries of Foreign Reviews;" in regard to these the Scottish Review sets an example that older magazines would do well to follow. By the way, why does not the Review give us some indication of the view taken by reflective men North of the Tweed of the "Home-rule" movement there, which might help English politicians in coming to a decision upon a question in respect of which their sympathy with Scotchmen is greater than their knowledge of Scotch wants?

POETRY.—Serapion, and other Poems. By Justin H. McCarthy. (Chatto and Windus.)—Mr. Justin H. McCarthy is an addition, and, we willingly own, a considerable addition, to the ranks of the "Pagans." The principal poem deals with an episode in the last struggle of the ancient faith against Christianity; and the poet leaves little doubt which way his own sympathies incline. His Christians are a set of howling fanatics, whose asceticism, the only notable quality which they possess, is found to be but of a doubtful value against temptations of the flesh. The Pagans are not, indeed, transcendently better. Porphyrius, the young Athenian, whose renunciation of a promising career when he hears of the death of Julian, is meant to indicate a noble character, is certainly more inclined to the philosophy of the Garden than of the Porch. He falls passionately in love with Lalage, a shamelessly venal beauty, and expresses his faith and his philosophy of life in these words:—

"Because we know no better way than this
To brighten with all beauty our brief life;
And if some girl of Aphrodite's mould,
With tender hair and eyes that shame the stars,
And fair limbs fashioned for a god's desire,
Gladden our sight and set our hearts afire:
Why, I should hold him basest of the base
Who'd lay against the kisses of her lips
The Empery of Cæsar. All things die,
And glory lasts a day, and proud names perish;
Bright youth goes out too soon, but ere it flies
Seize with warm hands the blossom flower of love,
And for one kiss of hers, one hour's embrace,
Lose the world lightly."

We are glad, however, to find him risen to something higher in the last scene of the drama:—

"I am resolved;
I have no portion here: I cannot trade
The Galilean triumph, so farewell!
I am not to be pitted that have seen
The greatest, noblest soul on earth, the last
Made in the antique fashion, and have loved
Earth's fairest woman; and believe me, lady,
That to the latest second of my life
Your beauty shall be by me, and your eyes Shine on me in my loneliness. Farewell!"

It may not be fair, however, to judge a writer by a drama, in which he may possibly be found to give prominence to sentiments that are not his own. We must look, therefore, at what Mr. McCarthy says in his own character. "The Gods of Hellas" may be taken as the expression of a sentimental regret, which must not be too strictly interpreted; but what are we to think of a sonnet to "An Angel by Cimabue," which tells us in melodious verse—and Mr. McCarthy's verse is always melodious—that an angel "at the right elbow of Madonna's chair" should by right have played its part "with those that worshipped Venus long ago"? We hope that Mr. McCarthy will eschew these follies and rebellions of youth. If he will, he may as well, for we have seldom seen of late years a volume showing more command of poetical gifts. Here is a sonnet fashioned with uncommon skill:—

"A GARLAND.
For you, how many a posy have I tied
Of blood-red poppies that must fade too soon,

Pale lilies with the magic of the moon
In their white petals, the imperial pride
Of starred narcissus, violets purple-eyed,
Sad hyacinthus with its written rune,
All-coloured roses the delight of June,
Anemones with blood of Adon dyed!
For all these flowers the self-same tale repeat,
Learn to be wise, and let no flower of spring
Go by unheeded for its odour sweet;
For soon chill age and conquering time defeat
Love, youth, and beauty, even as they fling
A ruin of marred blossoms at your feet."

"Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," has seldom been better expressed; but is there anything much worse to be said?—Poems in Many Lands. By Rennell Rodd. (David Bogue.)—Mr. Rodd has republished here some of the poems which appeared for the first time in "Songs in the South." The whole are described in his preface as "early lyrics." As such, we do not hesitate to say that they show considerable promise. There is an unmistakable ring in the verse. It may or may not be developed into a really powerful music, the music that is full of thought, as well as of sound. Meanwhile, it is there, and is quite sufficient to raise this volume considerably above the average of contemporary verse. "The Sea-king's Grave" has something of the wild power which befits its subject. "The Song of the Dead Child" touches, with not less power, the note of pathos. But the chief distinction of the poems is that they really answer the description of their title. They represent many moods, and are instinct with the inspiration of many scenes. There is probably a hindrance in these varied experiences of travel to the attainment of the first rank, for they are apt to dissipate the energy, but to a man of culture and poetical faculty they give the motive and the occasion which are often wanting to those who would write verse. There is something fine in the expression of the following:—

"AT TIBER MOUTH.

The low plains stretch to the west with a glimmer of rustling woods,
Where the waves of a golden river wind home by the marshy meads;
And the fresh wind born of the sea grows faint with a sickly breath,
As it stays in the fretting rushes and blows on the dew of death.
We came to the silent city, in the glare of the noonday heat,
When the sound of a whisper rang through the length of the lonely street;
No tree in the clefted ruin, no echo of song nor sound,
But the dust of a world forgotten lay under the barren ground.
There are shrines under these green hillocks to the beautiful gods that sleep
Where they prayed in the stormy season for lives gone out on the deep;
And here in the grave street sculptured, old record of loves and tears,
By the dust of the nameless slave, forgotten a thousand years,
Not ever again at even shall ship sail in on the breeze,
Where the hulls of their gilded galleys came home from a hundred seas,
For the marsh plants grow in her haven, the marsh birds breed in her bay,
And a mile to the shoreless westward the water has passed away."

And there is something felicitous in the Horatian adaptation of the following:—

"AT LANUVIUM.

"Festo quid potius die Neptuni faciam."
—HORACE, Odes, iii., 23.

Spring grew to perfect summer in one day,
And we lay there among the vines, to gaze

And on our ears there seemed to rise and fall
The burden of an old-world song we knew,
That sang, "To-day is Neptune's festival,
And we, what shall we do?"

Go down, brown-armed Campagna maid of mine,
And bring again the earthen jar that lies
With three years' dust above the mellow wine;
And while the swift day dies

You first shall sing a song of waters blue,
Paphos and Onides in the summer seas,
And one who guides her swan-drawn chariot through
The white-shored Cyclades;

And I will take the second turn of song,
O' floating tresses in the foam and surge
Where Nereid maids about the sea-god throng;
And night shall have her dirge."

—A Year of Life, &c. By John Cameron Grant. (Longmans.)

—Mr. Grant touches on most things in the principal poem of his volume. He speaks of philosophy, theology, questions social and literary, and, in fact, quidquid agunt, and, for the matter of that, quidquid cogitant, homines. In one stanza, for instance, he delivers his judgment on the "Permanent Settlement" of Lord Cornwallis, which he calls "a wretched feudal lie, that could not live;" in two others, which we may quote as good specimens of his manner, he characterises trees of the wood and garden,—

"There, glowing, stood the glorious copper-beech,
Like a brown beauty blushing thro' her skin
Of warmer colour than the blood within Allows the blonde; and there the flowering peach;
The yellow-green laburnum drooped; and each Strong Scotch fir stretched its arms aloft to win
Some boon from Heaven; in silver, straight and thin,
The graceful hirsch, that, stooping down, did reach
Her lady fingers out to all to kiss;
The walnut, with large leaves and lordly head;
The ebon-budded weeping ash; and his
Wide-branching arms, the oak of lordly spread;
The aspen, saddest of all trees, that is;
The autumn chestnut burning into red.

There, too, the dear holm-oak, my favourite tree,
Of silvery under-leaf and light and shade,
With dreams of many a story, many a maid;
Magician of the woods, that back to me
Brings many a legend, that of old, may be,
Was acted, ere the garden-world was laid
Or bound with brick and mortar: there the staid,
Stiff poplar shoots up like a lance to free
Some dame that sits beyond the silver cloud
Waiting her knight; and that quaint character,

The anacorian, with his prickly crowd
On every branch, whence ape and man defer
Their climbing for another; and the proud,
Broad cedar, king of every conifer.

But the most remarkable thing about Mr. Grant is his metre. Here is a poem of as many stanzas as there are days in the year, and each stanza is a sonnet. Was ever such a thing done in the world before? Three hundred and sixty-five sonnets! A man who gave up his life to sonnet-writing could not hope to do more. It would, indeed, have been better for Mr. Grant, if he had not attempted to do so much. There is something in the verses we have quoted, but there are also obvious feeblenesses, which sadly mar the reader's pleasure. But it is not hard to understand how this comes to pass, when we come to read Mr. Grant's own account of how he produced one of the other poems included in the volume. "It was written one winter's morning, and I knee-deep in snow, out among the deer and rabbits." When we turn to it, we find it contains one hundred and sixty-eight verses. And this was done "in a winter's morning"! At this rate, the Æneid might have been written in a couple of months. But Virgil was not less than ten years over his great epic, and was so dissatisfied at the end, that he wished to have it burnt.

Cambridge Scholarships and Examinations. By Robert Potts. (Longmans.)—Mr. Potts gives here an account of the scholarships, exhibitions, prizes, and other "aids and encouragements" for learning in the University and Colleges of Cambridge. Apart from the special interest which this possesses for all who are likely to receive any benefit from these endowments, it is in itself noteworthy. We must not forget that there are private persons, if not here, yet certainly in the United States, who have incomes larger than that of the University and the Colleges put together. Still, the wealth here catalogued is very large, if you compare it with the resources of similar institutions elsewhere. And the portion of this wealth devoted to the helping of students is not only considerable, but continually increasing. It has risen, for instance, at St. John's College, from £3,907 in 1852 to £6,700 in 1881. Mr. Potts adds a copious collection, extending to upwards of five hundred pages, of examination-papers set at various colleges, and dealing with classics, mathematics, science, and law.

North America. Edited and enlarged by Professor F. V. Hayden and Professor A. R. C. Selwyn, F.R.S. (E. Stanford.)—It is stated in the preface that this volume is, in common with the excellent series to which it belongs, primarily based upon Mr. Keane's translation of Von Hellwald's "Die Erde und ihre Völker;" but the alterations made, the fresh matter added, and the numerous maps and illustrations with which it is furnished make it equal to a new or original work, and add to its usefulness and value.

To insure insertion, Advertisements should reach the Publishing Office not later than 12 a.m. on Friday.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THERE is a panic in Egypt. The cholera has appeared in Damietta, and according to the most favourable accounts eighty deaths occurred in three days, in a population of 30,000. Less favourable statements raise the mortality to 113 a day, and report the number of other deaths as unusually high. The disease has also appeared in Mansourah, Tantah, and Port Said, but it has not yet been acknowledged in Cairo or Alexandria. The accounts presage a regular visitation, and the result has been the usual explosion of cowardice. Nothing can convince Continentals that cholera, though highly epidemic, is not contagious,—for instance, doctors rub their patients without catching it,—and the residents are flying the country in crowds. Damietta is surrounded by troops, who drive back all who attempt to escape; but so great is the general flight that the orders from Egypt to sell Stock have affected every European Bourse, and on Tuesday and Wednesday caused a general fall of one and a half per cent. in Eastern Stocks. The French Press fiercely denounces the greedy selfishness of English commerce, which, rather than bear quarantine, has brought the disease from Bombay, and the relaxation of the absurd quarantine laws for which Lord Granville has been contending has been indefinitely postponed. It is even suggested that the organisation of Egypt may be broken up for want of officers, and that an outbreak among the British troops may cause their withdrawal. These, of course, are panic-struck opinions, but the interruption to business and to affairs will be considerable.

The ex-Khedive Ismail has been interviewed by the Times Correspondent, and has given his opinion on Egyptian affairs with his usual shrewdness. He admits that the English possess Egypt, and must retain it, but maintains that the easiest method of governing it will be through the Egyptians themselves, or rather through native functionaries, "who will be governed by the enlightened views of the English." If they are employed, and share the advantages as well as burdens of government, they will not be humiliated, and administration will be easy. The new protectors can introduce reforms which no Khedive could attempt without foreign remonstrances, and will have "a peaceful rule." A foreigner visibly at the head of the Government would outrage religious feeling, and an Armenian would not be respected. As to Tewfik, he will probably intrigue against his protectors, being a weak man "who, if he does not conspire himself, will be delighted to know others are conspiring." As to the Suez Canal, it belongs to Egypt, and if a second one is cut, that will belong to Egypt also. As England rules Egypt she rules the Canal, and "in discussing its nationality, she only weakens her own case." A special position is accorded, by European respect, to M. de Lesseps, but when he passes away, the "factitious French character" of the Canal will disappear too. Ismail has brains.

After some hesitation on the part of Lord Dalhousie, who was probably influenced by weighty advisers outside the House of Lords, the Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill was so altered as to render such marriages legal in any Dissenting or Roman Catholic church, where a Registrar is bound to attend in Great Britain, and in any Roman Catholic chapel in Ireland,—where a Registrar is not bound to attend,—but was never to be legal in any Anglican Church. In other words, the Canon law would prevail in the Anglican Church, and no Anglican clergyman, whether approving or disapproving of such marriages himself, would be permitted by the proposed change in the laws of the realm to marry a man to his wife's sister. The effect of this would have been to turn Anglicans who determined on such marriages into either temporary Secularists, or temporary Dissenters, or temporary Roman Catholics; and we hope that the House of Commons would never permit so needless an outrage on Anglican feelings.

The Bishop of Peterborough on Tuesday consecrated the extended and restored Church of All Saints', Narborough, and in doing so referred incidentally to the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, saying that the Clergy should imitate the example of John the Baptist, whose festival they had just been celebrating, and say boldly, "It is not lawful for thee to have her." We suppose that St. John the Baptist, in denouncing Herod's marriage, was speaking of what he held to be forbidden by divine law. The Bishop of Peterborough has, we believe, admitted that in the case of marriage with a deceased wife's sister, revelation proper contains nothing explicit on the subject, so we conclude that his denunciation of these marriages rests either on a Canon law for which dispensations have been frequently granted by the Church which established that law, or on private judgment. In either case, he is not taking up very solid ground for his prophetic denunciations. In a subsequent speech, the Bishop was very indignant with those censors who had described the silence of the Bishops in the House of Lords on the second reading of the Bill as unfaithfulness to the Church. It was due solely, he said, to the anxiety of the Bishops to negative the Bill, since they might have lost votes by prolonged debate. Perhaps so; indeed, that, we have no doubt, was the conscious motive. But Bishops certainly do like excuses for not taking a very pronounced attitude on public affairs, and for lingering, like violets, in the shade,—though we would not exactly accuse Dr. Magee of being a violet that seeks the shade.

The Lords have changed their minds once more. The second reading of the Bill legalising Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, was carried by a vote of 165 against 158. The third reading of the same Bill was rejected on Thursday night by a vote of 145 against 140, so that the friends of the Bill were fewer by twenty-five, while its foes were fewer by eighteen. The debate was not a remarkable one, unless the speech of Bishop Temple against the Bill may be called remarkable. The Duke of Marlborough insisted strongly on the argument that the Bill, if carried, would put in the strongest light the opposition between the law of the Church and the Law of the land,—the Church refusing altogether to sanction marriages which the Statute Law would allow,—and insisted that this conflict must lead soon to Disestablishment. We are not sure, however, that the refusal of the Church to permit, even among Dissenters, marriages which most Dissenters believe to be perfectly right, may not lead rather more directly to Disestablishment. Bishop Temple insisted on the grave danger of unsettling the principle of our marriage law, without having any new principle to put in its place;—and this would be a good argument, if the principle on which it now stands commanded general respect, which, however, it is clear that it does not. It is better surely to sanction—cautiously—exceptions on which the conscience of a community is clear, than to stand by an untenable principle against which, as a general principle, the conscience of the community is clear.

Lord Salisbury made a speech at the annual dinner of the Constitutional Union on Wednesday at St. James's Hall, which contained something more than the old criticisms on the parti-coloured character of the Liberalism of the century (in which, by the way, he forgets the still more remarkable patchwork of which the Conservatism of the century is made up). He announced it as a great law that you can never depend on the Conservatism of the extremely rich,—because they have so much, that they can afford to lose a good deal without missing it. You can only depend on the Conservatism of the moderately well-to-do, the people who would lose their all if the foundations of proprietary right were in any way unsettled. It is to those who have no margin, those to whom revolution would mean a great inroad on their habits and comforts, that Lord Salisbury trusts implicitly the safety of the Constitution. As for Lord Hartington, he is too rich to care. He might lose a great deal, and still find all he wanted well within his reach. That is a very neat theory of Lord Salisbury's, but, as we have elsewhere shown, it will hardly hold water.

Nor will Mr. Alfred Austin's, who spoke later, and who maintained that "the tendency of mature intellect is towards Conservatism," on the ground that Mr. Froude is a Conservative of the anti-Irish kind, and Matthew Arnold a Conservative of the anti-Dissenting kind. We do not exactly know why mild scorn for Philistinism should be called Conservative. So far as we remember Mr. Arnold's views on the regeneration of Ireland, they were Radical far beyond the Radicalism of Mr. Gladstone. The truth is that "mature intellect," tempered by fear, is Conservative; while "mature intellect," tempered by sympathy and hope, is Liberal. But the same probably may be said of immature intellect. The maturity of the intellect affects the clearness, the finish, the adequacy of the political creed; but does not affect its general direction.

Lord Spencer, who is travelling in Ireland, on the 27th inst. made an important speech at Limerick to the Agricultural Society. He said that the insecurity of the farmer had now disappeared, and that he saw signs of agricultural improvement in the West. Culture was still behind-hand, the peasantry, without sufficient stock, raising exhausting crops on impoverished soil, but still the beasts were better and slightly increased in number, there were more tiled houses, and the number of poultry, a stock raised by the smallest tenants, had increased two millions. The quality of the butter also had been improved, till the article which ten years ago fetched £96 a ton in London, now fetched £120. He urged strongly more attention to material improvement, as the only method by which the poverty of the West could be permanently relieved, but thought that, upon the whole, "we might again look forward with some hope to the future." These remarks appear to have been well received, and it is reported that the decrease of bitterness towards the Viceroy is marked throughout his tour. We fancy, however, that the bitterness has never been greatest among the agricultural population, who expend their hatred rather on local enemies and on the law, than upon the Government, which is slightly beyond their grasp.

Leo. XIII. has addressed a letter of twelve pages to M. Grévy personally, a sketch of which has been communicated to the Times Correspondent in Paris. The Pope comments on the legislation of the past three years, the expulsion of the Orders, the subjection of seminarists to the conscription, and the right assumed to suppress curates' salaries, and observes that all these measures are contrary to the spirit of the Concordat. His Holiness adverts, moreover, to the spirit shown in the discussions on the Concordat, especially in M. Paul Bert's report, and observes that he would be regarded as wanting to his duty if he were to pass over such events in silence. He prays the President, therefore, up to the limits of his power to discourage these attacks upon religion, and so diminish the probability of a rupture between the Papacy and France. The letter will, it is said, be answered in a temperate spirit, though M. Grévy is believed to be very anti-clerical, but it may be questioned if a rupture can long be avoided. The more popular a body in France is, the more violently is it opposed to religion, and the Municipality of Paris has only this week suppressed the chaplaincies of the great hospitals, and forbidden the entrance of priests, except when summoned by patients. The Papacy must take a stand at some point or other, and declare that the Government of France can no longer be recognised as Catholic.

The trial of Scharf and the other Hungarian Jews for the murder of a Christian girl at the Passover still continues, and the evidence gradually elicited discredits the prosecution, which appears to have been dictated by the worst kind of religious hatred. The evidence as to time has been disproved. It seems certain that the police threatened, and probable that they tortured, the most important witness, the boy Moritz; and it was proved that Peczei, the inferior magistrate who took his deposition, was a felon, condemned to twelve years' imprisonment for murder. A Police Commissioner also stated that the boy, in his presence, had retracted his whole evidence. The case is, therefore, breaking down; but the Court is evidently perplexed by the fierce excitement of the populace, who audibly threaten witnesses favourable to the Jews, and accuse them of being purchased by large bribes. It is as necessary to guard their lives as if they were Irish witnesses favourable to the Crown.

A telegram from Shanghai was received by the Chinese Legation in London on Thursday, denying that any settlement of the Tonquin difficulty had been arrived at. Li Hung Chang, the official entrusted with the negotiations with M. Tricou, had been so irritated by the Frenchman's rudeness, that he declined to meet him, and retired to Tientsin. "He sees no chance of falling into an accord with M. Tricou." This means, of course, that the Pekin Government has made up its mind that France must acknowledge Chinese suzerainty in Tonquin, which is the specific point M. Challemel-Lacour has decided not to concede. War, therefore, would be inevitable, but that it is known the French Cabinet is divided. M. Jules Ferry, supported by the President, and, it is believed by M. Waldeck-Rousseau, is strongly opposed to the war, and M. Challemel-Lacour threatens to retire. The struggle is not yet ended, but as the Chamber is distinctly against any war of moment outside Europe, we venture to predict that the concession required by China will be made, and that the expedition to Tonquin will be content with avenging M. Rivière. The vacillation of the Republican Government upon this subject has been deplorable.

Quite an excitement has arisen in America about pauper emigrants from Ireland. It is stated that two or three ships have recently landed emigrants from Irish poor-houses who are too feeble to work, who have no money, and who will be a burden upon the American ratepayers. The Emigration Commissioners of New York have accordingly ordered these persons to be taken back. Mr. Trevelyan, when questioned on the subject, replied that he knew of only five such families, all of whom were offered homes by their relatives, and landed with travelling-money in their pockets. The amounts given them are, however, exceedingly small, generally about a pound, and it is probable that, unknown to the Government, the Unions have shipped a few totally destitute persons. The practice must, of course, be stopped; but the fuss made about it is exaggerated, the Irish-Americans thinking the question will serve to put the two Governments at loggerheads. A moment's thought would show anybody that aged paupers or pauper children do not belong to the dangerous classes, and that the Government could have no interest in lightening the rates of one or two Irish unions by a few pounds. Its object is to reduce the congestion in the West of Ireland, which can only be done by helping poor tenants to emigrate, the paupers not being settled on the land.

Sir Henry James, with all his astuteness, is hardly a good manager of the Bills of which he has the charge. In the Grand Committee on Law he first disseminated the impression that he would report the conduct of particular obstructors to the House as a good reason for not proceeding with the Criminal Code Bill,—indeed, what he said in the House itself was equivalent to a charge against Mr. Warton for trying on one occasion to prevent the Committee from getting a quorum,—and then he dropped all such criticisms, and simply reported that the progress made with the Bill warranted no hope of finishing it this Session. Either Sir Henry James should not have threatened to report the conduct of special Members at all, or he should have persevered with it. The consequence, of course, was an angry wrangle at the last meeting of the Grand Committee on Law, and a general impression on the part of the public less favourable to the work of these Grand Committees than is justified by the facts. The result was that the Committee reported that, having dealt with only eight clauses, and the Bill containing 120 clauses, on which there were 390 proposed amendments, there was no prospect of passing the Bill through Committee this Session. The truth, no doubt, is, as Mr. Bryce indicated in his very excellent speech in the Committee, that this Bill was not a good subject for the work of a Grand Committee. First, it was drafted by a Commission, and not by the Government draftsman; and secondly, great alterations of principle, as distinct from codification of the existing law, were introduced into the Bill. Both these circumstances rendered it a very bad specimen Bill for the purpose of testing the powers of a Grand Committee.

Two Presidents of the Royal Society have died on successive days of this week,—Sir Edward Sabine, the aged Arctic explorer, and an eminent student of the phenomena of magnetism, on Tuesday; and Mr. William Spottiswoode, President of the Royal Society at the time of his death, in the full vigour of middle life, on Wednesday. Mr. Spottiswoode was best known as a great mathematician, and especially for his speculations on the possibility that to higher apprehensions than ours space may have more than three dimensions, indeed, any number of dimensions corresponding to the degrees of equations. Moreover, Mr. Spottiswoode had worked with great success at the phenomena of the polarisation of light, on which we believe that he had established new and original theories of his own. He was conspicuous, too, as an Oriental scholar, and as a patron of learning, a department in which his generous nature and large means enabled him to effect much. His modesty and gentleness were, at least, as remarkable as his abilities, and there are few circles, whether in Science, Art, or Learning, in which his presence will not be long and grievously missed. He died of typhoid fever, contracted, we believe, in Rome.

There is a remarkable letter from Rome in the Times of Tuesday, on the subject of the extraordinary fables told in the Roman Press, and thence transmitted to Ireland and elsewhere, on the subject of the Pope's attitude towards Ireland, towards the Irish Bishops, towards Mr. Errington, and towards the Propaganda itself. The number of these "Hiberno-Roman" fables, as the Roman correspondent calls them, is portentous, and a careful collation of these fables would clearly prove that either there are two distinct Mr. Erringtons, or else no Mr. Errington at all. The writer intimates that the Pope himself determined that the recent letter to the Irish Bishops should not on any account be put away in the pigeon-holes of those prelates, and so be deprived of all its effect; in other words, that the Pope himself took care that what was called the "indiscretion" of confiding that missive to the Press should be committed. Leo XIII. never uttered a brutum fulmen in his life, and when he has once decided on a course, though he never over-expresses what he means to say, he never fails to say it, and to say it effectually. The "Hiberno-Roman" fables may try to raise a mystification on the subject, but Leo XIII. is too much of a statesman to be easily foiled by the legends of the Roman and Hibernian Press.

Nothing is more remarkable in the recently-published "Acts of the Holy See relating to the affairs of Ireland," than the confidence which the Pope, as a statesman, expresses in the justice of the present Administration. In Leo XIII.'s letters, this confidence is expressly declared more than once. In the letter of January 3rd, 1881, the Pope declares, "We have confidence in the justice of those who rule the country, and whose great experience is generally tempered with judgment. Ireland will far more safely and easily obtain what she wants, if she will adopt only the means sanctioned by law, and avoid causes of offence." Again, in the letter of August 1st, 1882, the Pope says, "As we signified to you on another occasion, we are confident that the statesmen who preside over the administration of public affairs will give satisfaction to the Irish when they demand what is just. It is not only reason advises, but their well-known political prudence." Expressions of this kind used towards an Administration at the head of which stands the author of the treatise on "Vaticanism," show that Leo XIII. harbours no grudges, and is statesman at least as much as Pope.

The fighting between the two English parties, or rather the wings of the two parties, is now so bitter, that it is positively pleasant to find a Tory leader standing up to defend the Liberal Government. Colonel Stanley did this on Thursday. The old, endless question whether transport for the troops should always be kept in readiness was brought up as usual during the debate on the Army Estimates; but, as is not usual, a Tory Minister answered, to relieve a Liberal one. Colonel Stanley pointed out that Parliamentary governments had to think of cost, and the cost would be something enormous, for if we had not a complete transport, things would be worse than at present. "It was better to know you were not ready, than to think you were, when you were not." As to regimental transport, the proposal to keep it always with the regiment was impracticable, for till the destination has been settled the kind of transport wanted could not be settled either. The Transport Service could be and should be perfected, but the means of transport must be left to the occasion. That is only sense, and old sense, too; but, now-a-days, Tories will not even talk sense, if it relieves Liberals.

We regret to perceive that the project of sending Lord Reay to the Cape as Special Commissioner has been abandoned. Mr. Gladstone stated on Monday that he had been prepared to send the Commission, and to lay its instructions on the table, but that he had received a telegram announcing the intention of the Government of the Transvaal to send either their President or Vice-President to London. The Government had thought it expedient to accept that offer, and consequently the Commission would not be sent. It is, doubtless, easier to receive a Commission than to send one, because that course limits the subject of negotiations, the President of the Transvaal being able to speak only for his own State; but the Commissioner could have reported on the whole of South Africa, throughout which the quarrel between the white races is the first factor in politics. The Times' assertion that the Dutch of South Africa hate the Dutch of Europe more than they hate Englishmen, requires evidence. It is inconsistent with M. Joubert's language in Holland, and with the strong sympathy expressed by the Dutch with their brethren of the Transvaal. Spanish-Americans do not, however, love Spaniards, nor did our own American colonists love Englishmen.

The Standard's correspondent at Sierra Leone relates at great length and with full detail a shocking story. It had become necessary for the authorities in Sierra Leone to punish a chief named Gbow, for constant and cruel raids upon protected natives in the Sherbro territory. He was accordingly attacked on May 25th, in his principal stockade, by part of the 2nd West India Regiment, 200 of the constabulary, and 500 native allies. Gbow, who commanded 2,000 men, fought with desperate courage, but his negroes could not stand up against a rain of shells from the howitzers, and either broke or surrendered. Those who fled were followed by the Kossus—a friendly tribe, we presume—and slaughtered; while those who surrendered were taken to the captured town of Hahoon, and there murdered "in cold blood" by "our allies." Gbow's town, Jalliah, was set fire to after its capture, and razed to the ground, and it is believed the expedition will "have a most beneficial effect upon his mind." If this story is true, the business was infamous, and the commanding officer should be at once ordered to explain why he could not stop a hideous and senseless massacre. Even if the allies broke loose, he had force enough with him to quell a mutiny. No wonder Gbow's men fought bravely, if they were aware that after surrender they would be murdered in cold blood, and then mutilated.

James Carey, the informer, has left Kilmainham at last, after having greatly embarrassed the Government by a demand for police protection in Dublin. This was refused, as every day would have produced a separate riot, and he at last agreed to go either to London or a colony. It is a curious proof of the universal diffusion of Irishmen under the British flag, which they say they detest, but which they never leave except for the American, that Carey would be safe anywhere in the world except in a British colony. He might be comfortable enough in Norway, or the Argentine Republic, or Switzerland, as his income is considerable for his wants, but even in Heligoland some Irishman would find him out.

LEO XIII. AND FRANCE.

IT is to be regretted, in the interests of contemporary history, that the acts and words of Leo XIII. are not more carefully noted and recorded. He does not excite the imagination of Roman Catholics as Pius IX. somehow did, lacking, perhaps, a certain ray of originality, which lighted up his predecessor's character, and he is, therefore, not watched with the same assiduous care. He is coming, however, out of the mist, and as his figure grows more distinct, it will attract many observant eyes. A philosopher on a throne is always a rare sight, and no one quite like Leo XIII. has sat for centuries in the Papal Chair. Able Popes, and astute Popes, and Popes with a capacity for finesse there have been many—for, after all, the Popes are picked Italians—but this one gives the impression of being a wise Pope, who marches to his ends as a modern statesman of high character and serene thought would march. There is a moderation in his inflexibility, and a certain honest plainness in his denunciations which are not supposed to be usual among ecclesiastics. We once compared Pio Nono, with his fidelity to his Church, his belief in himself, and his vein of humorous originality, to a fine old English rector, who had always had his own way, who thought Dissenters rather impertinent, but who wished to be obeyed because he sincerely believed that obedience must of necessity be best for the parish. Leo XIII. is not like that at all. He is rather like a statesman of a type we occasionally see in all countries, in whom nature or circumstance has bred toleration, but whose advice is weighty because he intends the machine to move on, and who can, when needful, recommend grave acts. This Pope has been tried in four very grave affairs, the struggle with Germany, the struggle with the Czars in Poland, the struggle with Italy, and the struggle with the Irish Reds, and in all he has shown the same qualities,—inflexible devotion to his Church, a cool perception of all circumstances, and a patient wisdom—we do not quite mean wisdom—which in the end secured at least partial success. No man can have a more formidable opponent than Prince Bismarck, and the Chancellor has not come well out of that fight, nor can any one fairly say that the Pope has won by unworthy devices. The Czars in Poland are supported by irresistible force, but they have yielded in the contest about Bishops so completely that the Vatican is content. Nowhere is reverence for the Papacy weaker than in Rome, where each successive Pope lives under a microscope; and in Rome, in the municipal elections of last week, the Papalini swept everything before them. They seated two-thirds of all candidates. Nowhere among Catholics is the Papal authority so resisted as in Ireland, but the Pope has given a heavy blow to the Parnellites, which, though it has not dried up the subscription he denounced, has altered the tone not only of the clergy, but of mass meetings.

Now the Pope has turned to France, and very quietly, but quite unmistakably, has intimated, in a letter to President Grévy, that if the tone of the Government cannot be modified, the Papacy cannot keep on its old terms with France. The two Powers will, as in Germany and Russia, be openly at war. The letter to the President from the Pope, read in the Cabinet on Tuesday, and though not published allowed to ooze out, is understood, we think correctly, to mean this, though Leo XIII. carefully abstains from any menace. It was time for such a declaration. We do not know that the Assembly has yet passed any law to which the Roman Church cannot submit under protest, unless it be the one subjecting divinity students to the conscription; but the tone of recent legislation in France is so anti-Christian that a self-respecting Church is bound, at all events officially, to declare that it is submitting only to direct force. The recent laws on education go far beyond any possible definition of State neutrality in religious affairs. They amount to this,—that every teacher is tolerated except the Catholic priest, who is excluded with his emblems almost by name. The abolition of military chaplaincies, though not exactly persecution, is in a Catholic country pretty clear intimation that the State thinks Catholicism worthless; while the abolition of chaplaincies in hospitals goes even further. Unless the Cardinal-Archbishop Guibert has deliberately falsified the facts in his circular to the Curés of Paris, the Municipality, with the sanction of the Government, which has a legal veto on such votes, has not only abolished the chaplains—who were, of course, its own officers—but has closed the hospital chapels on week days—the Prefect opens them once a week—and prohibited the voluntary entry of any priest into the wards. He can enter only when summoned by a patient. Considering the importance attached by Catholics to the last offices, the immense extent of these hospitals, and the antagonism of most French doctors to the priesthood, this order goes far beyond “neutrality,” and amounts to direct persecution alike of the priesthood, who are inhibited from preaching even to willing hearers, and of any religious patients the hospitals may relieve. As the Cardinal-Archbishop puts it, the summons to the Curé may never be delivered, and even then he is distant, and often occupied with a parish containing 50,000 souls. If the Pope, under such circumstances, did not warn the Government that its tone was one of hostility, that the obvious meaning of the Concordat was not respected, and that serious consequences might follow, he would be gravely wanting, not only in self-respect, but in his duty to the Church, whose mouthpiece he claims to be. So would the Archbishop of Canterbury be under the same circumstances, and the Archbishop would not be under the spur of a system of theology which makes the intervention of the priesthood in the hour of death a necessity.

The letter will, it is said, be answered by the President with respect, but we question, strong as the motives are which bind both the Papacy and the Government of France to moderation, whether a rupture can ultimately be avoided. That the Pope will suffer long is true. He has repeatedly warned the French Episcopate to be moderate, and has recently selected a Nuncio whom he can trust to guide his rather hot-headed ecclesiastical team in that sense. He must, too, be keenly aware that in France he is not fighting, as in Germany and Russia, rulers of another creed; but men who sincerely disbelieve all creeds, who are full of a scientific Paganism, and who would, if provoked to fight, go strange lengths. They might suppress outward Christianity altogether. France is the only country which, in modern times, has been laid under an interdict by secular authority, and all Frenchmen still feel the effect of that long intermission of religious teaching. That might happen again, and no Pope would lightly run such a risk. Moreover, the disestablishment of the Church, which would be the first counter-blow struck by the Chamber, would in France have serious dangers of its own. The spread of materialism in some districts has been so great, and the reluctance of the peasantry to pay for anything not visible is so rooted, that, as the Bishops believe, large patches of the soil, possibly whole Departments, would be left without the offices of religion, and a generation would grow up to whom Church services would seem needless innovations on habit. That is a distinct danger, not to mention that an open contest would embitter the Atheistic propaganda which is so active in France—as it also begins to be in England—and compel the Church to a warfare of argument, at the very moment when it was struggling to retain its corporate existence. Rome, too, which has to think of the whole world, and not merely of the corner of it which to French and even English journalists seems to make up the universe, is anxious for French assistance at a hundred points, and were the French Government sincerely hostile, might see her converts abandoned in a hundred provinces, from Manchouria to Montenegro. Nevertheless, the Pope can hardly go on in apparent amity with a Power definitely anti-religious. If he does, he justifies the sarcasm that Rome is only inflexible to the weak. If he does, he weakens for a generation the coherence of his Church in France, which will undoubtedly be rent into two parties,—those who approve and those who disapprove the policy of submissiveness. And finally, if he does, he destroys his power of fighting in all lands, for he cannot excommunicate in Mexico, or Ireland, or Italy for acts which he visibly passes over in France without open reprehension. We conceive that in a very short time, if the temper of the majority does not change, the Pope will be compelled to withdraw his Nuncio, and thus announce to the whole world a rupture with France, which will undoubtedly impel the majority to extreme courses, including the suppression of the Ecclesiastical Budget. What will be the result of the contest it is difficult to foresee, for unless the Chamber goes revolutionary lengths the Papacy will not have its usual leverage, the absence of priests among a population which wishes for them. It must, according to its modern practice, supply the churches with priests, missionary or other, so long as the secular power will allow. But we should imagine that, as in all other cases, the believing section of the community would derive new energy from the insults cast upon their faith, that their antagonism to the Republic would become more definite, and that in no long time Republican statesmen would see the folly of wilfully exasperating such a force, and would seek a modus vivendi. They may be very fanatical, but they are not as fanatical as the Terrorists, and very energetic, but they are hardly more energetic than Napoleon or Prince Bismarck. The entire experiment has been tried before, under conditions very favourable to the anti-religious party, which, be it remembered, during the period of the suspension of services tied victory to its banners; and it ended in a victory for Rome, which can wait, if need be, for centuries. This, however, is a speculation as to the future. All we wish to point out to-day is that Leo XIII., the most moderate of Popes, finds it necessary to warn the Government of France that a contest with the Church is at hand; and that if it begins, the whole power of that Church, with its persistence and its hold over the common people, will be thrown decisively against the Republic.

THE BISHOPS AND THE DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

THE Lords are not high-minded and have no proud looks. They follow the Psalmist's admonition to refrain their souls, and keep them low, like a child that is weaned from its mother. To reverse their judgment on a matter of first-rate importance within a fortnight, is hardly a step to give new weight to the judgment of the House of Peers. Perhaps they were more influenced than they would like to admit by the Guardian's appeal to them to consider the tendency of the Bill to introduce a conflict between the law of the Church and the law of the State, which might end in Disestablishment. It is certain that the Duke of Marlborough put that argument in the front of the battle, and it is possible that this influenced some of the Conservative Peers who formerly supported the Bill, and induced them to stay away. If so, we congratulate our ecclesiastical contemporary on the generalship which—like an hour of inspiration from Wallace or Bruce—has so soon turned Flodden into Bannockburn. But the victory will be dearly bought, if it induces the Dissenters to see in the amiable deceased wife's sister, the lever with which they may disestablish the Church of England. They will be very apt at learning the lesson inculcated by the Guardian. And perhaps they may now bend all their energies first to obtain the legalising of these marriages in the form most likely to excite the denunciations of the Church, and then to aggravate the conflict between the law of the Realm and the law of the Church which must ensue. They will remember that it is lawful to be taught by an enemy; and perhaps they may strike out a new and more effectual path towards the Disestablishment and Disendowment for which they wish.

For it is certain, we take it, that this Bill must pass into law, and must pass into law before very long. A measure which has so large a majority in the Commons, and which has once gained a majority in the Lords, can hardly be stayed for any considerable period. This last hasty act of aristocratic repentance will bring delay, but it will bring nothing more, unless it also causes an agitation in the provinces against giving the Bishops seats in the House of Lords. We may say, by the way, that that agitation could hardly be based on worse ground than the recent action of the Bishops in relation to this Bill. The case against the Bishops as Peers is that they take so puny a part in general legislation, and hardly dare to call their souls their own, even on a matter so germane to their special province as the proper mode of spending Sunday. But to denounce the Bishops for taking an active part in such a controversy as this, and for giving a vote according to their consciences, is altogether unfair. It is true, we do not think their vote a wise one; we do not think that it is a good thing, in the interests of religion, to forbid marriages on no good ground of expediency, to which apparently the conscience of the people is not generally opposed, and which take place, therefore, or else ought to take place, in spite of the legal prohibition. But no fair-minded man can deny that there is something to be said on the other side, and that the Bishops have said it, and said it with a good deal of earnestness. They are members of the House of Peers expressly that they may say what they think on subjects of this kind, and it is, to our minds, a very great set-off against the reasons which would make it desirable to exclude them from the House of Peers, that they have exerted themselves actively on the subject of this Bill, and have shown a certain unanimity in their judgment on it. That judgment may be wrong,—and we believe that it is wrong,—but we do not place the Bishops in the House of Peers to increase the chance of getting right judgments, but rather to secure a certain amount of representation in that House to the Clergy of the Church of England; and that in this case they have really represented the view of the Clergy of the Church of England, there can, we conceive, be no doubt. We are always ready to be candid friends to the Bishops, when it is needful. But on this occasion candour compels us to say that if the Bishops had spoken their mind more fully, we should have thought them entirely within their right, and that by the part they have taken in resisting the Bill they have done something, though not enough, to vindicate their position as representatives of the mind of the Clergy in the House of Lords. The argument against their position as Peers is that they represent so little of any mind at all in relation to nine out of every ten measures of the highest importance. That they have more or less effectually represented the mind of the Clergy on one such measure should go to their credit, and not to their debit, as Life Peers.

As to the main question, it seems to us that the Bishop of Exeter alone made a point of real importance. There is, undoubtedly, a great deal to be said against disturbing any fixed and intelligible principle on which the law of marriage is based, without putting some other even more fixed and more intelligible principle in its place. If the present law were but well observed, and not constantly broken by really serious-minded people,—if the present law did not lead to positive mischief of a very serious kind in the families of the poor,—we should have nothing to say for the legalising of a single kind of marriage which the present law forbids, without attempting to lay down a new ground of legality. We should reply to Bishop Temple simply by saying that piecemeal legislation is the best kind of legislation in cases where a specific grievance is clearly seen and widely felt, without its being clearly seen that there is any great principle on which it would be safe to base the law that would remedy that grievance. Undoubtedly, as Lord Kimberley said, a marriage law which rendered consanguinity the only ground of objection,—a marriage law which permitted a man to marry his step-mother or his step-daughter, and a woman to marry her step-father or step-son,—would create an amount of instinctive horror in the public mind which would be very dangerous, if only on the ground that a marriage law which permitted what the people at large think unnatural, must sink in the respect of the people. Doubtless, the relation of parent and child implies such a multitude of those associations which must banish all thoughts of marriage from any undepraved nature, that to permit marriage between step-parents and step-children would be positively degrading to the thoughts of the community, and might even lead to popular outbreaks against marriages which the law would allow. We are even disposed to think that, if the law sanctioned adoption as a legal step,—as we wish it did,—it ought to forbid marriages between an adopted parent and an adopted child, so entirely is that relation, even when only artificially taken up, one exclusive of the passions. Still, with this one exception, why should not all marriages of mere affinity be legalised, and those finer instincts which, as we quite admit, revolt against marriages between people who have once held to one another the position of even quasi-brother and sister, be trusted to hinder this kind of marriage from becoming frequent? What we really care for is to legitimate marriage in the poorer classes between people who are quite certain to form illicit connections if marriage is not permitted,—illicit connections which are the sources of all sorts of suffering and vice. Bishop Temple's argument almost goes as far as this, that the death of the husband or the wife ought not in any degree to alter the nature of the feelings with which the wife or the husband regards the family into which marriage has introduced them. We quite agree that it would be a very desirable thing, if it could be so. But then, as a matter of fact, every one knows that it is not so. When a poor man no longer has his wife to love, and when her sister is always doing for him those offices which his wife formerly did for him, it is simply impossible that, if they live under the same roof, his feelings for that wife's sister can remain year after year just the same as they were when his wife was alive. It is not human nature that they should remain unchanged, and, as a matter of fact, everybody knows that they do not. If, then, there is no substantial ground for insisting that these two should part the moment when any feeling not purely brotherly or sisterly springs up between them, it is of the highest moment to morality and religion that the change of feeling, if it comes and when it comes, should be allowed to seek the sanction of religion. That is the ground on which we regard the question as one of first-rate moral and religious importance, and we find Bishop Temple's speech utterly inadequate to break down that ground. For our own parts, we would rather see this single exception to the illegality of marriages of affinity within given degrees, legalised, than see no change in the law at all. But we should be quite willing to see all marriages of affinity legalised, except only marriages between step-parents and step-children, against which there would be a general feeling of public aversion, grounded, we believe, on the special inconsistency between the parental relation and any kind of passion.

LORD SALISBURY ON THE POLITICAL BIAS OF PROPERTY.

AT St. James's Hall on Wednesday, Lord Salisbury was very condescending to the middle and lower classes. It was they, he said, not the millionaires, not the great nobles, on whom you must rely for supporting the Constitution,—because it was they, and not the millionaires and not the great nobles, who had most to lose by any revolution which disturbed the solid basis of proprietary right. Men like Lord Hartington, he declared, can never be relied on to support the Constitution from self-interest. In the prodigality of their generosity, they can afford to throw away what would seem a great stake in the country, and yet have so much left as is enough to gratify every desire they are at all likely to form. It is the same, of course, with Lord Salisbury himself. If he is faithful to the principles of the Constitution, it is by a sort of happy accident that he is so, for he, too, could afford to lose a great deal, and yet never leave a serious want ungratified. It is not, therefore, he teaches us to think, on himself or on his order, but on the industrial classes, including in that term all who earn their own living, that the Conservative creed is enjoined by the great guarantee of self-interest. Those who, if they lost anything material by the unsettling of proprietary rights, would lose what they would keenly and constantly miss, are the persons to whom you must look to maintain proprietary rights with a severity commensurate with their interest in them. The splendid noble cannot be trusted; he may choose to stake much on his ambition or his whim, because, even after staking and losing much, he will find himself still in all essentials where he was before. But villadom and trade and manual labour will not venture what they dare not lose, and it concerns villadom and trade and manual labour, therefore, as it does not concern the richer classes, to take care that the rights of property are not tampered with, and that vested interests are properly revered.

And no doubt, there are certain political phenomena which seem to confirm Lord Salisbury's theory. There is, indeed, very little to show that trade and manual labour discern the paramount duty of Conservatism as Lord Salisbury has expounded it, but then villadom does. From suburban villas by scores of thousands flock the steady Conservative voters, who in Middlesex, East and West Surrey, and the three divisions of Kent, as well as in the vicinity of all the great provincial towns, support what Lord Salisbury calls the Constitution, and what Lord Beaconsfield preferred to speak of as the majesty of the Empire. But is it really the imperious power of Property which makes these good people in their semi-detached villas into Conservatives and Jingo? Would the mere feeling of panic at any menace to proprietary right have had the least power to inspire what was called the Jingo feeling,—a feeling which undoubtedly did a great deal more to rally voters to the late Government than the proprietary feeling ever did? Was not Lord Beaconsfield a great deal nearer the mark when he relied on what he called the power of the imagination to rally the country party, than Lord Salisbury when he relies on the iron gripe of self-interest? How is it that the Dissenting tradesman and the artisan do not find the gripe of this same self-interest making Conservatives of them, just as much as the suburban-villa residents? Why do the Baptist greengrocer and the Methodist miner vote for the Liberal candidate, while the managing clerk at the Bank and the small stockbroker vote for the Tory? Does not the screw of self-interest press as close on the worldly interests of the former, as it does on the worldly interests of the latter? Why does the imagination of the one class take a scornful attitude towards the poor, and the imagination of the other class take a scornful attitude towards the colonial and diplomatic ambitions of the showy politician? Surely Lord Salisbury must see that, whatever weight his appeal to the pocket of the middle and lower-class ought to have, it has very little to do with the actual creed of these people, and that the lightest grain of sympathy with special grievances and special ideas easily turns the scale against what he regards as the promptings of self-interest? It is clear enough, we suppose, that the dislike of privilege felt by the Dissenter when he contemplates the dignities of the Church Establishment, has far more to do with his Radicalism than any wish at all to lighten the burden of his own Church on his own pocket, a burden of which he is probably very proud; and that in like manner the jealousy of any sacrilegious interference with what he regards as divine claims has much more to do with the Conservatism of the Conservative Churchman than any dread of the claims of a Disestablished clergy on his purse. Lord Beaconsfield was at least right in saying that passion and imagination play a far greater part in politics than mere self-interest; and we cannot imagine that Lord Salisbury's proprietary Conservatism will recommend itself at all warmly to the minds of even the suburban villa-residents themselves. They would all, we suspect, more easily turn Liberal under any stirring appeal to their imagination—such as the anti-slavery agitation caused—than consent to found their Conservatism consciously on their distrust of the honesty of the masses of the English people.

Nothing is, to our notion, more curious than the fascination which the idea of Property seems to have for Lord Salisbury. In reality, there is no English party in existence that wishes to play fast and loose with property. There is a party, and a very flourishing party, which holds that a great deal of injustice has been done between class and class by the laws governing the distribution of property as we now have them. But the very root of the creed of this party is a belief in the possibility of finding a juster law of distribution,—a belief wholly inconsistent with the notion that the distribution of it should be decided by a scramble or by the will of the impecunious, and not by the wish to give to the labourer more precisely what he has earned, and what at present some one else receives. Lord Salisbury's strange notion that nothing which unsettles a proprietary arrangement sanctioned by custom, can by any possibility rest on the respect for property, but must proceed from a contempt for proprietary right, will find, we believe, extremely little hearty support even amongst the Conservatives and Jingo to whom he appeals. They know perfectly well that those Radicals who are in any degree formidable, assail not the sacredness of property, but the unsacredness of an unfair property law, and wish to make the law of property sounder, not weaker than before. And this they understand so well that a political campaign hardly ever turns on the mere question of confiscation, but on the alleged justice of giving more of the yield of a particular kind of property to one of the classes interested, and less of it to another of those classes. Lord Salisbury's imagination must surely be very feeble, if he imagines that by a trumpet-call of self-interest he can awaken an enthusiasm which has not been awakened by more disinterested and more imaginative war-cries.

It seems to us something of a riddle how a nobleman of considerable powers of invective, and not a little literary subtlety, who has followed his late leader in experimenting pretty freely on the imaginative sentiment of Englishmen, should yet cherish a political creed carefully pivoted on this notion that proprietary rights are at the source of all political questions, and that proprietary rights are unchanged and unchangeable. May it be that the cynicism of Lord Salisbury accounts at once for his power of scorn, and for his curious theory? No doubt, predominant scorn, by throwing suspicions on every new claim on the sympathies, would tend to make a man a Tory; while, by its tendency to ascribe low motives to men, it would also make him think it easiest to keep Tories to their faith by appealing blankly to their self-interest. That is the only way in which we can account for the curious tenacity with which Lord Salisbury broaches low theories of Toryism, even while he lavishes on Tories the whole store of his rather dry political affections.

THE GRAND COMMITTEE ON LAW.

IT is not very evident why Liberal Members should be so eager to get to the conclusion that the experiment of Grand Committees has failed. That Conservative Members should take this view is natural enough. The experiment is not of their trying, and if so important a part of the Procedure resolutions were to break down, the Government which introduced them might possibly be brought into discredit. But why should Liberal Members, Members who are supposed to wish well to the Procedure Resolutions, be in such a hurry to make out that Grand Committees are of no use? Why, for example, should Mr. Buchanan wish to tell the House that the Bill has been reported owing to its progress being rendered impossible by opposition, and why should he find six friends to support his amendment? Opposition, as here used, means obstruction, and to admit that obstruction can make the labours of a Grand Committee of no avail, is to proclaim that a Grand Committee is no better as a working machine than a Committee of the whole House. In the Irish legend, when the man who was leaving his home to get rid of the Brownie saw his tormentor sitting on the furniture which had just been put into the cart, he wisely had the cart unloaded, and made up his mind to stay where he was. And so, if obstruction is to follow Members into the Grand Committee, they may as well stay in the House. A Grand Committee is valuable as an instrument for saving time and getting through business. If it ceases to answer these ends, it must be accounted to have lost its savour. We maintain that the belief that this happened is altogether unfounded, and we will state our reasons for thinking so.

To begin with, the Grand Committee on Law is not the only Grand Committee that has been sitting. It is at most but half an experiment. The experience of the Grand Committee on Trade is as encouraging as that of the Grand Committee on Law has been depressing. For years past, the impossibility of getting a Bankruptcy Bill through the House of Commons has been a constant theme of lamentation, and now, before June is over, a Bankruptcy Bill—and quite a revolutionary Bankruptcy Bill—has been brought into a state in which, if the House chooses, it may at once be read a third time. Surely that is a very great testimony to the utility of Grand Committees. The work may be pulled to pieces over again, but if so, that will be the fault of the House, not of the Grand Committee. In a larger sense, it must be admitted that even the Grand Committee on Trade is still on its trial, because, till the House has actually accepted its conclusions, we cannot say how much time has been saved. But so far as the Grand Committee is concerned, there is no question as to the saving of time. The Bankruptcy Bill has been threshed out at least as thoroughly as it would have been in a Committee of the whole House, and the House of Commons has been left free to do other work. Nor is that the only proof that has been given of the efficacy of Grand Committees. This very Committee on Law has reported the Criminal Appeal Bill, and though in this case we could wish that their labours had been less successful, fruit is not the less fruit because you do not like the flavour of it. It is possible, indeed, that the reason why the Grand Committee on Trade has done better work than the Grand Committee on Law is to be looked for in Mr. Chamberlain's remarkable business ability. But the question now to be considered is not what goes to make Grand Committees a success, but whether there is any sufficient proof of their failure; and from this point of view, the fact that in two instances out of three they have answered the end for which they were designed is important evidence on the other side.

The case in favour of Grand Committees will be strengthened, if it should appear that the Criminal Code Bill, out of the withdrawal of which the controversy has arisen, was in any way unsuited for consideration by a Grand Committee. The discussion which preceded the adoption of the Attorney-General's Report shows plainly that it was in some respects very decidedly unsuited for such consideration. Thus, Sir Joseph Pease suggested that it might be well on another occasion to distinguish between what was new in the Bill and what was old, so that Members might know more precisely when they were legislating and when they were codifying. Mr. Bryce thought that the Committee would have been on firmer ground if the Bill had come from the Government, and not from a Royal Commission,—the difficulty probably in the latter case being that there is no one to whom the Committee looks, as of course, to say which provisions will be passed and which withdrawn. Mr. Collings complained that great changes had been introduced into the Bill, and that he had become "seriously alarmed" at the prospect of their adoption. When Mr. Collings is seriously alarmed, he is very apt to make those with whom he is working, confidants of his fears; and if the Committee had prolonged their sittings, a good deal more to this effect would probably have been heard. Mr. Labouchere was even more plain-spoken. The reason, he said, why the Bill had not passed was that it was not what it professed to be. Instead of being a codification Bill, it is a Bill introducing new principles. As such, it ought, in his opinion, to be opposed both in Committee and in the House,—and "opposed exhaustively." These last words are enough to make legislators shudder. The prospect of Mr. Labouchere applying his audacity and fertility of resource to the work of exhaustive opposition! These criticisms are quite enough to show why the Bill did not get any further in the Grand Committee. A Grand Committee is intended for the discussion of details. It is supposed to take its principles from the House. They have been explained and examined in the course of the debate on the second reading, and the business of the Grand Committee is to determine how they can best be carried out. If, instead of this, the Committee has to give up its time to the consideration of principles, a different kind of discussion necessarily comes into play. Members do not know how far they can trust to their objections being threshed out when the Bill goes back to the House; consequently, they are resolved to thresh them out in Committee. The result is that they bring to the discussion the same persistence which they would have brought to a similar discussion in the House itself. When men meet to consider details, each has a preference for his own method of arranging them; but if he cannot get that method adopted, he is ready to put up with some other. It is not so where principles are concerned. There, negative results are of as much importance as positive; a man's whole energy may naturally, and properly, be devoted not to doing a thing in one way rather than in another, but to preventing it from being done at all. From the moment that this feeling comes into play, a Grand Committee has no advantage, as regards the despatch of business, over the House itself.

The temptation to amend the Law, at the same time as it is codified, is a very strong one. It seems to economise time which would otherwise be wasted, either in debating isolated provisions in a body of law which needs to be looked at as a whole, or in framing a Code which will have to be altered as soon as framed. But the experience of the Grand Committee on the Criminal Code Bill seems to show that, notwithstanding this apparent advantage, the temptation had better be resisted. The law is not in a state to be codified, until it is in a state which those who have to codify it have agreed to accept as at all events provisionally satisfactory. Any attempts to treat it as final before it has reached this stage are in the nature of make-believes. The temper of mind which is needed for codification is distinct from that which is needed for the law amendment, and men who are brought together for the former work are likely to forget it altogether, in the excitement aroused by the latter. Before the Criminal Code Bill is again sent to a Grand Committee, it will be well that the House of Commons should have determined what law it is that is to be codified. Is it an amended law or an un-amended law? When that point has been decided, we see no reason why the Grand Committee on Law should not do its work as well as the Grand Committee on Trade.

THE HOUR IN EGYPT.

THE European public has a curious instinct about Egypt, a feeling that, however well matters may look there, nothing is permanently settled. The slightest event, a rumour, a disaster in the Soudan, the breaking of a dyke, an outburst of sickness, anything, produces a rush to sell Egyptian Stock, Suez Canal shares, all property affected by Egyptian prosperity. On Tuesday, for example, it was known that cholera, or it may be choleraic fever, had appeared in Damietta, and immediately there was a rush of sellers in every description of Eastern Bonds. As a rule, a popular impression of this sort has a serious basis, but this one is undoubtedly exaggerated. We do not like the situation in Egypt, because we believe that until a Resident is appointed with a right, legalised by treaty, to offer his advice, good government in the Delta will be either a sham or an accident, and that we shall be morally responsible for oppressions which we neither desire nor sanction. We dislike, too, arrangements which are only "understood," and against which, therefore, every one may intrigue without punishment; but we are not blind enough to facts to deny that some sort of modus vivendi has been attained. Lord Dufferin has created a working Administration, though it may work in certain departments in too Oriental a way. So long as the Khadive lives, a sudden catastrophe need not be apprehended. He is a weak man, and possibly not so loyal as he is, very properly, assumed to be; but he and his Ministry have recovered the reins, and are as clearly aware as the ex-Khadive Ismail, in the Times of Wednesday, professes himself to be, that England is now the protecting State, and that they must take her instructions. At the head of every Department a qualified Englishman has been placed, and although they must obey the Ministry, the Ministry will be guided by Mr. Evelyn Baring, an experienced and, above all, a determined man, who knows what he is expected to do, and what are the limits of interference. A Minister who was openly recalcitrant would go, as Biaz went. Nothing but the direct intervention of the Sultan, or a local insurrection, can stop the wheels of the machine from moving, and of either event there is little immediate probability. The Sultan, of course, dislikes the situation, for though he hated and dreaded the House of Mohammed Ali—which, if it had but the right man, would attract half the Mussulman world—he frets still more about the wound to his ascendancy in Arabia caused by the loss of Egypt. That huge peninsula matters little to Europe, but a Mussulman Prince claiming to be Khalif must watch Mecca, or he may find his throne undermined by schism, and the Sultan does not like to see the English seated astride his nearest road to the Holy City. Still, he cannot interfere, except by intrigue, and a hint that intrigue would not be tolerated recently caused the recall of Kadri Bey, his agent in Cairo. As to insurrection, there is no prospect of it. The upper classes of Egypt like neither Tewfik Khedive, whom they consider a Fellah, nor ourselves, whom they regard as disagreeable Westerns, intent on taking all pleasantness out of life, and indifferent to their claims to spoil; but they understand the force of England, and have not the people with them. The latter are beginning to comprehend that their taxes will not be increased, and gradually, if Mr. Baring can only enforce some compromise with the usurers—that is indispensable, and should be arranged more quickly—they will settle down to their labour. A few Sheiks will be thrown into prison for using the courbash too freely, and by degrees the Fellah life, though not as happy as English rule would make it, will be more endurable than in old days. The soldiers in the Soudan, who are peasants in arms, showed no reluctance to obey English officers, and those officers are slowly recovering ascendancy for the Khedive. Except the peasantry, there is no class in the country to be dreaded. Egypt is not India, full of warrior races, and with peoples in it which, like the Sikhs, can make themselves visible and formidable without the sympathy of the majority. There is no warrior race in the country, and there is therefore time to try the remarkable experiment now going on. We do not believe it will succeed, because we do not believe that Eastern and Western notions of government can be made harmonious; but there is no reason why it should end in a cataclysm, and not in a reform; the failure will only be visible by degrees, and in the position of the people, not of the Protecting State, which is quite strong enough to maintain order. Of course, if Great Britain retires from Egypt, it will be time for capital to retire too, and there will be reason for any kind of alarm; but Great Britain cannot retire till the mud has solidified, and that is a long date. If it does solidify—if, that is, a Native Administration feels that it can maintain itself easily without external support—then the object will have been maintained; but till then, British protection, even if represented by a single sentry, must be visibly present.

As to the scares of the hour, they seem to us unreasonable. That an outbreak of cholera may drive away some foreigners is possible, for Continentals, especially Frenchmen, Italians, and Greeks, lose their heads in presence of an epidemic. Even now, though the disease has probably been generated by filth, as it was when it first appeared in Lord Hastings' camp in the Mahratta country, the foreigners accuse the British of bringing it into the country by their laxity as to quarantine, that wonderful device for concentrating and intensifying all germs of disease. But the officials will not fly, and the troops will not fly. The latter, if the disease struck them, would be camped out in the Desert, which is healthier than England, and the former encounter cholera every year in India. There it is never wholly absent from the great cities, and breaks out unexpectedly at short intervals of time at station after station, inflicting always much private suffering, but not disorganising the Administration. There is no evidence that the epidemic will rise to the height which disorganises society, much less that it will attain the dimensions of a true plague. Egypt is not and will not be for years a sanitarium, or even a healthy residence for Europeans; but the English face far worse climates in their African settlements, and yellow fever is, except in its influence on the imagination, as dreadful a scourge as cholera, which, again, can come as easily from India as from Egypt.

The panic is a panic of cowardice, excusable only because it is not entirely selfish, and will do much more injury to Egypt than the epidemic itself. There is as little in it as in the other panic, about the Suez Canal. M. de Lesseps is not going to endanger his undertaking out of spite to the British, nor are the British going to fight France in order to take down M. de Lesseps' rather irritating pride. A second Canal is wanted, wanted exceedingly, wanted as much as a second line of rails on an overburdened line, but the second Canal will pay. It will, therefore, be cut, and the idea of an international quarrel over the privilege of cutting it is too absurd to be entertained. We think ourselves the existing Company should cut it, because they have earned the right, because they are on the spot, and because they, and they only, can make the two Canals supplement each other, instead of competing; but whoever cuts the ditches, the sovereignty over them will remain with Egypt. The ex-Khedive in his able sketch of the situation is perfectly right there. The State cannot part with its ultimate rights, and so long as it does not part with them, the nationality of the engineers of the Canal is a matter of the smallest importance. The Canal must be Egyptian, by whomsoever it is made. There may be difficulties, and quarrels, and troubles of every kind in Egypt, and there will be, while this experiment lasts, much misgovernment; but disorder of the serious kind, the kind which imperils States, will only begin when the British flag retires. Long before that happens, the world will have full notice in a Parliamentary division that it is about to happen, and that Egypt for the second time is about to be left to itself, without the guidance even of authoritative advice.

THIRD-CLASS PASSENGERS.

WE wish greatly that some Member of Parliament possessed of the ear of the House of Commons would endeavour to strengthen the "Cheap Trains Act" which Mr. Childers is passing through the House. He might fail, but he would have large support, and he would wake up the public mind to a necessity which every year becomes more pressing. We mean the necessity for improving Third-class railway accommodation, which, though regarded as a detail of Railway administration, is of national importance, for two reasons. One of these no one will dispute. The congestion of our great cities must be relieved, if they are to remain safe, and it can be relieved by nothing but cheap and easy railway communication. It is not the rich who crowd our cities till rent is the heaviest of taxes, and the amenities of life can no more be preserved than its decencies; but the poor, the poorish, and the class which, though officially regarded as well off, is compelled to live with the most rigid economy. A clerk on a hundred a year is not regarded as "poor," nor is a petty tradesman, but to both rent is the one nearly insupportable burden. In London, especially, every year sees a great city like Norwich added to the population, a city composed of people of whom thirty per cent. are workmen, poor clerks, and their tradesmen, and sixty per cent. more are their wives and children. Houses cannot be cheap in presence of such an invasion, and the practical alternatives are cheap trains to the further suburbs, or a packing every result of which is bad. The second reason is less visible, but it is, as we believe, equally true. British prosperity greatly depends on the easy movement of the population, on its power of transferring itself rapidly, silently, and willingly to the place where it is wanted. If Paisley wants hands, and Spitalfields is overcrowded, every week by which movement from Spitalfields to Paisley is delayed is a loss of thousands of pounds to the hands, and of still more thousands to the mill-owners, whose "command of labour" is their life, and depends on easy locomotion. This is only one illustration, and not the strongest, for, as every landlord knows, agriculture is more weighted by what we may call the localism of labour than by any other single cause.

The perfect freedom of internal travel, by which alone existing difficulties can be removed, depends upon Third-class travelling by railway, to which neither Parliament nor the Companies have given sufficient attention. The latter will make no serious experiments in the way of vast traffic at low rates, while the former, filled as it is with rich men, will not understand that even a penny a mile is, for the families of the poor, a prohibitory rate, and that third-class passengers have grievances other than the price of tickets. The workman may pay two shillings a week in railway tickets for the sake of a decent home, but to set his family free to move about, to enable his wife and children also to benefit by the city demand for labour, to move elsewhere at a moment's notice with all his belongings—to be, in fact, as free as when everything was for everybody within walking distance—is in practice impossible. It would take seven shillings a week, or two suburban rents, for locomotion alone, and even then the locomotion would be of the worst kind. Readers who give sixpence for the Spectator hardly know, unless they are clergymen, what the morning and evening third-class trains are like, or how they “take it out of” the passengers and their wives. The rush is worse than a severe walk, the crowd pushes and almost fights, the compartments are sweltering pens, and the overcrowding is positively dangerous. The people will not be left behind, and submit to anything rather than lose a train, including a packing which wears out the men's tempers, and is declared by their wives “disgusting.” The passengers are at such times packed like goods, while paying eight times as much; and the Companies declare that it is their own fault, or the fault of circumstances, and that there is no remedy.

There never will be one, unless Mr. Chamberlain and the Railway Chairmen take the matter up in earnest, for till then experiments will not be tried. The notion of a penny a mile has got into people's heads, like the notion of five per cent. for money, and cannot be got out, and a gigantic “interest” prohibits all changes in the wretched carriages adopted when the traffic first began. What is wanted, is an outside force to compel new efforts on behalf of the Third Class, and it can come only from the Board of Trade, armed with a power of remitting taxes and a right to inflict fines. We believe that, had he only legal rights, Mr. Chamberlain would in a short time bring round the Companies, and in accord with them try on some choked line the experiment wanted,—of running trains of cars built like the Swiss second-class, at a farthing a mile, with tickets sold at every post-office, conductors to every train maintaining rigid order, as well of words as of acts,—we should just like to send a few M.P.'s fifty miles in a hoppers' train—filled on system, instead of by a mad rush, and approached by half-a-dozen doorways and other means of access, where there is now one. Such trains should be shut off totally from the public five minutes before departure, and hurry be treated within the barrier as an offence against station etiquette. Such trains would be constantly full, there would be no waste of haulage, and the “poor” would slip in and out of them as readily as their own house-doors. Overcrowding should be prohibited absolutely and finally, and supplementary trains run where needful, at a small increase of fare, as a fitting penalty for being too late. In short, it should be as easy for anybody, however feeble, to enter a third-class compartment in the morning or evening as it is to enter a sixpenny omnibus. Is that too much to ask, or must we, in despair of other means, appeal to the democratic sentiment, declare the existence of classes an insult to the majority, and, as in America, compel millionaire and labourer to travel shoulder to shoulder? The masses would be attended to then.

There is an effort in Mr. Childers' Bill to give the Board of Trade powers to enforce some improvements, but we doubt if the words are strong enough. The words run:—“If, on an inquiry under this Act, it is proved, to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade or the Railway Commissioners, as the case may be, that such proper and sufficient accommodation as aforesaid is not provided by any railway company, the Board of Trade or the Railway Commissioners, as the case may be, may order the company to provide such accommodation at such fares as, having regard to the circumstances, may appear to the said Board or the Commissioners to be reasonable.” That seems wide enough, more especially as the Board, if not obeyed, can exact the passenger-duty; but we want an addition of two lines, and the insertion after the word “accommodation” of the amendment, “Which shall, if the Board judge right, include the provision of decent carriages, with gangways down the centre.” Without this, the word “sufficient” will be interpreted by precedent, and by precedent a third-class passenger is entitled only to a narrow cattle-pen, into which twice the legal number of drunken men may force themselves, and keep up a free-fight for miles, roaring out songs so atrocious that at last, on the solicitation of mothers in the next compartment, some non-commissioned officers present will interfere by force. That scene, which we saw ourselves, was accompanied by incidents which we cannot give, and is only a slight exaggeration of scenes which occur every day, and which, were the sufferers first-class passengers, would be stopped by force.

LOUISE MICHEL.

THE cruel sentence passed this week upon the Parisian lecturer, Louise Michel, for inciting the people to plunder bakers' shops, calls attention once more to that curious puzzle, the difference in the development of the passion of pity in England and on the Continent. The passion certainly exists here, as witness, for a single illustration, Mr. Plimsoll. Apart altogether from the multitudes of religious men and women who devote themselves to good works, there must be hundreds of persons in our midst who, without strong religious convictions, occasionally with very strong agnostic convictions, devote themselves, their lives, and their fortunes to the poor, out of sheer compassion. They have nothing to gain, not even reputation, but they work on steadily for years. They realise the sufferings of the poor so completely that they cannot rest unless they are battling strenuously with some evil, poverty, or disease, or ignorance, or intemperance, for their sake. They very often feel the pressure of such evils so painfully that idleness seems to them wickedness, the enjoyment of wealth a cruelty, and any departure from the law of abstinence in drinking, and even, though rarely, in eating, an immorality. We have known them abstain from carpets, lest they should forget what bare floors meant. Such men, and more women, often grow heated in the endless contest, lose sight of the proportion of things, and begin to regard cool judgment as evidence of callousness. They dream and brood until the impossible becomes easy to their minds. We have often been startled to hear persons whose whole lives were an honour to Christianity, and who possessed for all purposes of charity a true faculty of organisation, gravely defend proposals to which Parliament would scarcely give a hearing, proposals involving sometimes plunder, sometimes the abrogation of parental rights, sometimes the extinction of liberty absolutely essential to the national character. We have heard it gravely suggested that a five-shilling income-tax should be devoted to the poor, that the people should be rehouised by the confiscation of all legacies above £10,000; that all children should be taken from their parents to bring up “properly,” and that marriage should be prohibited to all who do not receive at least a pound a week. The total prohibition of the sale of liquor is one of their common-places, and so is the compulsory despatch of babies to the crèche. But those who suggest such things, furious as they often are, and full of anger with classes and individuals, are rarely or never cruel. They do not wish to injure anybody. It has been our lot to listen to most kinds of English philanthropists, when most thoroughly in earnest, but except once in regard to slavery, and once in regard to vivisection, we never remember to have heard cruelty advocated, and never acquired an idea of the speaker having any secret sympathy with riot or insurrection. The pity seemed to extend to all classes, and a proposal to “card” the Duke of Westminster would have excited as much horror as did the condition of any labouring family in a London slum, or the oppression of any agricultural labourer. On the Continent, it is not so. There exists there in almost every country a class of philanthropists in whom a passion of pity for the “dim, common populations,” for their sufferings, for their toil, for their want of food, seems to overpower not only the judgment, but even the moral sense. Sometimes wealthy, often cultivated, they become filled with hatred against those who, as they think, oppose their reforms, till they would confiscate all the property of the rich, banish all priests, and kill out all who would defend laws for the protection of either. Like Louise Michel, they do not object to dynamite or assassination, if all other means fail, and suspect those who do object of a secret half-heartedness in their horror of human suffering. There is no reason to doubt the evidence given by M. Rochefort as to Louise's devotion to the wretched women whom she found on board ship or in New Caledonia. He was not in a rhetorical mood, and his evidence is quite of a piece with all that has ever been recorded of her life,—with her devotion to her mother, her toil to give to the poor, her anxious and faithful attendance upon the wretched. She is by the testimony of her quartier a Sister of Mercy, without uniform or vow. Yet the Judges who hear these things hear her also justify the plunder of bakers' shops, receive evidence showing that she threatens fire and sword at the next social uprising, and deem her from her past history as Communist a dangerous revolutionary character, who would, were the needful circumstances to occur, order a great massacre. They are as right as M. Rochefort. She is, in fact, a woman in whom the passion of pity has transformed her blood to gall, who hates oppressors, real or fancied, more than she loves the oppressed, and who has forgotten to consider the morality of means, if only she may arrive rapidly at benevolent ends. An English newspaper sneers at her reluctance to hear M. Rochefort give testimony to her virtues, as savouring of mock-modesty, but it is most probable that the reluctance was real, though it had nothing to do with modesty at all. Louise was simply impatient, as she said, of such a fact as her pity for the poor being brought forward as an argument in her favour. It was, to her mind, a necessary fact of her life, with no relation to the charge, and she might as well have been defended by a plea that she had dark or light hair. She despised such pleas, maintaining not that she was benevolent—which was to her a detail of no moment—but that it was positively right, if people were hungry, to incite them to take bread out of bakers' shops. She would not take it for herself, but she would incite them, that being, as she holds, a right thing to do. She would, in fact, levy war for the poor, and if the rich perished in the war, that was their fault, for being rich.

It is very difficult to think out the cause of a difference like this, for it does not arise either from comparative ignorance or from any feature of national character. Louise Michel's opinions are those of scores as educated as Elisée Reclus, that is, twice as educated as are most of our own philanthropists. They are repeated in Germany by men as Teutonic as the English, the latter again, if properly provoked, being quite capable of becoming bigots. A little of the difference may be due to the Poor-law, which by taking actual starvation out of the list of probabilities, greatly, though unconsciously, relieves the philanthropic imagination. A little more, too, may be ascribed to the English want of logic, their refusal to draw the deduction that though a landlord may be harsh, and being harsh is starving his tenants, he, therefore, deserves death. But the main reason, we suspect, is the old one that on the Continent the philanthropists are the religious-minded, and that the religious-minded, when they have no religion, supply its place with a Cause. Thenceforward, the Cause being heartily adopted, its opponents are the wicked, to be suppressed out of the way. As, till the Revolution arrives, there is no means of suppressing them except force, the philanthropists justify force as being, on the whole, better than the further toleration of immorality. Of course, a great deal of actual passion, unreasoning and cruel passion, enters into the matter too, for the battle heats the blood; but the conscious theory is as we have stated it, and we can give this further evidence. The philanthropists who have a faith, the leading members, for example, of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, who are often quite fanatical for the poor, never display this cruelty, or attempt to stir up the people to insurrection. The agnostic philanthropists, on the other hand, are, in their own eyes, a Government legislating and acting to remove an evil; and their opponents, being evil, have no more right to demur than thieves have a right to demur when the law lays hold of them. That the law calls their agents thieves or assassins has nothing to do with the matter, except to increase the necessity for doing away with law. It seems no more binding to them than the Smugglers' Code seems binding to Supervisors of Excise. They have developed a morality which inverts everything, their own position, that of their agents, and that of their opponents, and which strikes those who believe the old one as half mad and half bad, or, if the latter are Philistine as well as Christian, as entirely mad. It is bad and it is mad, but it is a morality, and the difficulty of dealing with those who hold it is one of the problems of modern jurisprudence. The mind revolts at a sentence such as was passed on Louise Michel—of six years' imprisonment, and ten more years' surveillance—as a monstrous cruelty, her offence, at most, being that of a ringleader in a trumpery bread riot, which in England would have been punished with three months', or at most six months' imprisonment. Yet what were the Judges to do? What sentence, except a lengthened imprisonment, could they inflict on a woman who avowed anarchical designs, and who they felt certain would, on the day of her release, incite the people again? The true remedy would be a kindly reclusion until the culprit had become more reasonable, but the Judges could not inflict it, and they availed themselves therefore of Louise Michel's position as a relapsed convict to confine her for the longest possible term. The only effect is to discredit justice, and to make new horrors possible in revenge; but the legislators have not yet founded a political Gheel, a city specially reserved for the kindly guardianship of all who are politically mad.

THE SUPPOSED APPETITE FOR FICTION.

THE Sixpenny Cornhill is admirable if the Sixpenny public really prefers illustrated stories to anything else; by the way, if any one in this world can give conclusive evidence that he knows the sixpenny public, we should like to have a good long conversation with him. If the sixpenny public does not prefer illustrated stories to anything else, and does not, indeed, prefer a diet of pure fiction at all to one of greater variety, then Mr. Payn, skilful as he is, has made something of a mistake. For our own parts, we greatly prefer the inimitable nonsense which he himself writes for us on the subject of imperfect or failing memory, to the cleverest tale in the new number of the Cornhill. Few know how to write nonsense as Mr. Payn does, and nonsense of that calibre is worth all the short stories of mere skill that you could collect. No doubt "The Lay-figure" is a good variation on the kind of story which turns on the preternatural, but it will not give one-tenth part of the pleasure to the great majority of the readers of the Cornhill which they will derive from Mr. Payn's paper on failing memory. We want to know where the editor of the Cornhill gets the notion that his confectioner's shop should be filled with every variety of sweetmeat, to the exclusion of all solid food. There is nothing that we know of in the few successes of sixpenny literature to justify such an impression. Chambers's Journal, which is, we believe, sevenpence a month, and, of course, much less in its weekly parts, has always been more valued for its penny articles on travel or the Arts than for its stories themselves. When Dickens began Household Words, he would never have dreamt of giving so much fiction and so little lively information as the editor of the Cornhill apparently designs to give. We should have said that the English middle-class, to whom the sixpenny magazines, the Cornhill and Longman's, must look for their success, are easily sated with fiction, and that they would value a periodical in which they obtained a certain amount of fresh knowledge at once vivid and precise, and only a limited proportion of fiction, a great deal more than one full of story and adventure only, even if the calibre of the stories could always be kept up to the highest point, which is barely possible. If the appetite for fiction were as great as it seems to be supposed in the reading public of England, surely we should have more newspapers which, like the French newspapers, embody a feuilleton with the journal itself; yet no English newspaper of real weight has ever ventured to do this. We believe, indeed, that a very considerable class of English readers positively dislike fiction, and will read nothing that is not more or less of an attempt to narrate, or discuss, or explain facts. We are not speaking of those who feel anything of a moral or religious objection to what is called the frivolity of fiction; we are speaking simply of English taste, and we conceive that there is a very considerable number of Englishmen whose pleasure it is to occupy themselves with the domain of fact, rather than with the domain of the fancy and the imagination. And though it may be truly said that such as these can never be regarded as properly belonging to the magazine-reading public at all, yet there is enough of this love of fact even in those who do not despise fiction, to make it more agreeable to the latter to have a fair share of what they regard as improving reading mingled with their amusement, than to have their amusement absolutely undiluted, as Mr. Payn apparently intends to offer it them,—for his own humorous paper, delightful as it is, cannot pretend to be more improving than even "The Lay-figure" itself. There is a good deal in almost every Englishman of the little boy who asked his uncle if he were not taking him almost too often to the cake-shop;—that is, there is something in him of real misgiving when he finds himself indulging in frequently reiterated acts of pleasure-seeking, unless he can console himself with at least the shadow of self-improvement. For such creatures,—and much as Mr. Payn may despise them, they are numerous among the Philistines of English society,—it would have been well to provide something more than a tiger-hunter's adventure and an inimitable bit of nonsense, as the make-weight of so much story-telling.

Mr. John Morley, in his speech at the Royal Academy Dinner, intimated that, in his opinion, the great popularity of pictorial art has tended to injure literature, by making literary men aim at a higher pictorial effect than language,—or, at all events, the language of any but most exceptional genius,—usually admits. That is perfectly true, and what is intended for graphic writing is the pest of our modern literature; indeed, the average "Own Correspondent" style is a monstrosity such as it took a world of readers as hungry as ours for a second-hand sort of experience, to produce. But that only shows the more effectually what it is that the public really hanker after, namely, the closest sort of contact, or appearance of contact, with life more or less new, which is any way obtainable by the help of books alone,—in other words, an actual enlargement of one's experience, without the necessity of moving from the narrow circle in which duty confines most of us. No doubt, this is the secret of the enormous appetite for fiction itself. The dressmaker pores over pictures of high life, in the fond belief that she is gaining at second-hand the very sort of excitement which she would obtain in a more perfect form by entering that society itself. The clerk in a counting-house, as he reads of the imaginary Australian or Californian gold-digger's exploits, has all the pleasure of a second-hand introduction to the perils and exultations of a finder of nuggets and a companion of outlaws. But if the pleasure in fiction be, as we believe it often is, mainly the pleasure in an enlarged circle of experiences,—though a circle of experiences enlarged only at second-hand,—it is clear that the very taste to which good fiction ministers, might be gratified very much more effectually by equally good narratives of fact, if only these could be stripped of all that encumbering and uninforming detail which is too apt to disfigure personal memories. It cannot be denied that the awkwardness and petty egotism of personal experience far too often render the account of it intolerable to others, and quite unfit to impress them as the same experience of their own would have impressed them. The skilful writers of fiction are selected from the mass by their power so to tell a tale that others will read it. But the narrators of actual life of any unique kind have so great an advantage in having actually had the experience which they ought to be able to make interesting to others, that they do not sufficiently recognise that the art of making it really interesting is a rare one, which requires not less practice and much more effort than was required in the life itself in which their experience was gained. For example, Mr. Payn's tiger-hunter tells his story with hardly any special skill. The very same story in the hands of a true artist,—say Mr. James Payn himself,—might have been made one of the most effective papers of the year. The visit of the cautious tiger to the death-place of the tigress and her cub is almost wasted in the Cornhill writer's rather leaden page. We believe that the editor of a cheap magazine who should make it his principal aim to enlarge the experience of his readers in a manner as vivid and various as it is possible to do it at second-hand, would never expend all his force in fiction, though he would use fiction as one of his most powerful instruments. And even fiction he would often use to enlarge his readers' experience in other regions also besides that of fiction. As Vernon Lee remarks, in the pretty little idyll of the eighteenth century which she has just published, some of the students of history cannot help finding, as Sir Walter Scott found, that the history they dig out of old books is full of hints which set their fancy in motion, and bring before them living and moving figures who embody that history. Where this work of the fancy is natural and genuine, we get forms of the historical novel or novelette which are at least as valuable for the historical scenery to which they give life, as they are for the main interest of the story told. And fiction of this kind, when well executed, enlarges the experience of men doubly,—first, by the insight it gives them into the working of human affections and passions; next, by the vivacity with which it exhibits manners and customs different from our own. But even when the power of fiction is interpreted in this larger sense, fiction remains only one of the means of enlarging human experience, and though perhaps the most delightful to many, not by any means, we imagine, the most universally popular. Travel, adventure, biography, autobiography, indeed experience of all sorts, told by the right persons in the right manner, is more popular still; and we cannot believe that Mr. Payn will not produce for us many numbers of the sixpenny Cornhill better than that with which he has commenced it, if he will but look out with his keen eye for those who have the art, first, of experiencing vividly, and then of telling their experience in terse, sincere, and effective words.

THE DESTRUCTION OF NIAGARA.

DURING the past few months, occasional allusions have been made in the English newspapers to an agitation which is going on at present in America concerning the condition and prospects of the Falls of Niagara; if the minds of our readers had not been thus prepared for the idea suggested by the above title, it would doubtless strike them as ridiculous. That Niagara, probably the most gigantic natural phenomenon in the world, apparently so immutable that it has become the favourite symbol of eternity, whose very name is said to have passed unchanged into every language spoken by civilised mankind,—that Niagara, of all things under the sun, can be in any danger of destruction at the hands of man, seems simply incredible. It is true, however, and although the allusions mentioned above are—like so many English statements about America—inaccurate in many respects, they are most unfortunately so in conveying the idea that public sentiment in America has been duly aroused to a sense of the importance of the danger, and that recent legislative action has provided against it. The Falls of Niagara cannot be regarded as specially belonging to America, but must be considered as existing for the advantage of mankind; no traveller crosses the ocean without visiting them, and England has already taken an important part in the efforts for their preservation,—indeed, we may almost say that it was an Englishman with whom these efforts originated. It is much to be desired, therefore, that the English public should understand what is involved in the question, how great is the necessity for preservative measures, and what form it is proposed that these measures shall take. If once these points were clearly understood and widely known, there would certainly be such a distinct expression of opinion in England as would render easier the task to be accomplished in America, for in spite of the frequent and half-joking assumption of careless independence, every one who is really familiar with American life knows that by the vast majority of our “kin beyond sea” any genuine word from England is received with kindly respect.

In the first place, then, in what way is Niagara being destroyed,—what is the danger from which it is to be preserved? There is a story of a man who desired to approach Niagara under perfect conditions, and who, therefore, left the train at some distance from the village of Niagara Falls, and made his way on foot, endeavouring during his walk to bring himself into a proper state of mind to be acted upon by the beneficent influences of the vast spectacle. At the moment, however, when he stepped into full view of the cataract, he was accosted by a brisk individual, who offered him for a small sum a piece of coloured glass, illustrating its use by turning his back to the Falls, putting his head between his legs, and thus contemplating the scene upside down and through his coloured medium. “That, Sir,” said he, when he had resumed his normal attitude, “is the way to obtain the most impressive and gorgeous view of the Falls. Ten cents!” This story illustrates the first of the two processes by which Niagara is being destroyed. For years there has been a constant stream of visitors to the little village, and in the absence of any restrictive legislation, the result is just what we should expect. Nearly the whole of the population consists of people who make a living by preying on the casual visitor. Every opportunity is seized for charging a toll, the cab-drivers and shopkeepers are in league to procure the sale of useless knick-knacks and so-called “Indian goods,” touts and “runners” accost you at every turn, and every trick short of actual swindling is employed to squeeze money from the unfortunate traveller. The extent to which this is practised has led to the saying that every sane adult American citizen knows two things about Niagara,—first, that there is a great waterfall there; second, that a man's pocket will be emptied there quicker than anywhere else in the Union. The fees to the various points of interest around the Falls—counting those only which it is necessary to see—amount to twenty-four shillings for each person. And without paying, there is nothing to be seen. It is a positive fact that there is no spot on the American side from which the Falls can be seen without paying a fee. And when the visitor has paid for admission to the principal point of view he finds himself in a so-called “park,” where crowds of excursionists hold picnics, with a “pavilion,” where they dance, an illuminated spray fountain, and elaborate arrangements for throwing coloured electric lights upon the Falls. There is only one place on the American side where the visitor is left in undisturbed enjoyment of the scene, viz., Goat Island, the large island which divides the Rapids into the American and Horse-shoe Falls. Owing to the good taste of its owners, the Porter family, and to certain peculiar testamentary conditions under which they acquired it, this lovely island has been saved from the “improvements” which are ruining Niagara; but these conditions are valid only during the minority of one member of the family, and he will shortly come of age. From every other point the visitor is invited, and frequently compelled, to see Niagara under some more or less distorted form, if not, like the man in the story, actually upside down, and every healthful influence is excluded by the irritation produced by the constant demand for money to maintain these evils.

The second method of the destruction of Niagara is worse. Hawthorne congratulates the Assabeth, the sluggish river of Concord, upon "the incurable indolence by which it is saved from becoming the slave of human ingenuity," and it is the swiftness and incalculable power of the Niagara River which are likely to prove its ruin. For they offer an irresistible temptation to what Mr. Ruskin calls "the pontifical rigidities of the engineering mind," and already along the bank and on the islands there are saw-mills and chain-mills and paper-mills, the Rapids are blocked up by wing-dams and ice-barriers, the gas-works discharge their tar down the cliff, and in place of the luxurious foliage with which the cliffs were once crowned, the whole length of them is disfigured by these various erections, and by heaps of lumber and refuse. Every day new mills are planned, new obstructions put out into the Rapids, and trees cut down. Now that the storage of electricity is an accomplished fact, the land which gives access to water-power is increasing rapidly in value. There is little left except Goat Island, and when that is bought by some manufacturer of pulp or spoons or spittoons, denuded of its forest growth, pierced by canals, and crowned with a tall chimney, the last blow of the destroyer will have been struck, and the beauty of Niagara will be gone for ever.

The description of Niagara has well been called the Ulyssean bow of travellers, and we shall not indulge in any superlative adjectives or soaring metaphors concerning it. Its discoverer, the Jesuit father Hennepin, told all that is necessary when he said, "the Universe does not afford its Parallel," and this is the point we would impress upon our readers. Niagara is unique, not merely because it is the second waterfall in the world, for that alone would render it of little value, but also because it possesses most of the qualities which men are accustomed to seek in widely-separated parts of the earth. A common error is to suppose that the Falls themselves constitute the chief interest of Niagara. Nothing could be more mistaken; the Falls are merely one of the constituent parts of the whole spectacle. The rapids, the islands, the cataract, the chasm below the cataract, the whirlpool rapids, the basin of the whirlpool,—all these are included in the word "Niagara." If one part be more impressive than the rest, we should agree with Mr. Howells, when he says, in that delightful book "Their Wedding Journey," that the Whirlpool Rapids, "seen from any point, are the most impressive feature of the whole prodigious spectacle of Niagara." But Niagara must not be thus split up; it is a unique whole. One part of it is a characteristic bit of the English Lake scenery; another is one of the features of Norway; another is the Maelstrom; its colour surpasses that of the Rhone at its greenest; its cliffs are those of the Rhine; its rapids are those of the St. Lawrence; and to all these it adds a resistless might that brings the spectator into closest communion with the eternal powers of the Universe, and inspires a feeling of sublimity which becomes almost overwhelming. It is a spectacle peculiarly adapted to exert a healthful and lasting influence upon the human mind:—

"If thou art worn and hard beset
With sorrows that thou would'st forget,
If thou would'st read a lesson that will keep Thy heart from fainting and thy soul from sleep," go to Niagara; there is

"The cataract, whose angry roar shall smite Thy heart with courage."

The writer well remembers spending the greater part of a brilliant summer night on Goat Island, at the brink of the Horse-shoe Fall. In the moonlight the rapids were like silver; each jet of spray sparkled as it rose, and the whole ocean seemed to be hurrying to pour itself into the misty gulf; most beautiful of all, the famous lunar bow stretched in a perfect arch from side to side. All the weird beauty of the moonlight seemed concentrated in that one circle. In the stillness of the night, the "slumberous sound" of the waters was more impressive than during the noises of the day. Overhead the stars, the awful cataract underneath. No one can live long in such a scene, and remain an unchanged man. In Matthew Arnold's verse, the sentiment of the place is perfectly expressed:—

"Ah! once more," I cried, 'ye stars, ye waters,
On my heart your mighty charm renew;
Still, still let me, as I gaze upon you,
Feel my soul becoming vast like you!'"

What, now, is it proposed to do, to make Niagara all that it should and may be? The answer will occur to every one who knows the place, and may be given in a sentence. The proper treatment of Niagara cannot be better expressed than in the phrase, "Plus on lui ôte, plus il est grand." Niagara must be delivered from its worst enemy, the sensational; it must cease to be treated as a show, and must be restored to its original condition as a simple piece of Nature. This is a case in which the words of the old hymn are peculiarly applicable,—“only man is vile.” Everything that man has done to Niagara must be undone; then only will its simplicity be restored, and with its simplicity its sublimity. The directors of a State Survey made a few years ago proposed that the land adjoining the rapids, falls, and chasm should be condemned by the State, and, with the erections on it, appraised and purchased. This land would be a strip a mile long, and varying in width from a hundred feet at the head of the Rapids to eight hundred feet at the Falls. The buildings would all be removed, the unsightly constructions along the banks would be swept away, appropriate trees planted, and the village thus shut out from view. This could be done for the sum of one million dollars. On the Canadian side, the cliffs have been left in their native picturesqueness; there are fewer buildings to be removed, and, best of all, there is a military reservation of sixty-six feet from the edge of the cliff. The difficulty and expense of restoration would consequently be very much less. It is needless to point out the material advantages to the immediate neighbourhood, and the moral advantage to the world at large, which would result from the establishment of this free international park. It is important, however, to remember that the employment of the water-power of Niagara would be in no way interfered with; it would be secured by a hydraulic canal, supplying, if necessary, twenty miles of factories, providing an unlimited amount of power, and free from all objections.

The first suggestion for the preservation of Niagara Falls came from Mr. Church, an American artist. He drew the attention of Lord Dufferin, then Governor-General of Canada, to the matter, and from the latter came the first definite proposition about the International Park. This was embodied in a message by Governor Robinson. Then came a memorial addressed jointly to Governor Cornell and the Governor-General of Canada, praying "that the State of New York and the Dominion of Canada should secure and hold for the world's good the lands adjacent to the Falls of Niagara." This memorial was signed by seven hundred persons, almost all of distinction. Among the English names are Lord Houghton, Lord Reay, Sir John Lubbock, W. R. Greg, Carlyle, Ruskin, Max Müller, Jowett, Leslie Stephen, and Frederic Harrison. Among the Americans are Emerson, Longfellow, Lowell, Whittier, Palfrey, Parkman, Holmes, Gray, Agassiz, Howells, Norton, Child, and President Eliot. Previous to this, the New York State Survey, to which we have alluded, had been made. An Act to carry out its suggestions has twice been presented to the Legislature, and allowed to perish in neglect. At last, a short time ago, a Board of Commissioners was appointed to report upon the desirability of the purchase of the land by the State. It is this non-committal Bill which some of our contemporaries have mistaken for the settlement of the question. Three weeks ago, the Commission adopted a resolution providing for the taking of land as described above. The matter is thus very much where it was two years ago, except that the restoration has become more difficult day by day. The Legislature will soon be called upon to decide upon the Report of the Commission. We cannot believe that a measure which would be so welcome to the world at large, which would confer both material and moral benefit upon the country, which is demanded by every sentiment of consideration for those who are to come after us,—a measure in which future generations will find a proof of the civilisation of our age,—will be rejected because America, with its embarrassing public wealth and its gigantic private fortunes, cannot find the sum of two hundred thousand pounds for such a purpose. We do not hesitate to say that English opinion will be unanimous upon the result, whichever way it may be, and we trust that the unanimity may be in the form of grateful recognition of an act of enlightened legislation.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE LIBERAL LEADERS AND THE PROVINCES.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your correspondent, "Publius," has done good service. I can wholly confirm, from my own experience, the disheartening effect of the indifference of the party leaders and Liberal M.P.'s generally to local efforts, where local efforts need most help. The policy of great Liberal demonstrations in great Liberal centres, with all the éclat of a magnificent unanimity of enthusiasm, is well in its way. The speeches are read throughout the land, and bear fruit. But how much more fruit would come from the contact of the leading minds with the masses whom their mere names animate! What is wanted is that Mr. Gladstone's own example in Midlothian should be followed, and the war carried into the enemy's country. This is done with pluck and judgment by Sir Stafford Northcote and Lord Salisbury, and a host of Tory subordinates; why should it not be done by minor members at least of the Ministry, and by that numerous body of Liberal M.P.'s who, after all, have not so very much to do? It may be said that these constant demonstrations are undesirable. True, in part; but if Liberals abstain, Tories will not abstain; and those who educate most persistently, whether rightly or wrongly, win, in the present state of things.

To the plea that Members are too busy in the Session, it may be replied that Liberal Members not in the Ministry are at least as free as the Tory Members who manage to combine diligent obstruction with weekly raids on country constituencies. Why, even if the same number of Liberals paired off for this purpose with these pertinacious francs-tireurs, there would be force enough at the disposal of the party managers to produce marked results, in districts such as "Publius" alludes to.

It is only too natural that local Liberals should draw one or two inferences. One is, that London is not improbably a Capua for some of our legislators. In some cases, at least, it will not be unfair to assume that it is society, and not Parliamentary work, from which our Members decline to be torn away. In such cases, too, it is not unkind to suggest that occasional skirmishes in the country, besides the help thus given to struggling local organisations and to the success and maintenance of Liberal principles, may give a change of air refreshing and not unwholesome to the Members themselves. Another inference is that the party managers do not always seem alive to the fact that a majority depends on the decisions of the doubtful constituencies, and that no seats are worth so much effort as those held by Tories. No battle is to be won without wise and comprehensive tactics on the part of leaders, and pluck and self-sacrifice on the part of rank and file. If these are wanting to the Liberal party in critical years, when the work is being done and left undone which will decide who holds the reins of power in the next Parliament, we can only look forward to the inevitable result; and as to the ultimate future, our trust must again rest in the salutary lessons of a period of adversity.—I am, Sir, &c.,

BISHOP COLENZO AND THE PENTATEUCH.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Though so appreciative to one side of the character of the late Bishop Colenso, I cannot think that your late notice does full justice to that aspect under which his name became most widely known. His book on the Pentateuch, you say, "excited much more interest than it deserved, and really only proved what all genuine scholars knew,—that the historical part of the Pentateuch is a human composition, by no means exempt from error." Undoubtedly, it proved only what all genuine scholars knew,—what, indeed, you might have said all unprejudiced and attentive readers knew; it merely pointed out what all human beings might have discovered for themselves who read the ancient records of the Hebrew race with the same impartial, disinterested attention as any other. But did they do this? Was Dr. Colenso assailing an obsolete superstition, when, twenty years ago, he pointed out that the Bible contained unquestionable error? Was it a statement which required no courage? Was he denounced, in requital, by fanatics and bigots alone? Surely these questions answer themselves.

I can hardly think you mean that Dr. Colenso had not, as a fact, a great effect on popular opinion. It does not seem to me open to question that there has been a difference in the tone of all reference to Scripture since he wrote, but perhaps you mean that the difference is not a valuable one. He was blamed at the time for writing a book designed neither "to instruct the educated" nor "to edify the uneducated," but simply to spread the truth, as far as he discerned it. I should say that the whole merit of the book was that it discarded this distinction of the educated who were to be instructed and the uneducated who were to be edified, and took it for granted that error was bad for all. When he wrote, ordinary, common-place people were either irreligious, or they believed that every word in a book from which you might derive a sanction for almost every crime was dictated by the Holy Spirit, and some of the best of men sanctioned a delusion they could not have shared. Since that pretence has been discarded (of course, I do not mean that this has been the result of what Dr. Colenso wrote, or, indeed, of any single influence), it has been possible for ordinary people who were not scholars and critics to recognise that the Bible is the history of a Divine revelation. We discern that which is divine, when we discern that which is not divine, and for practical result it matters little whether you say that every word in a book is of supreme value, or that every word is worthless. The Bible is a sealed book, to those who dare not discern error in it; our love for it should show itself in gratitude to those who, in pointing out its mistakes, bring that wonderful history into the light of day.—I am, Sir, &c.,

UNIVERSITY NEWS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Mr. Stamford Raffles laments the difficulty of "procuring information of University progress." He seems to be unaware of the "Oxford Letter" which appears weekly in the Guardian, which contains notices not merely of the facts of University progress (or retrogression), but also of the proposals which are to be laid before Convocation. For more exhaustive information, your correspondent has only to subscribe to the University Gazette, in which he will find, in minutest detail, notice of every proposal of progress (or retrogression) given at least a week before the days of voting. Thus, "the non-resident M.A.'s," even in the remotest villages, have ample time to muster for the fray.

If, in addition to this, your correspondent desires to see a report of the latest University sermon, or cricket match, he should subscribe to the Oxford Magazine, Oxford Review, or the University Herald, all of which are well-conducted, fully-informed weekly periodicals. Your correspondent will, therefore, surely see that to suggest that, because the daily papers omit any but the most meagre University intelligence, the recent Vivisection vote was a hole-in-the-corner proceeding, is merely the complaint of a disappointed indolence.—I am, Sir, &c.,

AN EARTHQUAKE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—About twenty minutes to two by my watch, and a quarter to two p.m. by the church clock, to-day (Monday), we experienced a really violent shock of an earthquake. I have felt often a similar one in Japan, but never in Europe. The houses shook violently, the noise was that of an exploding magazine, the motion lateral. The sun was shining brilliantly, after the rain. The sky clear, here and there flecked with fleecy cloudlets. The wind due south. As I write, at ten minutes past two, I experience a slight trembling of the earth.—I am, Sir, &c.,

POETRY.

THE CHANNEL TUNNEL—A PARALLEL.

Gods built the walls of Troy, and Fates decreed
That they in strength inviolate should stand,
Defying hot assault and burrowing hand,
Nor fall,—save by Troy's sons' own senseless deed.
Fools and infatuate! they with thoughtless speed
And ill-timed mirth—a giddy-hearted band—
Deaf to prophetic voice, haled from the strand,
Through broken walls, the ruin-laden steed!
Forces divine broke through the ridge that spanned
The narrow seas, and rolled the encircling main
An everlasting moat, to shield thy land,
Britain, last hold of Freedom, from War's stain.
Shall sons degenerate, reckless slaves of gain,

DR. WACE ON CHRISTIAN EVIDENCE.*

DR. WACE is one of the most thoughtful of those believers who do not clip and pare Christianity of what is most characteristic in it before he accords it his hearty faith. The creed in which he believes is the same as that of the first century, without fanciful reconstruction or modification; but his mind is a mind of this century, and he sees all the difficulties of the present day from modern points of view, so that he can really discuss the embarrassments which we feel in the way most useful and interesting to us. For example, the second lecture must produce on all candid minds a very deep impression of the historical uncertainty of the grounds assumed by the negative critics. In it Dr. Wace shows us how hard even the steadiest unbelievers find it to reject the authority of our Gospels, and how they vibrate on the subject even when they do reject it; how M. Renan accepts the authorship of Luke for the Acts of the Apostles, as well as for the Third Gospel, and upholds the historical character of the First and Second Gospels, and even with regard to the Fourth, finds in it the most convincing evidence that its writer was in close contact with the facts of Christ's life; how Strauss himself, after assuming as a certainty the unauthentic character of the fourth Gospel, declared, in the third edition of the Leben Jesu, that he was beginning to doubt his doubts away, and to believe that, in spite of all its supernaturalism, it was the work of John the son of Zebedee,—a conviction which again faded from his mind; how Dr. Karl Hase, who had held all his previous life by the authenticity of John's Gospel, renounced it in 1875, with the candid admission that he might very probably return later to his old belief in it. And Dr. Wace does more than show the wavering character of the negative criticism, for he attacks, in a very impressive passage, the attitude assumed by the great mass of modern unbelievers, when they tell us that the Apostles and early Christians were indeed genuinely convinced of the supernatural character of the facts which they announced, but were, in that conviction, subject to pure hallucinations :—

"But allowing that the authors of our Four Gospels were incapable of untruth, were they capable of hallucination? That, no doubt, is a possibility which it is necessary to take into account. But here, again, the answer may well be similar to that offered to the last objection. Not only were these men disciples in the greatest school of truthfulness the world has ever seen; they were disciples not less in the school of the sternest realities the world has ever seen. At the risk, and in many cases at the actual cost, of a death like that of their Master, a death of torture and of ignominy, they declared themselves to be in possession of the secret of salvation for the world, of truths by which mankind might be regenerated; and they proclaimed themselves the servants of a Lord who was destined to rule the hearts of men. If any beliefs would have seemed more like hallucination than any other to the men of that day, it would have been these cardinal elements in the belief of the Evangelists and Apostles. St. Paul's message was equal foolishness in the eye of a Jew and of a Greek. To a Jew it seemed incredible that the Gentiles should become heirs of all the spiritual education of his forefathers; to the Greek or Roman it seemed a ridiculous conception that he should submit his wisdom, his art, and his power to the authority of a crucified Jew. There, as I have said, might have seemed hallucinations, if you will. But these very beliefs, the most incredible of all at that time, we know to have been founded in truth, and we see the verification of them before our eyes. The two Apostles in whose daily company St. Luke and St. Mark lived, and the other two Evangelists, St. Matthew and St. John, have laid down the moral principles on which the whole fabric of the highest civilised society now reposes, and in which every thoughtful man sees the germs and the guarantee of the future progress of our race. Now consider to what this amounts. It shows that wherever we are able to put to the proof, not merely the truthfulness, but the sobriety, the practical insight, the moral and spiritual penetration, of the Evangelists and Apostles, their possession of these qualities is vindicated by experience on the largest possible scale. In these Gospels and Epistles a sun suddenly appeared in the spiritual heaven of mankind, which eclipsed, by the intensity of its illumination, all lesser lights in the moral firmament. This is the phenomenon which places the testimony of the Evangelists and Apostles on so different a footing from that of any other evidence to events at all similar in character. To quote instances of legends attaching to the origin of other religions is beside the mark, until an instance can be produced of such legends being associated as in this case with supreme truth, wisdom, purity, and goodness. Putting out of sight for the moment the question of miracles, there appears a general agreement of the most thoughtful men of all schools that there is not one sentiment, or even one word, for which the Evangelists or their Master are responsible which does not harmonise with the highest conceivable ideals of all that is good and true. Now, would not such uniform and ideal perfection be itself a miracle of the most perplexing and distressing kind, if it were combined with the hallucination which is attributed to the Evangelists by rationalistic criticism?"

This seems to us the strongest ground you can take. Here are men subject, it is asserted, to hallucinations, who yet are so free from hallucinations that they predict a triumph for the manifestation of our Lord's character as the fountain of truth and soberness for mankind over all the traditions of the Jews, and all the philosophy of the Greeks, and that triumph is actually achieved. Can a pure hallucination bring about its own fulfilment? In the midst of the hard facts of such a world as the world of the Cæsars, could any merely hysterical imagination have predicted a triumph of this kind which was actually accomplished? Could any imagination have predicted it, except under the guidance of the Divine Spirit?

Quite as impressive is the lecture on "The Miracles of Our Lord," in which Dr. Wace deals with the argument that the conception of miracle is an anthropomorphic conception which does injustice to the Divine Mind, by recasting it in the form of an imperfect and finite human will. His text is taken from the story of the centurion who argued that, as he could command the various soldiers of his own military force and absolutely ensure their obedience, so our Lord could command the agencies of Nature, and ensure with equal certainty their obedience :—

"Now, that which forms the great and abiding wonder of the faith of the Centurion is that, by one simple observation, he supplies the conclusive and permanent answer to all these doubts and denials. As Luther puts it, with his usual vividness, 'This heathen soldier turns theologian, and begins to dispute in as fine and Christian-like a manner as would suffice for a man who had been many years Doctor of Divinity.' He cuts the knot at once, by that bold reasoning by analogy from man to God, of which our Lord's teaching is so full, and which is involved in the cardinal doctrines of the Gospel, such as the Divine Fatherhood and the forgiveness of sins. He says, simply, that the kind of action which men exhibit must be possible for God. It is impossible for Him to be more restricted in His action than His creatures; and if they are able, by subordinate agencies, to carry out their will, and to modify, by the interposition of that will, what would otherwise be the natural course of events, it is inconceivable that it should be impossible for Him to do the same. The force of this argument should be vastly enhanced to us by that development of science and civilisation which has been produced since the Centurion's time, and which is sometimes ungratefully used to obscure its truth. Let us realise how, in the present day, a single human will, at the centre of a great nation, or, rather, of a great empire like this, can make itself obeyed to the very extremities of the world, by means of a subtle electrical current, scarcely perceptible to the touch, and during a great part of its course buried in obscurity under vast oceans; and with what reason can it be denied that the Creator of all these subtle forces, in whose hands they all lie, can silently modify, by an act of His will, the course of any event in His universe, and that he can say to His servants, as we to ours, Do this, and it is done? When we, with our utterly imperfect knowledge, can so modify the action of natural forces as to neutralise a disease by a little counter-poison, or revivify the nervous forces of life by galvanic currents, must it not seem the height of all unreason to deny an infinitely superior, and at the same time, infinitely more mysterious and invisible capacity, to Him who created at once these forces, and the human brain which makes use of them? The simple principle, in a word, to which the Centurion appeals may be stated in our more scientific way, by saying that whatever forces there are in nature, must reside within the maker of nature, only in an infinitely enhanced degree; and the point on which it is more especially necessary to insist in applying this principle, is that which the Centurion grasped—namely, that the powers of man, of man's intellect and will, must, above all things, be regarded as an example of one form of the divine action. The kind of things which man can do, God can certainly do; and if modern men of science can modify the operation of nature by methods which to men not so scientific, would be incomprehensible, and even invisible, certainly God can modify nature and control it by means which, even to men of science, are similarly incomprehensible and invisible. There seems, in fact, to lurk an extraordinary sophism in the offence which is taken at so-called anthropomorphism. Men observe the operation of the inanimate forces of nature, and deduce from them the methods of God's operation. There, they will say, you observe the course of His action; and you notice its absolute regularity, and the absence of any indication that we can detect of its disturbance by personal action and will. But the moment the moralist, or the theologian, points to another sphere of nature—that of human nature, which is nature still—and argues from it in a similar manner, regarding it as a revelation of part, at all events, of God's method of action, we are denounced as anthropomorphic. Be it so. But what is the scientific conception but—if I may be allowed to coin the word—physico-morphism? They see the likeness and reflection of God in nature; we see the image and reflection of God in man; and why not the one as well as the other? The corruption of our moral nature creates, indeed, a gulf between us and Him. But considered from the point of view of a physical philosopher, man is not only a part of nature, but the highest and most completely developed part. By all means let us learn all that natural philosophers can tell us of the Divine nature, and methods, and power, from the inanimate and irrational creation; but let them not refuse to take into account what we can tell them, or rather what their own hearts can tell them, respecting God's nature, His power and the method of His action, as exhibited in the mind and will of man. . . . Argue from nature exclusive of man, and you may acquiesce in the hard mechanical views which alone it suggests to you. Argue from nature with man, and man's actions, and man's will included within it, and you will agree with Luther that the Centurion was a great Doctor of Divinity."

That is an argument as perfect in form as it is sound in substance. Those who really object to miracle as the mere reflex of an anthropomorphic idea of God, themselves disbelieve it on the strength of a physico-morphic idea of God which is poorer and less adequate.

In his last lecture, Dr. Wace has dwelt on an argument for the supernatural character of Christianity on which sufficient stress has never been laid, and on which, indeed, even Dr. Wace himself, though he makes it the point to which his whole book leads up, might still have insisted even more emphatically than he has done,—we mean the argument that the first growth of the Christian Church, being reserved entirely for the period which followed our Lord's departure, can only be rationally ascribed, as he himself by anticipation ascribed it, to that sending of the Holy Spirit by which, as Christ himself assured his Disciples, they would be enabled to do far greater works than he himself, while he lived, had ever done. We see, as Dr. Wace remarks, the immediate followers of our Lord as a little group of ignorant, wavering, insignificant men, with views so narrow that they were not even exalted into spiritual insight by our Lord's resurrection from the dead, but were still centred in the notion that he would at once restore the kingdom to Israel,—we see them, moreover, suddenly deprived of the main stimulus to which they had been accustomed to look for initiative of every kind, by our Lord's disappearance from earth; yet, notwithstanding this, within a day or two of that great privation, we find the first great shoot of the Christian Church making its appearance with every promise of vigorous growth; a totally new power appears in it; and the "greater works" which our Lord had predicted, come into being, and soon eclipse altogether all that the Master had himself achieved while he remained on earth. Mohammed fairly began the great military career which his lieutenants continued, but Christ can hardly be said to have done more than prepare for the spiritual work which was commenced on the Day of Pentecost. Is it reasonable to ascribe that work to the power of a mere memory, however great? Is it not infinitely more reasonable to ascribe it to the living influence which our Lord promised to send after he had been taken away, and which, according to the unanimous testimony of the whole Church of that period, he actually did send, and send at the moment promised, than to attribute it to the power of a memory, though the human centre of that memory had wielded no similar magic while Christ remained on earth? Dr. Wace insists most justly in his lecture on the Resurrection that the Evangelists and Apostles who refer to that Resurrection never refer to it as the end and goal of the Christian revelation. They use it only as the explanation of the new power which had since descended on the Church, a power of which that Resurrection was the pledge. It is not the Resurrection itself, but the subsequent gift of the Spirit, of which the Resurrection was the guarantee, which is the end and aim of the Christian revelation. It is not the rising from the dead, but the receiving of power from on high, which renovates all things. The mere fact that, according to the universal testimony of the Church, our Lord's stay in this world ended without even gathering in a single great harvest of souls,—that he left to an impersonal influence to accomplish what he himself had doubtless intentionally refrained from accomplishing, recognising that he was too strong and the multitude too weak for him to accomplish it in person without more or less effacing the individual life of the new community,—ought to attest in a manner not to be mistaken the reality of that gift of the Spirit which alone accounts for the life of the Church. The heroic theory of great crises is all very well, while the hero is there to do his work; but when the hero is gone, if he be a mere hero, his personal influence does not grow, but dwindle, as the memory of him slowly fades away. It is different with him who can send down a Spirit able to effect far more than anything effected in his own lifetime,—and this is the difference between Christianity and all other human influences. It is because Dr. Wace has kept this fact so continually before us throughout his lectures, that they seem to us so full of value and significance for all who read them.

JAMES AND PHILIP VAN ARTEVELDE.*

THESE books are the first serious efforts that have been made in this country to rescue the careers and characters of two remarkable Flemings of the fourteenth century from the not always tender mercies of the romanticist and the pro-aristocratic pamphleteer. That they should have appeared at the present time, that their authors should have the same purpose—to perform a much-needed piece of historical white-washing—and that they should have written quite independently of each other, are rather interesting proofs that we are emerging from the period of anti-democratic reaction which followed the excesses of the French Revolution. Whether it be that we are getting reconciled to the idea of modern society becoming democratic by evolution, instead of by revolution, or whether there be some other explanation, we are every day becoming more willing to believe that men who seemed to be democrats years or centuries before their time must have had more of good than of evil in their motives and lives. Most of us would probably be thankful to historical investigators who should prove that Rienzi and Masaniello were far-sighted politicians, and were not elevated to a half-satanic "bad eminence" mainly by circumstances. Or, to come nearer our own time, should we not be gratified rather than not, to find that all Spinoza's grief at the death of De Witt was entirely justified, that the later, like the earlier opposition of that eminent Republican to the Orange Family, was at once patriotic and expedient? In rehabilitating the Artevelde, Mr. Ashley and Mr. Hutton are, no doubt, following in the wake of others. They both admit their obligations to Lettenhove's Histoire de Flandre and Jacques d'Artevelde, and still more to Vanderkindere's Siecle des Artevelde. Mr. William Longman, in his History of Edward III., too, as Mr. Hutton allows, has vindicated the memory of the elder Van Artevelde. The younger has had such ample poetic justice done him by Sir Henry Taylor, so generous a eulogium is bestowed upon his "equal temper" and "ample soul,"—

"Rock-bound, and fortified against assaults
Of transitory passion, but below
Built on a surging subterranean fire,
That stirr'd and lifted him to high attempts," that Mr. Hutton need not have worked himself into a Byronic "comic horror" because the dramatist has taken advantage of the licence of his craft to link Philip, on the fatal field of Roosebeke, not to his wife, Yolande van den Broucke, but to "the runaway mistress of the Duke of Bourbon, idealised into an abstract personification of love and purity." Yet, in spite, or rather in consequence, of what was written before they began their task, Mr. Ashley and Mr. Hutton have been able for the first time to put the English public in possession of the real political meaning of the movement of which the Artevelde were the leaders and victims. James van Artevelde—his son was intellectually and in all respects inferior to him, and was, in fact, but the instrument of a stronger spirit, Peter van den Bossche, who found the name of Artevelde a good one to conjure with—was something more than the ambitious brewer and blatant demagogue who figures in the pages of Froissart and others. The struggle of the Flemish Towns, and particularly of Ghent, in the fourteenth century against the Counts of Flanders, and their suzerains, the Kings of France, was by no means a "battle of kites and crows," as Mr. Bright once declared English history before Egbert to be. As Mr. Ashley puts the matter, in a careful and judicious summing-up,—

"In future, it will be James van Artevelde's chief claim to recollection that under him the artisans in Flanders gained their first great victory in the struggle for political rights. That victory was not permanent; nor, when an ultimate settlement was attained—for everywhere the craftsmen gained some share in self-government—did it take the exact shape he contemplated. But the importance of his action is not thereby diminished; and that he carried through the change with so little violence justifies us in judging his conduct wise and firm. . . . Finally, it repays even so tedious an investigation as this is likely to seem, to find that the history of the Flemish towns in the fourteenth century is the record, not of jealous and meaningless squabbles, and of the uproars of 'the residuum,' but of an intelligible advance in the world's order."

These works are unlike each other both in their merits and their demerits. Mr. Ashley's style is more academic than Mr. Hutton's; and he is a more painstaking and scientific historical investigator. We cannot imagine him condescending to such painfully plain thought and writing as this:—"To the wine-drinking knights and chroniclers, a brewer of the thick, muddy, ill-fermented beer of those times, which needed an admixture of honey to render it at all palatable, may well have seemed a common fellow of very plebeian origin;" or the rather Teniersish humour of "the fourteenth century was remarkable, if for nothing else, for the invention of the day-shirt and the night-dress." Still less can we suppose him indulging in the crude political pessimism of "As it was in the Flemish communes, as it is in the United States, so it will be in the British Isles, should the populace succeed in gaining the upper-hand. Men of birth, position, and mental culture will withdraw from the management of public affairs, and will abandon the arena to men of the baser sort, pushing, pretentious, and self-sufficient." Mr. Ashley is much more cautious in his judgments than Mr. Hutton, as a single instance of difference of opinion between them will serve to show. As is well known, one of the reasons that led a Ghent mob to murder James van Artevelde in his own house was a belief that he was in favour of a scheme for making that Prince of Wales, who was the son of Edward III., Count of Flanders. Mr. Hutton, following Lettenhove, refuses to entertain any such idea, and refers to a proclamation which had been issued by Edward III. in his character of claimant of the French Throne, and in consequence, of the suzerainty of Flanders, with its "good towns" and their administrators. No mention was made in this proclamation of conferring the position of Count on the Prince. "But," says Mr. Ashley, with no little sagacity,—

"The document in question really proves nothing; it merely shows how unsatisfactory the state of things had become. The Count and his heirs were to have an indefinitely long period allowed them wherein to acknowledge Edward as suzerain; until this had been done, the Government was to be in the hands of Edward's allies, i.e., the Rewaert assisted by the good towns. The English reader will notice the resemblance between this plan and that proposed by Sanicroft for the government of England after the flight of James II. James's royal dignity was to be left intact, though he had left England and was plotting to regain his authority by force, but the Regent William of Orange was to govern the country. So, in the case of Flanders, there was to be a Count wandering about in France and Brabant, continually endeavouring to reconquer his county, which was to be ruled by the Rewaert and the Three Members. So absurd a scheme could not possibly work. A succession of exiled Counts whose rights were left intact, and of Rewaerts who had all real power, would have been as ridiculous as parallel lines of Stuart Kings and Orange Regents. Moreover, the title 'Count of Flanders' was actually conferred by Henry VI. upon his uncle Humphrey of Gloucester, so that the idea of gaining the county for a member of the Royal Family seems to have been by no means strange to English politicians. For the Flemings to choose another Count, with the consent of their Sovereign, was the natural way out of their difficulty in 1345; and it may be regarded as a proof of Artevelde's wisdom that he not only felt this, but also saw that to give that dignity to a son of Edward would be an effectual means of securing vigorous English support against France."

On the other hand, Mr. Hutton's style is free from the buckram stiffness that marks Mr. Ashley's volume, and which is, perhaps, due to the fact of its being a prize essay. It is arranged on a more intelligible plan; the "battle-pieces" are decidedly more vigorous, and in such chapters as an interesting one on "Social Life in Flanders," Mr. Hutton deals fully with matters which do not come within Mr. Ashley's scope. Both volumes should be read by any one who wishes thoroughly to understand the movement of which the Artevelde were the leaders.

There can now be no question that James van Artevelde was a very remarkable man, and during the nine years or so—between 1336 and 1345—of his governorship and "captaincy" of Ghent was wonderfully, if not perfectly, successful, alike in his domestic and in his foreign politics. Mr. Hutton says truly enough of the Dutch, as contrasted with the Flemish, love of liberty, that the one was an instinct, the other a spasmodic sentiment. There was nothing spasmodic, however, about James van Artevelde; there was nothing even sentimental, if we except his wonderful eloquence. From first to last, he appears as a robust and wary opportunist. When the war between Edward III. and Philip of Valois, in 1336, and the distress caused in Ghent by Edward's prohibition of the exportation of English wool, brought him to the front, first as an adviser, and then as a municipal and military leader, he had an exceedingly difficult part to play. The free governments of the Flemish towns had sunk into oligarchies composed of the leading merchant or poorter families, who had made the magistracy a hereditary privilege. Pressing hard upon the oligarchy were the great artisan guilds which really made Ghent and Bruges what they were, and of which the society of the weavers, to which Artevelde originally belonged, was the most powerful.

The struggle seemed certain to end in civil war or revolution. Then, the Flemish towns were the victims of the quarrels, and still oftener of the alliances, between the Kings of France and the Counts of Flanders, who were a race of cruel and vacillating tyrants, and of whom the two that figured most in the days of the Artevelde, Louis de Crecy and Louis de Male, were perhaps the weakest and worst. Artevelde had both to break down the supremacy of the burgher aristocracy without violence, and to establish the practical independence of Flanders, being hampered all the while by the conspiracies of a French party among the citizens, and still more among the rural noblesse, known as the "Leliaerts." He did wonders during the short time that he was Captain of Ghent. By organising an armed neutrality of the Flemish towns, and playing off Philip against Edward, he contrived for all practical purposes to get rid of the yoke of the Count. Mr. Ashley says that this neutrality of Ghent and its allies was "no prophetic anticipation of the modern neutrality of Belgium, as some have thought, but a compromise between their feudal duties and their economic necessities." But would there have been anything very surprising, had a man of such capacity and patriotism as Artevelde been a prophet to so limited an extent? In the domestic politics of Ghent, he appears as a moderate or thin-end-of-the-wedge reformer. For this rôle his own position eminently qualified him, for we may safely believe, with Mr. Ashley, that he "belonged to a well-to-do merchant family, possibly also connected by marriage with the country noblesse; yet not within the circle of those great families which practically shared between them the government of the town. His interests, therefore, were not so bound up with those of the ruling caste as to prevent his adopting the opposite cause." So he contented himself with establishing or reviving for administrative purposes the division of his fellow-citizens into three classes or "members," the poorters or merchant families, the weavers, and the neringhen or minor crafts. The burgher oligarchs, who had submitted to the leadership of Artevelde when he was contending against their common enemies, Philip and Louis, turned upon him when the danger they dreaded had passed away, and, raising the cry that he had sold Flanders to England, acted in such a way as to bring about his death at the hands of an ignorant and infuriated mob composed of members of the small guilds. But his work as a political reformer was done; the Flemish artisans became independent of the merchants. With him, indeed, fell the English alliance, and the neutrality or independence of Flanders. But the "idea" involved in his work survived, to bear fruit within the present century.

In romance, Philip van Artevelde is a more picturesque figure than his father, but in actual history he counts for much less. He is commonly said to have been more of a dreamer than of a man of action, although this view seems to be supported chiefly by his fondness for angling. But he made no attempt to revenge his father's death or complete his work. It was not till 1381, or thirty-six years after the death of James van Artevelde, that a crisis in the history of his native city brought him to the front. Count Louis de Male had succeeded in stirring up war between the two old allies, Bruges and Ghent. Ghent was besieged, and its citizens had to choose between death by starvation, and a peace that would have placed them absolutely at the mercy of their tyrant. Peter van den Bossche, the popular leader, conceived the idea of rousing the spirits of his brethren by charming with the name of Artevelde, and Philip was elected to his father's position of Captain of the city. After a vain attempt to secure an honourable peace, he headed a desperate sally of the Gantois against their besiegers, which proved perfectly successful; and in the rout of Bevershoutsveld, Louis de Male nearly found the death he deserved. But success seems to have turned Philip's head. He became fond of show, if he did not also give way to self-indulgence. He manifested but little military skill. When, in 1382, the King of France came to the aid of his vassal and invaded Flanders, Philip exhibited in his defensive operations only carelessness and self-confidence, and his defeat and death at Roosebeke were the result entirely of his own blundering. Philip van Artevelde was a gallant man and a patriot. But James was more; he was a skilful diplomatist, a military tactician of no mean skill, and a political reformer of foresight and prudence. His career was a tragedy, a torso; but this may be said of the careers of almost all able men of Liberal ideas in Europe, four centuries ago.

WE have derived much more pleasure than we at first expected to receive from the "reminiscences" of a comparatively young man, naturally restrained from much personal remark by the fact that the majority of the persons whom he has met still live. Lord Ronald's advantages, however, have been unusually great, from his being a member of one of the highest and most respected of our aristocratic families, closely connected with so many others of the same rank, and with the entrée of all those houses where the most distinguished persons in all the walks of life were often to be seen. He is, at the same time, endowed with considerable literary and still more artistic taste, and has moved about the world with that greater freedom which is often more fully enjoyed by younger sons than by their fathers or eldest brothers, and his æsthetic tendencies have often led him into scenes of a more Bohemian character than those of his natural surroundings. He seems to have kept a sort of diary from a very early age, and to have noted in it with great honesty and simplicity his impressions of all that he saw.

There are in these volumes pleasant descriptions of many of the great houses of this country, with their magnificent art collections, beginning with Stafford House, Cliveden, Trentham, and that most unique and charming of baronial residences, Dunrobin Castle; and later, there is much good reading in an account of a very enjoyable tour through England in his own trap, in the year 1872, in the course of which he visited Hatfield, full of Elizabethan recollections, Woburn Abbey, Castle Ashby (Lord Northampton's), Great Brington, where lie the ancestors of George Washington; Holdenby House, so closely connected with the times of Charles I., Warwick and Stratford; Charlecote, the supposed scene of Shakespeare's deer-stealing; Hardwicke, &c., and so on to York. The historical facts connected with all these places are shortly and agreeably alluded to, though their pictures and statues, of course, attracted the author's special attention. We should, however, have liked a little more Art criticism than we find here, as well as in other parts of these volumes. The remarks on the architecture of some of the houses are more satisfactory, and sometimes deservedly severe.

Lord Ronald went to the Continent with Dr. W. H. Russell during the Franco-German war, of which he contrived, through a good deal of roughing, to see some portion; and in 1878 he went to Australia by the Pacific route, crossing the American continent, and returning by Hong Kong. This was a trip the motive of which was most creditable to his heart and to his energy. An intimate friend had been subjected to some undeserved calumny, and taking it much to heart, had disappeared from his native land, being supposed to have gone to Australia; and Lord Ronald, full of generous devotion to his friend, made this journey for the purpose of urging his return, a journey in which he saw much that is worth seeing, but in the main object of which he unhappily failed:—

"I was ready to sacrifice a great deal for him, and I sacrificed much, but I do not regret the feeling that prompted my voyage to Australia, although few, I imagine, ever understood it, and therefore there is little danger of many acting as I did. 'Friendship,' as Lord Beaconsfield has written, 'is the gift of the Gods.' I knew my friend was unjustly and cruelly treated, and I would not turn from him in the hour of trouble; on the contrary, I then only knew how deep was my friendship for him."

This book is naturally full of glimpses of the author's own numerous relatives, and of many of his ancestors. His remarks on some of the latter are not altogether complimentary, but in regard to persons who have lived in the memory of the present generation, there is not one word unduly catering to the passion for vulgar gossip, or calculated to wound the feelings of any one. His admiration for his mother, the late Duchess, amounts almost to idolatry; and certainly, if idolatry of a fellow-mortal is excusable in any case, it is so in the son of such a parent. The following words about his maternal uncle, the seventh Lord Carlisle (better known as Lord Morpeth), are true, and to the point;—

"My uncle Carlisle was born and bred a Whig. He filled many appointments in the Liberal administrations of the day, those in connection with Ireland with a success and popularity that are not yet forgotten. But he was something more than a mere politician; he possessed wide and deep sympathies, and, though not a genius, had high talents. The poetic fire which only smouldered in his grandfather's breast burned vigorously in his. He had a power beyond any one I have known of attracting and attaching people. There was about him a bonhomie, a sympathy, and a kindness that were quite irresistible, that made you forget his homely face, and that won your heart."

Among the descriptions of great entertainments and pageants which Lord Ronald has seen, and which are told with a pleasant enjoyment, mainly æsthetic, of all that is stately, and without the smallest taint of self-exaltation, we have not space to linger. Perhaps that on which he dwells with most enthusiasm is the reception of Garibaldi at Stafford House, in 1864, when all London went mad about the Italian patriot, and the eager mob packed every avenue to Stafford House, so as to render Garibaldi's entrance to it almost impossible:—

"Garibaldi at last found repose within the great hall of Stafford House; but from without, long after the hero of the people was out of their sight, the shouting of the crowds could be heard. . . . Needless to say what he looked like then, as ill-health and rheumatism had bowed the strong frame and thinned the lion-like head. He was very lame, from the Aspromonte wound. He wore a sort of large pork-pie hat, and grey overcoat lined with red cloth, his famous, but not his only, as ill-natured people said of the article of apparel, red flannel shirt, with a loose black tie round his neck."

The next day he was the guest of the Dowager Duchess, at Chiswick, where he met, amongst others, Mr. Gladstone. "Garibaldi, on being presented to Gladstone, said, as he grasped his hand, 'Précurseur.'"

The next time Lord Ronald saw Garibaldi, he was lying wounded and ill, sick at heart and in body, in a little dark room in an inn in the Tyrol. He afterwards visited him in his island home at Caprera, busy in the cultivation of his orange trees, completely lame, but "in great talk."

As might be expected from the known friendship between Mr. Gladstone and the author's mother, Lord Ronald has seen a good deal of the present Prime Minister, both in society and at Hawarden. He also met frequently Lord Beaconsfield, and visited him at Hughenden. "Dizzy," as he generally calls him, seems to have entertained a strong affection for his young friend; indeed, his expressions of regard, both in conversation and in writing, are somewhat fulsome. The following anecdote is amusing. The author was on a visit to Hughenden, in 1880:—

"He said that during all last Session, even when at Hughenden, he was never free from worry from his former colleagues and Ministers; 'Every train brought some ex-Cabinet Minister to Hughenden, Lord Cairns, or Mr. W. H.—or is it H. W. Smith? I never know which it is—or Mr. Secretary Cross, whom I always forget to call 'Sir Richard.''" I think Lord Beaconsfield is utterly and entirely sick and worried to death by political life, and would gladly give up the burden of being leader of his party; 'but,' as he says, ruefully, 'they will not let me give it up.' His mixture of humour, drollery, and pathos, when talking of these things, was quite indescribable."

Was there not a considerable taint of affectation, and a shadow of snobbishness, in this apparently offhand statement about the Christian names of two of his respectable and most useful colleagues? We do not fancy that Lord Beaconsfield ever forgot Lord Ronald's name.

"As we stood in the porch, amidst marble vases and busts, ferns, and flowers, the post arrived, and with it the Times, which contained Mr. Gladstone's letter thanking the public for their sympathy with him during his illness. 'Did you ever hear anything like that?' It reminds me of the Pope blessing the world from the balcony of St. Peter's," said my host. . . . We had been looking at some prints, one of which represented Whitehall, and I asked him if he had any doubt as to the side of the Banqueting-house on which Charles I. was executed. He answered me something to the following effect: 'Some time ago, a Tory squire had brought his two sons to see him, and to receive words of advice as to their future conduct in political and social existence. Eagerly the fond parent waited to hear what his leader would deliver on so important a subject. "Never," said Lord Beaconsfield, in his most solemn tones, "never in society ask who wrote Junius's Letters, or on any account inquire on which side of the Banqueting-house Charles I. was beheaded, or, if you do, you will be voted a bore, and that is, well,—something dreadful.'"

Our author, who takes a very amiable view of most things, seems to have taken this rebuke good-naturedly. Speaking of the Fenian rising in Ireland, Lord Beaconsfield said:—

"Only three men succeeded in stopping it; those three were Mayo, Hardy, and I. Of the history of how that movement was stopped, partly, it seems, by paying well some informers in Ireland, no one will ever know; for Mayo is dead, Lord Cranbrook never writes about anything, and I have not kept a single note or even memorandum of that most strange and curious time.' . . . How Dizzy must have enjoyed all the mystery and almost halo of romance that shrouded that mysterious history of what was very nearly being as serious a rising in Ireland as '98!"

All the little glimpses we have of Lord Beaconsfield show that curious mixture of practical sagacity and of a grandiose attitude of mind which formed the basis of his unique character. On a later occasion (November 8th, 1880), Lord Ronald saw him for the last time. He sat talking over recollections of forty years back. "Dreams! dreams! dreams!" he murmured, gazing at the fire, and smoking a cigarette."

We must now take leave of these very readable volumes. If they contain no evidence of remarkable power, they will at least convey much pleasure to a large number of persons. To the very young, they will afford glimpses of persons and events most of which happened just before their time; and to an older generation, they will recall many things which, in the hurry of contemporaneous history, soon pass into comparative oblivion. They will be read by many for these reasons, and by more on account of the social position of their author. The latter will find them very "human," as Carlyle, with amusing naïveté, says of the talk of the late Prince Consort. Containing, as they do, about as little egotism as it is possible for a diary to contain, they certainly convey an impression of the modesty, as well as the warm-heartedness of the author. These qualities disarm criticism, otherwise we should have been disposed to remark more severely on the style, which, though in many parts very good, is in others slipshod. It is to be hoped that if Lord Ronald is writing a life of Marie Antoinette, for whose memory he has an enthusiastic regard, he will devote a little more attention to English. Some carelessness of style may be excusable in reminiscences, which would not be so in the biography of an historical personage.

AN ENGINEER'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.*

THIS is a volume which deserves, and will, no doubt, obtain, an extensive circulation. It illustrates the moral to be drawn from Dr. Smiles's Self-help, and will prove of special interest to young readers, not only for the facts it contains, but for the energy and hopefulness it inspires. Some objection may be made to Mr. Nasmyth's definition of engineering as "common-sense applied to use of materials." Common-sense is a valuable quality, almost invaluable, indeed, when combined with others, but alone it has never succeeded in producing a memorable achievement in engineering or architecture, any more than it has been able to build up a great poem. Very early in life, Mr. Nasmyth's unfaltering resolution and courage gave him all the success he desired; but it must not be forgotten that these gifts were the servants of genius, and that without that undefinable power he would never have made the discoveries for which he is so justly famed. It is not true that genius is only an infinite capacity of taking pains, though it is undoubtedly true that genius without the painstaking is a useless possession.

This account of an intensely active life enchains the reader's attention from the opening page. Mr. Nasmyth, who was born in 1808, belongs to a family distinguished for ability. Scotchman-like, he has a long pedigree, and we are told that among his ancient kinswomen was a certain Elspeth Naesmyth, who was burnt to death as a witch, chiefly because she kept four black cats, and read her Bible with two pairs of spectacles,—a practice which shows that she possessed the spirit of an experimental philosopher." His great-grandfather and grandfather were architects, and the latter built some of the earliest houses erected in the New Town of Edinburgh. He took special pride in the sound quality of his work, and the houses he built more than a century ago are said to be still in perfect condition. Those were the good old times, when the world was less troubled by scamped work. Is it a plain statement of fact, or a pleasing imagination, which leads the author to write?—

"Masters and men lived together in mutual harmony. There was a kind of loyal family attachment among them, which extended through many generations. Workmen had neither the desire nor the means for shifting about from place to place. On the contrary, they settled down with their wives and families in houses of their own, close to the workshops of their employers. Work was found for them in the dull seasons, when trade was slack, and in summer they sometimes removed to jobs at a distance from head-quarters. Much of this feeling of attachment and loyalty between workmen and their employers has now expired. Men rapidly remove from place to place. Character is of little consequence. The mutual feeling of good-will and zealous attention to work seems to have passed away. Sudden change, scamping, and shoddy have taken their place."

Mr. Nasmyth himself seems, on the whole, to have been fortunate in the skill and attachment of his men, even in these days of "scamping;" but more than once he had to fight with the Union, and fought successfully. His motto was "Free-trade in ability," and he observes, somewhat unfairly, that the "indolent equality which Union men aim at is one of the greatest hindrances to industrial progress." From this digression we must return to the beginning of the story. Alexander Nasmyth, the father, has more than one claim on our remembrance. As a portrait-painter he rose to eminence, and the best portrait of Burns is from his hand. In landscape, like his son Patrick, he so excelled, that he has been called the father of landscape-painting in Scotland, and he was frequently employed by the Scottish nobility as a landscape gardener. He was also successful as a scene-painter, so successful that David Roberts called his art wonderful, and founded his style upon it. As an architect, modeller, and mechanic, he showed originality, and, to illustrate the readiness of his resources, it may be mentioned that when the Duke of Athol wished the inaccessible summit of Craigybarns to be crowned with foliage, Alexander Nasmyth solved the difficulty by filling a number of canisters with seeds and firing them from a cannon. The elder Nasmyth was blessed with a large family. His six daughters possessed, in a greater or less degree, an innate love of art, and painted landscapes in oils. Of the six, we are not told which was the most successful, but Margaret might well make art her vocation, for the writer of this review possesses a charming picture from her hand which bears no traces of the amateur, and is worthy of her brother Patrick. Mr. Nasmyth's account of his boyhood in Edinburgh contains several graphic illustrations of the homely life led in those days by the citizens of "Auld Reekie." The greatest of those citizens was then in his prime, and the author relates that many times when taking a "daunder" through the historic houses in the wynds and closes of the Old Town he met Scott, and listened to his deep, earnest voice, while narrating to his companions some terrible incident in regard to their former inhabitants. Here is one pleasant memory of Sir Walter,—but are not all memories of him pleasant?—

"I remember one day, when sitting beside my father making a very careful drawing of a fine bronze coin of Augustus, that Sir Walter Scott entered the room. He frequently called upon my father, in order to consult him with respect to his architectural arrangements. Sir Walter caught sight of me, and came forward to look over the work I was engaged in. At his request, I had the pleasure of showing him my little store of coin treasures, after which he took out of his waistcoat-pocket a beautiful silver coin of the reign of Mary, Queen of Scots, and gave it to me, as being his 'young brother antiquarian.' I shall never forget the kind, fatherly way in which he presented it."

The boy had a strong taste for art, and became a skilled draughtsman. All through life he found the use of the pencil indispensable, but the bent of his genius was mechanical, and at the age of thirteen he learnt the earliest lessons of his craft in an iron-foundry. His eager passion for all mechanical work was displayed in many directions. At seventeen he was able to construct working models of steam-engines, one of which was used by a Professor of the Edinburgh University in his lectures on natural philosophy. There was a smithy belonging to an engineer near his father's house, where a forge-fire and anvil were always placed at young Nasmyth's service, and in return he made his friend an engine to drive the large turning-lathe and the other machinery of his small foundry. The engineer afterwards told him "that the busy hum of the wheels, and the active, smooth, rhythmic sound of the merry little engine, had, through some sympathetic agency, so quickened the strokes of every hammer, chisel, and file in his workmen's hands, that it nearly doubled the output of work for the same wages." One mechanical success followed another, and at nineteen the young engineer constructed a road steam-carriage, which was used several times on the Queensferry Road. Nasmyth aimed at higher achievements than these, and set his heart on obtaining admission, no matter in how humble a capacity, to Maudsley's Works in London. There he felt sure he should learn as he could learn nowhere else the whole range of his profession. He had great obstacles to overcome. Mr. Maudsley had ceased to take pupils, nor could Nasmyth's father have paid the large premium required, had the firm been open to receive it. The young man, however, was not to be daunted. He executed several specimens of mechanical drawings, and made with special care a complete working model of a high-pressure engine. With these proofs of his craftsmanship he sailed for London with his father, in a Leith smack. The elder Nasmyth had been previously introduced to Maudsley, and now father and son were shown over the works. James Nasmyth was astonished and delighted, and seeing a man cleaning out the ashes from under the boiler furnace, he expressed a wish to serve the master engineer even in that humble capacity. "I shall never forget,"

he writes, "the keen but kindly look that he gave me. 'So,' said he, 'you are one of that sort, are you?' I was inwardly delighted at his words." Having obtained a ready permission to bring his drawings and models for inspection, on the following day he did so, and sprang at once into the position which was the darling aim of his ambition. His post of honour was Mr. Maudsley's private workshop, and he was treated not as a workman or an apprentice, but as a friend. A brilliant course was now before him, but one, it must not be forgotten, of severe manual as well as mental labour, for James Nasmyth was not like one of the kid-glove apprentices so hateful to the engineer. Moreover, he was content with wages which a day-labourer would now disdain, and contrived to live in London upon ten shillings a week. His dinner, he tells us, cost 4½d.; his breakfast and tea, about 4d. each; and his lodging, 3s. 6d. a week. In the following year, the thrifty Scotchman adds, "My wages were raised to fifteen shillings a week, and then I began to take butter to my bread." Such privation was but a trifle, for every day brought new knowledge, and "to be permitted to stand by and observe the systematic way in which Mr. Maudsley would first mark or line-out his work, and the masterly manner in which he would deal with his materials, was a treat beyond all expression."

In his twenty-third year Mr. Nasmyth began business for himself in a workshop in Edinburgh, thence he went to Manchester, and was introduced to the Messrs. Grant, the Brothers Cheeryble of Dickens, the elder of whom told him to keep his heart up, and "if," he added, "on any Saturday night I wanted money to pay wages or other expenses, I would find a credit for £500 at 3 per cent. at his office, and no security." Another friend and well-known banker offered him a credit of £1,000 at the usual bank-rate. But such help was not needed, thanks to the young engineer's economy and industry. Wherever Mr. Nasmyth went he was received with good-will, and we are not surprised to read that he has never known what it is to experience ingratitude or selfishness from the world, since it is generally selfish and ungrateful people who have most to complain of on this score. He was still quite young when he opened, on a small scale, the Bridgewater Foundry, destined ere long to become famous as a vast centre of industry. The chapter describing the beginning of the enterprise is one of the most interesting of the volume, and in curious harmony with the rest of the narrative is Mr. Nasmyth's account of his courtship and marriage, written after forty-two happy years of married life. But we must pass on, with the remark that the simple way in which the story is told adds much to its attraction.

Mr. Nasmyth kept a Scheme Book, which he opened freely to foreign visitors. One day, when the famous steam-hammer was invented, but before it was brought into existence, M. Schneider, proprietor of ironworks at Creuzot, called at the Bridgewater works, and in Mr. Nasmyth's absence looked over the drawings of the hammer. What was the inventor's surprise, some time later, upon visiting Creuzot, to find his hammer at work. It was time to take out a patent, and to construct the machine, which could be made to give so gentle a blow as to crack the end of an egg placed in a wine-glass on the anvil, while the next blow might be "sensibly felt" at a distance of two miles. Far and wide the fame of the steam-hammer spread, but Mr. Nasmyth had supplied twelve to the Russian Government before our Admiralty had ordered one. An order came at length, and by a stroke of good-fortune the Lords of the Admiralty, then on their annual tour of inspection, witnessed its action in the Dockyard at Devonport. The result was an order "to supply all the Royal Dockyard forge departments with a complete equipment of steam-hammers." Afterwards, the hammer was applied to pile-driving, with what success Mr. Nasmyth shall relate:—

"There was a great deal of curiosity in the dockyard as to the action of the new machine. The pile-driving-machine men gave me a good-natured challenge to vie with them in driving down a pile. They adopted the old method, with two great pile logs of equal size and length,—70 ft. long and 18 in. square. At a given signal, we started together. I let in the steam, and the hammer at once began to work. The four-ton block showered blows at the rate of eighty a minute, and in the course of four and a half minutes my pile was driven down to its required depth. The men working at the ordinary machine had only begun to drive. It took them upwards of twelve hours to complete the driving of their pile."

The writer's vigorous life in England did not suffice for his activity. In the execution of orders and the acquisition of knowledge, he travelled all over Europe, and laid up a store of happy memories, many of which are recorded in these pages. Apart from his extensive business, he had his home amusements, among which must be reckoned the study of astronomy and the construction of a telescope. For many years he pursued a careful and systematic study of the moon, and he is also known as the discoverer of willow-leaf-shaped objects on the sun's surface. A list of Mr. Nasmyth's inventions and technical contrivances is given at the close of a volume, for which the public is probably indebted to Dr. Smiles. Without his prompting, it is unlikely that the now venerable inventor of the steam-hammer would have related his interesting story.

BRAHMO ECLECTICISM.*

WE have termed the curious phenomenon to which we are about to call our readers' attention "Brahmo-eclecticism," but that is not the proper title for it. "Brahmo-syncretism" would be the true term did not so uncommon a term sound pedantic, for Syncretism is the pounding-together of radically different faiths into a kind of amalgam of religions, while eclecticism is only the selection of the true parts of each by the help of some higher criterion of truth without which eclecticism is a mere arbitrary caprice of taste. Syncretism was not infrequent during that collapse of heathen faiths and philosophies which was contemporaneous with the rise of Christianity, and it is Syncretism, not eclecticism, which appears to be the aim of Keshub Chunder Sen, in the very strange attempt to initiate what he calls that "new dispensation," to which Positivists, Theists, Christians, Buddhists, Mahomedans, and Hindoos shall be alike attracted.

In the valuable Brahmo Year-book (for 1882), edited by Miss S. D. Collet, we find a record of the curious phase of religious experiment into which excursions are being made by the former leader of the Brahmo-Somaj, who is now the head only of what we may call the degenerate Brahmo-Somaj,—that part of the Brahmo-Somaj which is less jealous of idolatry than ambitious of influence and of the novel excitements which bring at least temporary influence. Here is an extract from Mr. Sen's Pocket Almanac and Diary for 1883:—

"1. [The 'Harmony of Prophets.'] From Mr. Sen's "Brahmo Pocket Almanac and Diary" for 1883.

3. Prayer for Thursday. From the same.

'Beloved Spirit, they object to my dancing before Thee. I do not see the force of their objection. Perpetually to dance and smile, that is my aspiration. Lord, gratify my heart's desire.'

That reminds one of Comte's attempt to make the ghosts of saints' days for those who do not believe in the saints, but who rather value the luxury of thinking patronisingly about saints in whom they do not believe. Yet the prayer for Thursday does not exactly remind us of Comte, only of the Oriental world for which it was composed. The following extract from a publication of Mr. Sen's,—the New Dispensation, of August 13th, 1882,—explains more fully the strange prayer for the day which the disciples of the New Dispensation devote to thoughts of their adversaries, adversaries who in this case appear to be so termed because they make light of religious dances:—

"On Tuesday last, at Lily Cottage, the Minister founded the institution of the New Dance. Boys, young men, and men, successively formed three concentric circles, each performing a rotation in a separate direction within its own ring. The singing and the enthusiasm were intense. The Minister concluded the dance with a short prayer and pranam. He contemplates to make this new dance as accurate, natural, and picturesque as possible. The first experiment was successful."

Further, on September 10th, 1882, the New Dispensation wrote as follows:—

* The Brahmo Year-book for 1882, being Records of Work and Life in the Theistic Churches of India. Edited by Sophia Dobson Collet. London: Williams and Norgate. 1883.

"(Ibid., September 10th, 1882.) 'The New Dance on the occasion of our late holy festival was a success. If it failed at all, it was because of too much success. The number of dancers doubled and trebled in no time, and exceeded all calculations, and the enthusiasm was so great that the limited space in front of the Vēdi [pulpit] where the dance took place, soon became hot as a furnace. Yet the shout and the gallop, and the joyous whirl round and round went on, and it was quite a blessed sight to see so many boys, and youths, and men of maturer years all dancing around their Invisible Mother in the centre. The three "circles" wore chudders of different colours, yellow, white, and brown, and as they moved, one within another, with hands upraised, keeping time according to the deep, sweet sound of the sacred Mridanga, the sight was both cheering and inspiring. The limited accommodation proved a source of inconvenience, and everybody felt that the New Dance required a much larger area, where hundreds might join and dance merrily. There was the flag of the New Dispensation, and the usual accompaniment of native dance; the jingling nepur [anklet], was not wanting on the occasion. Bhai Kunja Bihari led the dance.' (This scene, be it observed, took place in the Mandir itself.)"

But the most curious of all the illustrations of Mr. Sen's syncretism, i.e., attempt to amalgamate the different popular religions known to him, into one compound of irreconcilable elements, is quoted as follows by Miss Collet, in her very interesting Year-book :—

"The next gleaning is entitled 'The Magic of the New Dispensation,' and appears in Mr. Sen's own paper of April 1st, 1883. The juggler whose feats are here recorded was Mr. Sen himself. The name of Hari (an incarnation of Krishna) is a favourite synonym of Deity with Mr. Sen and his disciples :—'The Juggler who appeared, on Tuesday last, in the last scene of the New Dispensation Drama, explained the deeper principles of the New Faith as they had never been explained before. There was the magician waving his magic wand, using his magical apparatus, and performing wonderful conjuring tricks amid enthusiastic cheers. And yet there was a deep spirituality in every word that was said, in every magical feat that was performed. It was not a juggler playing tricks, although that was on the boards; but it was a teacher who taught wisdom through allegories and metaphors. Great prophets and seers have spoken in parables, but this clownish-looking Juggler of the New Dispensation enacted parables, if we may so say. He knelt before a plantain tree and humbly entreated it to reveal the autograph of its Lord and Master. And then he cut off a large leaf with a knife, and lo! the name of Hari was found inscribed thereon. The trunk of the tree then yielded, under the Juggler's bidding, the nectar of God's love, through a small pipe he attached to it, first as rose-water and then as sherbet. God is not only visible, said he, but He always speaks through Nature, and the devotees hear him. Let the clamour of passions subside, and His gospel will be heard. And so it was. The sweet hymn "I am the Holy Spirit" was chanted behind the scene, and the audience listened reverently. Thus, said the Juggler, with an air of triumph, God can be seen and heard, and His love tasted by every believer to-day as in days of yore. A number of beads and stones of different colours were exhibited as representing different aspects of faith and piety. They were distinct and separate from each other, and knew no common bond. A string was needed to unite them into a necklace. Such a string was furnished by the New Dispensation. The beads and the piece of thread were thrown into a magic box, and instantaneously they came out strung together. The symbols of the various religions were then exhibited, such as the Christian's Cross, the Mahometan's Crescent, and the Vedic Om, the Saiva's Trident and the Vaishnava's Khunti. These stand aloof from each other in decided antagonism, and never coalesce. Is it not possible to combine and amalgamate the truths which each represents? By dexterous shuffling, these symbols were in an instant made into one. Music served as another illustration of the unity of the New Dispensation. Different musical instruments produce different sounds, and when sounded together without method they produce a most disagreeable confusion of jarring sounds. But as the Juggler gave the signal, those very instruments played in concord, and discoursed sweet music. So the various creeds harmonise, though apparently discordant, and become as one music under the influence of the New Dispensation. Eighteen centuries ago, a sacred bird came down from heaven with glad tidings. It inspired, moved, and sanctified thousands for a time, but it soon found a formidable foe in human Reason, at whose hands it eventually fell a victim. The general impression now is that the Holy Dove is dead, and there is no inspiration now. The juggler showed a dead bird, and then to the astonishment of all present, and amid loud cheers, a living bird descended from above with a piece of paper tied round its neck, on which were inscribed the following words :—Nava Bidhān jai, Satya Dharma Samanvai.—"Victory to the New Dispensation; harmony of all religions.""

We do not wonder that Miss Collet adds, "Such is the New Dispensation, in the hands of its founder. Let us thank God that he has ceased to lead the Theistic Church of India." It is clear, indeed, that this curious experiment in symbolic Ritualism aims at satisfying the cravings expressed by all the creeds known to Mr. Sen, and at doing homage at once to the Hindoo expression of the infinite multiplicity and variety of the divine agency, to the Mahomedan expression of the divine absoluteness, and to the Christian expression of the divine spirituality and love; and that in attempting to unite them, it makes every one of them hollow and unreal. The true Theists of India, those who, under the title of the Sādhāran-Somaj, are pressing home the spirituality of Theism, are doing a good work. Only, they will find, we think, that the profound belief in God which they teach, leads them on to a craving for that further revelation of his spiritual essence and will which is found in Christ alone. But the fantastic Ritualism of Mr. Sen's compost of all religions, can lead to nothing but a theatrical worship, without solidity and without central convictions.

MISS YONGE'S STRAY PEARLS.*

THE remembrance of Miss Yonge's first novel carries back readers who have reached middle-life almost to their childhood. She has given to the public in the interval more books than it is easy to remember. It is, therefore, peculiarly pleasant to see that she can still write with vigour and freshness. A reviewer, so that he be not of the Croker sort, always finds it more agreeable to praise than to blame, and never administers censure with more regret than when he is compelled to note weakness or weariness in the new effort of a popular writer. Miss Yonge's historical manner is, in our judgment, her best. We are just a little tired of Anglican parsons, doctors, and peers, each equipped with his numerous family of sons and daughters; while each family presents the familiar varieties of the worldly, the devout, the student, the careless genius, and the black, but not too black, sheep. Anglicanism, indeed, still follows us even to Paris, in the days of the Fronde. All good Church people will be glad to read how Margaret de Ribaumont, though brought up herself in the Roman communion, records for the benefit of her grandchildren her conviction that "the English doctrine is no heresy, and that the Church is a true Church, and Catholic." Into the fold for the proper construction of which we have this satisfactory assurance, one of the heroes of the tale is finally admitted. Throughout the story Puritans meet with no favour, now and then, we should say, scarcely with fairness; nor is there much more liking for the Huguenots. Perhaps the most unamiable personage that we encounter owed, we are told, something, at least, of her odious characteristics to Huguenot antecedents.

The story of Stray Pearls belongs to the days when Anne of Austria was Regent of France, and to the early years of Louis XIV. Miss Yonge speaks very sensibly in her preface of the conditions under which the historical novel must now be written. Sir Walter Scott dealt with facts pretty much as he pleased, and took any liberty with times and places that seemed to suit the development of his plot. Authors of the present have to make, as Miss Yonge almost pathetically complains, "an entire sacrifice" of their plot, at the imperative bidding of historical accuracy, and instead of making "the catastrophe depend upon the heroes and heroines," to keep them "mere ineffective spectators." But the clear perception of this necessity really serves her in good stead. She has quite enough of the artist's faculty to make her characters live before us, and we are no more disposed to complain of their being subordinated to events than we should if they had a veritable historical existence.

Margaret de Ribaumont is a young lady born in England, but more than half French in her extraction. A marriage, arranged after the French mode, makes her Viscountess of Bellaise (there is one amusing scene describing the dismay with which she regards the withered old man whom she takes for the bridegroom, but who is really the bridegroom's father), and she follows her husband to the wars. Readers who are familiar with Miss Yonge's fictions will be prepared for the inevitable stroke which is to make Margaret a widow. The story of the bereavement is told with a pathos which is not the less effective because it is given with a restraint which the writer has not always used. The widow seeks retirement at the family château, and would have found solace in the part of a Lady Bountiful, but for the suspicions that are roused among her neighbours, and even at the centre of Government, that her benevolence generates an enmity to seigniorial rights. "The Firebrand of the Bocage," for so the benevolent lady is called, is brought back to Paris by the threat of a lettre de cachet, and of the loss of the guardianship of her son. In Paris, we are introduced to the second heroine, Mistress Annora, sister to Margaret, but thoroughly English in all her sentiments. From that point the narrative is continued in alternation by the two sisters. This is not, we think, commonly a very successful method; but Miss Yonge uses it with skill, and it is, perhaps, more peculiarly suited to the chronicle form which such a story as this must necessarily take. Nothing, too, could be better than the marked differences, most consistently kept up, between the two sisters. They are like and unlike with a contrast and a similarity which seem exactly to suit the poet's canon, "qualem decet esse sororum." It is always a pleasant change to leave the minor key of Margaret's reminiscences for the spirit and gaiety of Annora's narrative. Bred in the free air of her English home, and taught amidst the civil troubles of her country to care and to think for herself, she is ever in a most entertaining rebellion to the conventions of the courtly life to which she is introduced. Her love-history harmonises, of course, with the general independence of her character. The marriage which would have brought the long-standing family suit to so convenient a termination, finds no favour in her eyes; her heart is given to a young lawyer, who dreams that France may yet be free, and in spite of the horror of her French kinsfolk, to whom all who are not noble seem scarcely of the same humanity as themselves, she has her way. Miss Yonge has not told a better love-story than this. But, perhaps, the most spirited scene in the book is the abduction of Margaret. The Prince de Condé is very anxious that she should marry one of his followers, M. de Lamont; and he, with the help of her brother-in-law, Armand d'Aubépine, carries her off. Here, again, the double narrative is skilfully employed. Margaret, exhausted with all the excitement of the day—for she had only escaped her fate by clinging with passionate force to the image of St. Margaret in the chapel that was to have witnessed her marriage—could not have described the incidents of her rescue. These her sister tells us with great vividness. Here is an excellent scene:—

"M. d'Aubépine, who was slinking off the scene, like a beaten hound, as well he might, unaware that we were in the antechapel, caught his foot and spur in Madame Darpent's long trailing cloak, and come down at full length on the stone floor, being perhaps a little flustered with wine. He lay still for the first moment, and there was an outcry. One of the soldiers cried out to the other, as Madame Darpent's black dress and white cap flashed into the light, 'It is the holy saint who has appeared to avenge the sacrilege! She has struck him dead.' And behold the superstition affected even the licentious, good-for-nothing Abbé. Down he dropped upon his knees, hiding his eyes, and sobbing out, 'Sancta Margarita, spare me, spare me! I vow thee a silver image. I vow to lead a changed life. I was drawn into it, holy Lady Saint. They showed me the Prince's letter.' He got it all out in one breath, while some of them were lifting up D'Aubépine, and the Coadjutor was in convulsions of suppressed laughter, and catching hold of Clément's arm, whispered, 'No, no, Monsieur, I entreat of you, do not undeceive him. Such a scene is worth anything! Madame, I entreat of you,' to Meg, who was stepping forward. However, of course it could not last long, though as D'Aubépine almost instantly began to swear, as he recovered his senses, Madame Darpent unconsciously maintained the delusion, by saying solemnly in her voice, the gravest and deepest that I ever heard in a Frenchwoman, 'Add not another sin, sir, to those with which you have profaned this holy place.' The Abbé thereupon took one look and broke into another tempest of entreaties and vows, which Madame Darpent by this time heard. 'M. l'Abbé,' she said, 'I pray you to be silent; I am no saint, but a friend, if Madame will allow me so to call myself, who has come to see her to her home. But oh! Monsieur,' she added, with the wonderful dignity that surrounded her, 'forget not, I pray you, that what is invisible is the more real, and that the vows and resolution you have addressed to me in error are none the less registered in Heaven.'"

Whether this novel gives us a true picture of those strange times is more than any one can say, but it is at least truth-like. The great personages of the day, great at least by virtue of their position, move before us in a very real fashion. The Coadjutor of Paris, afterwards Cardinal de Retz, shrewd, active, vivacious, as little like the ideal Bishop as a man could well be, the proud Anne of Austria, the little King, so apt to learn the lessons of absolutism, and, perhaps, best of all, la Grande Mademoiselle, are excellent sketches. Some of the historical or quasi-historical scenes, too, are very good; Mademoiselle, for instance, making her way into Orleans, and the battle between Turenne and the Prince de Condé before the walls of Paris. On the whole, we may say that we have here a very well-written and effective story.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Bentley on the Epistles of Phalaris. Edited by the late Wilhelm Wagner, Ph.D. (Bell and Sons.)—Dr. Wagner's edition has now been added to "Bohn's Classical Library." Most readers know something of Bentley, and how he demolished the Epistles of Phalaris, and with them the reputation of their Oxford champion, from having read about the subject in Macaulay. The book itself is probably known to very few, yet few more valuable contributions to Classical literature have been made in England. The great scholar shows at his best in the admirable criticism which it contains. Afterwards, he seemed to be spoilt by the sense of mastery which his use of this powerful weapon had given him. He did some good work for Homer, but he certainly carried the licence of conjecture beyond all reasonable bounds, and there is positive absurdity in his edition of Milton. But the Phalaris is admirable. Besides doing its work so thoroughly that there never could be any need of doing it again, it is a prodigious storehouse of learning, and it is readable in a way that perhaps no other book of the kind ever was readable. Besides Phalaris, the Doctor demolished equally apocryphal Letters of Themistocles and Letters of Socrates (his dealing with the story of the two wives of Socrates is a capital example of his manner), and he did nearly as much for one Dr. Barnes, Professor of Greek in his day at Cambridge, who had the ill-fortune to excite his wrath. Barnes had emended the Scholiast who tells the story how Agamemnon asked the judgment of a Trojan captive when Ajax and Ulysses contended for the arms of Achilles. The Greek ran ἀπὸ δποτέρου τῶν Τρώων μᾶλλον ἐλυπήθησαν. This the Professor altered to ἀπὸ δποτέρου αὐτῶν οἱ Τῶες, μ. ε. Bentley simply alters the Tau into Eta, and makes Τῶες into Ἠῶες. But the culmination of his scorn is when Dr. Barnes, writing a Greek epigram, makes the second syllable of εὐπραγία short.

Diary of Royal Movements. Vol. I. (Elliot Stock.)—This promises to be a work of preposterous size. Forty pages are devoted to the eighteen years which preceded the Queen's accession to the Throne. This is moderate enough; but what are we to say of 360 allotted to the nine years and a half between the accession and the end of 1846? At this rate, to bring down this "diary" to the present time, we shall want nearly a thousand pages more. Surely the most loyal subject will think this too much to be given to the personal history—quite apart from politics—of even the most beloved and the most blameless of Sovereigns. Of course, the proportion of quite needless, or, to say the least, needlessly diffuse "records," is very great. Here is an instance. We have just had nearly a page about the Queen's visit to Sir Robert Peel at Tamworth. Then comes this notice:—"Prince Albert visited Birmingham, and inspected some of the most remarkable objects of interest in that town. In the course of the day, the Queen-Dowager also arrived at Drayton Manor, accompanied by Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, Earl Howe, and the Countess of Brownlow; so that the Premier had the distinguished honour of entertaining at one time his Sovereign and her Royal Consort, and her Majesty the Queen-Dowager, with their respective suites and attendants. In the evening a public dinner took place in the town-hall of Tamworth, to commemorate her Majesty's visit. The mayor, corporation, and principal inhabitants were present." It pushes human endurance to its extreme verge to read this once in the Court Circular, but to have it thus repeated is quite unbearable. One such volume as this given to the whole period might have been made quite readable. It is interesting to be told that the Duchess of Kent was attended at her daughter's birth by Dr. Charlotte Siebold, and to read how, after the birth of the Prince of Wales, her Majesty had the presence of mind to prevent the issue of a ludicrous announcement. "This will never do," she said to Prince Albert, when she saw the document, "because it conveys the idea that you were confined also." "Her Majesty and the Prince are perfectly well" were the words, and the Queen, it is said, insisted on the insertion of the word "infant" before "Prince." Various personages, more or less entertaining, reappear in these pages; "General Tom Thumb," for instance, and "The Boy Jones," a young gentleman possibly never heard of in this generation, who had a passion for making his way into Buckingham Palace. We are reminded of a venerable joke to which an illustrated London paper gave rise, by representing the Queen's presence at a "shearing" in Scotland by a picturesque scene of sheep-shearing. The date was September 12th. We hope that the compiler will reconsider his plans.

The Republic of Plato, Books I. and II. With Introduction, Notes, &c. By G. H. Wells, M.A. (Bell and Sons.)—Mr. Wells, who has already done some good work with Plato, having published an excellent edition of the "Euthydemus" two years ago, now follows it up with a careful and painstaking volume containing the first and second books of the Republic. We must own to a decided opinion that it is only with considerable limitations that Plato is suited for the reading of schoolboys, however advanced. The argument of the "Euthydemus," for instance, is simple enough; and there is nothing in the "Apology," which may not be readily understood. But the reasoning is often difficult to apprehend. In the "Phaedo," for instance, no reader but must feel that the argumentative part is very unsatisfactory, and presents the strongest contrast to the unsurpassed interest and vividness of the narrative. In the Republic, we should think, the student, when he has got beyond the introductory portion, will feel that he has made a change for the worse. "Plato," we should be inclined to say, is pre-eminently a book for extracts, at least when it is intended for the reading of schoolboys. A volume containing the myths, introduced, perhaps, with a brief account of the context in which they are found, would be serviceable. Mr. Wells, however, has handled his task as satisfactorily as the case admitted. He has given us an argument of the whole book, which will be useful, if not to those for whom the volume is primarily intended, yet certainly for other students, and he has furnished the text with a running commentary, dealing both with the language and the matter.

John Leech: a Biographical Sketch. By Fred. G. Kilton. (G. Redway.)—This is a very pleasant sketch of a man for whom we cannot but have a higher regard the more we know of him. Leech was intended for the profession of medicine, and retained knowledge from his early studies that were useful for his drawing in after life. But he always had, so to speak, one foot in art. He published some sketches at eighteen, and first made himself famous by a happy caricature of Mulready's postage-envelope. In August, 1841, he first contributed to Punch. He never ceased to work for that periodical, and he may be said to have done more than any one man to make it what it is. Twenty-three years afterwards he attended the weekly meeting of the contributors, and four days later he died of angina pectoris. His total earnings from Punch are stated at £40,000. He did much work besides. Dickens's Christmas Stories, "The Comic History of England," "Albert Smith's "Christopher Tadpole," and the "Bon Gaultier Ballads," to mention a few out of many books, were illustrated by him. Overwork probably shortened his life, though he drew with such facility and speed that it was difficult to realise how much his work cost him in labour. It is pleasant to recall a story which does credit to Dickens's kindness of heart. Leech was illustrating "The Battle of Life," and introduced a picture with the flight of Marian, and the wedding festivities above. He "made the mistake of supposing that Michael Warden had taken part in the elopement, and introduced his figure with that of Marian." The reader is, it is true, led into believing that it was so, but the fact was wholly otherwise, and could not but be otherwise. Dickens was horrified at the mistake, but he knew what pain it would cause to Leech to have the illustration cancelled, and he put up with it.

The Suppliant Maidens, of Aeschylus. Translated into English verse by E. D. A. Morshead, M.A. (Kegan, Paul, Trench, and Co.)—The Supplixes has been very little read, partly, doubtless, on account of the corrupt state of the text, and of a general difficulty, which has, however, as Mr. Morshead points out, been somewhat exaggerated. It will be a surprise, therefore, to not a few classical scholars, as well as to English readers, to discover from Mr. Morshead's version how much of beauty there is in the play. Of action, indeed, there is nothing, or next to nothing. The Suppliant Maidens, daughters of Danaus, arrive and beg protection from Argos and its king, against their pursuers, the sons of Aegyptus. The king promises; then comes in the herald of Aegyptus, and proceeds to force the Suppliants away. There is a dialogue between the herald and the king, which we may compare with that which takes place between Theseus and Creon in the Oedipus Coloneus. The king will not surrender the maidens, and the herald departs in wrath, menacing instant war. The action of the Prometheus is, indeed, almost equally simple, but the situation is finer, and there is the relief of interesting narrative. But the monotony of the Supplixes is relieved by the presence of much genuine poetry, and Mr. Morshead has been most successful in preserving in his translation the spirit and beauty of this. In an interesting appendix, Mr. Morshead discusses the date of the play. He is inclined to attribute it to the earliest period of the poet's literary life, a theory to which its construction certainly lends support. He does not attach much importance to the supposed political allusions which some critics consider to fix the date at about 461, when a rapprochement between Argos and Athens was taking place. To us, indeed, the words seem to have more weight than he is disposed to allow. They run thus, in Mr. Morshead's translation:—

"And let the poop's voice, the power
That sways the State, in danger's hour
Be wary, wise for all;
Nor honour in dishonour hold,
But—ere the voice of war be bold—
Let them to stronger peoples grant
Fair and unbloody covenant—
Justice and peace withal."

This is curiously minute, to be nothing more than what Mr. Morshead describes as "the prescience of a poet and political thinker." We must remember, too, that in the earliest part of the poet's career Argos still laboured under the stigma of having Medized in the Persian war, a fault which would have been peculiarly odious to a patriot such as was Aeschylus. The literary history of the play is also discussed. Mr. Morshead believes that it was the first of a trilogy, the third play of which contained the trial of the Danaides for the murder of their husbands, and their acquittal by the influence of Aphrodite. We may give, as a further specimen of the translator's manner, the following specimen:—

"I am Pelasgus, ruler of this land,
Child of Palaesthion, whom the earth brought forth;
And rightly named from me, the race who reap

This country's harvests are Pelasgian called,
And o'er the wide and westward-stretching land,
Where through the lucent wave of Strymon flows,
I rule; Perreæ's land my boundary is Northward, and Pindus' further slopes, that watch
Pæonia, and Dodona's mountain ridge.
West, east, the limit of the washing seas
Restraints my rule; the interspace is mine.
But this whereon we stand is Apian land,
Styled so of old from the great Healer's name;
For Apis, coming from Naupactus' shore
Beyond the strait, child of Apollo's self,
And like him, seer and healer, cleansed this land
From man-devouring monsters, whom the earth,
Stained with pollution of old blood-shedding,
Brought forth in malice, beasts of ravening jaws,
A grisly throng of serpents manifold."

Q. Horatii Flacci Carminum Libri IV. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by T. E. Page, M.A. (Macmillan.)—Mr. Page, after editing the four books of the "Odes" separately for the series of "Elementary Classics," has published in this volume a fuller edition, designed for the use of more advanced students. That this edition should supersede the excellent work of Mr. Wickham is more than we should like to say, while Orelli must always remain a treasury of Horatian knowledge. But a more convenient, useful, and trustworthy edition than this we do not know. There is a quite surprising amount of information compressed into a moderate compass. A book that can be carried not inconveniently in the pocket, and yet contains, we may go as far as saying, all that one most needs to know about Horace, is really a great acquisition. Mr. Page, too, is not only judicious and accurate, but as we have had occasion to remark before, in reviewing his smaller books, he is original. He says things in a fresh and forcible way, and he is happy in illustration, and on occasion he can be amusing. A propos of "barbute" for instance, a word which, Greek and Latin being reckoned together, "has the almost unique privilege of possessing three genders," he illustrates the absurdity of attributing gender to things inanimate, by remarking that "the German words for knife, spoon, and fork are of three different genders;" and he drily remarks, in reference to the doubt whether the Virgil of i., 3, was really the poet, a doubt founded on the late date of Virgil's known voyage to Greece, "For my own part, I prefer to assume that Virgil visited Greece twice, rather than to annihilate a link which connects Virgil with Horace as 'the half of life.'" In his dealing with individual passages, we find ourselves generally in accord with Mr. Page. He takes "littore Etrusco," in I., ii., 14, as meaning the Tuscan bank of the river, not, as has been commonly thought of late, the shore of the Tuscan Sea. He illustrates this view by a brief statement of the topography of the Tiber, which shows the lofty slopes of Janiculum opposite the low ground of the Forum Boarium; and he very appositely instances the effect produced on the Surrey side of the Thames by the embankment on the Middlesex shore. But he is going too far, when he says that the theory of floods being caused by winds blowing up stream is absurd. It is notorious that floods are much aggravated by this cause. A strong up-stream wind will make a difference that has to be measured by feet. In I., i., 5, "Evitata rotis palmaque nobilis," he objects to the modern suggestion of a full stop at "nobilis." It would, indeed, be unbearably weak. In l. 29 of the same ode, he takes no notice of the reading "te" for "me," a reading which will be found in many older editions, and is supposed to avoid the descent from "dis miscent superis" to "secernunt populo." Of Mr. Page's happy manner, we may quote as a specimen,— "Let any one stand before Landseer's 'Monarch of the Glen,' and say what his idea of sublimi anhelitu, as applied to a wounded stag, is." A scholar who keeps up this faculty of observation will always have something fresh to say about even the most hackneyed author.

Hints on Home Teaching. By Edwin A. Abbott, D.D. (Seeley and Co.)—There are few teachers so experienced or so skilful that they may not learn much from Dr. Abbott. The First Part of his book is devoted to "Moral Training," and contains a number of kindly and sagacious hints, which parents will find even more useful than teachers. (It is to parents, no less than to teachers, that Dr. Abbott addresses himself throughout.) We may note especially the section entitled "The Habit of Attention," where the writer enforces his teaching by an ingenious apologue, borrowed from a "teacher of considerable experience," whom he calls "Preceptor." This authority appears frequently throughout the course of the volume. As we do not find there is any acknowledgment in the preface of the great obligations under which Dr. Abbott has placed himself to him, we are probably not wrong in conjecturing that he is no less a personage than Dr. Abbott himself. If this be so, we quite agree that his judgment is one on which "great reliance" may be placed. Dr. Abbott and "Preceptor," be they one or two, set as many lessons for parents to learn as they suggest for children. It will be difficult, indeed, for any candid person to read these chapters without feeling how far short he has fallen of the standard which he ought to set before his children, and how much he has to learn in the way of sincerity and earnestness, and not a few other qualities which we expect to find better developed in our children than we can show them in ourselves. Part II. deals with "Mental Training," and gives practical suggestions as to the teaching of "Reading and Spelling" (reading should always, Dr. Abbott thinks, come first of the two), "Arithmetic" (where Dr. Abbott is much in favour of teaching by concrete forms), "English Composition and Grammar," "French and Latin" (a specially admirable and valuable chapter), "Geography, History, and Geometry," and finally, "Religious Instruction and Home Influence." We shall quote a passage from the chapter on Latin, which will be interesting to all teachers:—

"The Discouragement of Guessing.—The exercises, and especially those from Latin into English, should not be so easy as to be construed without thought. It is of the utmost importance, in teaching Latin, to force the pupil at the commencement of the study to distrust any inferences as to the meaning of a Latin sentence derived from the order of the words. 'For a very long time,' writes Preceptor '(in the course of a weekly entrance examination of the most elementary kind), I have been in the habit of asking those boys who profess to have learned Latin—almost all of whom are over thirteen years of age, and have learned Latin two, three, four, or five years—to construe the sentence, "Oppida magna boni agricolae habent," and not one in five has been able to construe these five simple words correctly. Such a translation as "they have the great towns of the good husbandman" would have been treated as satisfactory, because logical; but almost all have succumbed to the temptation of regarding "oppida" as nominative, "because it comes first;" and they have thus rushed to the conclusion, in despite of cases and grammars, that the meaning must be, "Great towns have good husbandmen."'"

Herbert Spencer on American Nervousness. By George M. Beard, M.D. (G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.)—Dr. Beard, whose book on American Nervousness we noticed in these columns some little time ago, claims, and, it seems to us, rightly claims, as his own much that has recently attracted so much attention when spoken by Mr. Herbert Spencer. Dr. Beard shows some strong resemblances between his own utterances and the utterances of Mr. Herbert Spencer; and is, perhaps, a little vexed that what he has been urging, he says, in vain, should now be accepted. He must console himself with the progress of truth.

We have received:—Two volumes of the series "Blackwood's Philosophical Classics," Hegel, by Edward Caird, LL.D., and Fichte, by Robert Adamson, M.A. (Blackwood and Sons.)—Man: an Essay, by John Lawrence (Elliot Stock), in which the writer maintains the "destructionist" theory.—A New Handbook of Anthems, for Public Worship. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—Arabic Names of the Stars, with their Meanings, by W. H. Higgins, M.B. (Samuel Clarke, Leicester.)—Notes on the Pictures in the Louvre Gallery, by Charles L. Eastlake. (Longmans.) A very convenient handbook, noticing only the more conspicuous and important examples of the vast collection which is gathered together in the Louvre—Notes on Pictures in Brera Gallery in Milan, by same author and publisher.—The Students' Mechanics; an Introduction to the Study of Force and Motion, by Walter R. Browne, M.A. (Charles Griffin and Co.)—Permanence and Evolution: an Inquiry into the Supposed Mutability of Animal Types, by S. E. B. Bouverie-Pasey. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—The Ultimatum of Pessimism, by James William Barlow. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—The Message of Psychic Science to Mothers and Nurses, by Mary Bush. (Trübner.)—

Digestion: the Passport to Health, by Dr. Alfred Wright, M.D. (W. Rider and Son), is full of sensible advice, if we could only follow it.—A second edition of "J. E. M.'s Guide to Davos-Platz," by J. E. Muddock, with notes on food, air, water, and climate, by P. Holland. (Simpkin and Marshall.)—A Summary of Military Law, by H. F. Morgan (Marcus Ward and Co.), a useful manual to all whom the subject concerns, put in the form of question and answer.—Walks in Abney Park, by James Branwhite French (J. Clarke and Co.), an account of persons, more or less eminent, buried in that cemetery. The scope of this little volume, which is reprinted from the Evangelical Magazine, is limited, with some exceptions, to those who have died within the memory of this generation. A plan of the cemetery is added.—The Aesthetic and Modern Estheticism. (Marshall, Norman, and Co., Cheltenham.) Mr. John Wooder discourses of "thought, culture, and art," and gives "a popular history of society" in a very moderate compass.—The Bibliographer, Vol. III., December, 1882, May, 1883 (Elliot Stock), containing a variety of interesting articles, among which may be mentioned Mr. N. Pocock's "Notices of the Geneva Bible," and a paper full of information, which will be mostly new to many readers, of the articles used in the manufacture of paper.—The Gas Managers' Handbook, by Thomas Newbigging (Walter King), "a third edition."—Economy of Coal in House Fires, by T. P. Teale, M.A. (Churchill.)—Art in Provincial France, the reprint of a series of letters written by J. Comyns Carr, during the summer of 1882, to the Manchester Guardian.—The Plays of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, with an introduction by Henry Morley (Routledge and Sons). This is the first of a cheap series of reprints of standard authors to be published under the title of "Morley's Universal Library." The book is clearly printed, neatly and strongly bound, and the price is one shilling.—A Theory of Creation, by J. C. Whisk, M.A. (London Literary Society).—The Lord's Prayer, homilies preached in the course of his ministry, by C. Stanford, D.D. (Macniven and Wallace, Edinburgh.)—A new edition of The Public School French Grammar, (Hachette and Co.)—Supplementary Arithmetic, by Rev. J. Hunter, M.A., showing improved methods of working some of the more advanced rules (Bell and Sons).—First Lessons in Philosophy, by M. S. Handley (T. Laurie).—A Sketch-book by R. Caldecott, reproduced in colours by E. Evans (Routledge and Sons).—The History of a Lump of Chalk, by A. Watt (A. Johnston).—Field Artillery, by Major S. C. Pratt, R.A., being the third volume of the series of Military handbooks for officers and non-commissioned officers, edited by Colonel C. B. Brackenbury, R.A. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—Part II. of the Analysis and Adulteration of Foods, by J. Bell, Ph.D., (Chapman and Hall.)—Bicycles and Tricycles, by C. Spencer (Griffith and Farran).

The popularity Pepsine has acquired as almost a specific for chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, &c., is due to the fact that it is the nearest possible production of the active principle of the gastric juice of the stomach. Unfortunately, like all other inventions of a like nature, Pepsine has been not slightly discredited by the spurious manufactures that have been issued from time to time; it is therefore necessary as a guarantee of its efficacy to see that each bottle bears the maker's name.

SPECTACLES v. BLINDNESS.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection generally employed by the mere vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDIOT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." The Rev. Prof. W. A. Hale, M.A. Cantab., 2 Minford Gardens, West Kensington Park, writes:—"The Spectacles are perfect, and a most decided boon. I had occasion on Monday to write to Lord —, and took the opportunity to mention your name, and the wonderful power of your Spectacles." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age (82). I can now read the smallest type, although suffering from cataract on the right eye." Testimonials from Earl and Countess Lindsay; F. D. Dixon Hartland, Esq., M.P.; the Venerable Archdeacon Palmer, Clifton; Rev. Mother Abbess, St. Mary's Abbey, Mill Hill, Hendon; O. J. Alford, Esq., Gas Light and Coke Company, Horseferry Road, Westminster, &c. Mr. HENRY LAURANCE, F.R.S., Oculist Optician, 39 OLD BOND STREET, W. (late 3 Endleigh Gardens, Euston Square), PERSONALLY adapts his Improved Spectacles daily (Saturdays excepted), from ten to five. Special arrangements are made for Invalids and others unable to wait on Mr. Laurance. Pamphlets—"Spectacles, their Use and Abuse," post free. City Branch—6 POULTRY, CHEAPSIDE.

THE MUSICIAN.

A Guide for Pianoforte Students. Helps towards the Better Understanding and Enjoyment of Beautiful Music. By RIDLEY PRENTICE.

"We are far from suggesting that there is any royal road for acquiring technical knowledge, but we are quite certain Mr. Ridley Prentice's road is in every way the pleasantest that has yet been laid before any pianoforte student. If any one will work through this first grade conscientiously, by the time he has reached the end of it, he will have mastered many difficulties in harmony and musical form which he might have hitherto thought were almost insurmountable. The work supplies a deficiency in musical literature which has long been felt, and we earnestly recommend the study of it to all those who wish to become intelligent pianoforte-players."—Saturday Review.

"A knowledge of form is imparted in simple and pleasant language. This is the right sort of instruction-book, for it teaches people to think and study for themselves. We heartily commend it to all who desire to understand, satisfactorily interpret, and enjoy beautiful music."—Academy.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE Comte de Chambord is reported dying. The latest accounts represent him as mending, but that always happens in the illnesses of very great persons, and previous statements have all been of the gravest character. They all agree in asserting that the Comte has tumour or cancer of the stomach, that he is incapable of taking food, and that he has suddenly wasted to a shadow of himself. No hope apparently is entertained at Vienna, whither the Comte de Paris has proceeded, while the Papal Nuncio has actually visited Frohsdorf to convey the Pope's blessing. Paris is full of rumours as to the consequences of the Count's death, some Legitimists alleging that he has willed the Crown of France to Don Jaime, son of Don Carlos, and, after the Comte de Chambord, the eldest Bourbon; and others asserting that the will will be found to devise the succession to the claimant who shall accept the White Flag. Much of all this is nonsense, the Comte de Chambord having no more power to bequeath the Crown of France, titular or real, than the Queen has to bequeath the Crown of Great Britain; but it all points to the seriousness of the division between Orléanists and Legitimists. The latter cannot abide to see their old household enemies put within the law.

Are England and France quarrelling about anything, or is the Parisian Press suddenly stricken with a cholera panic? The Paris correspondent of the Times talks of an article in the Temps about England inspired by M. Challemeil-Lacour which it is better not to discuss, the République Française rages at British malice, and the Français, M. de Broglie's organ, protests against "misunderstandings which threaten to place us in open hostility to the only Power"—naming England—"whose interests unite with ours on the European chessboard." Other journals are positively full of malignant innuendoes about the "commercial" spirit which has induced this country to bring the cholera from Bombay, and the mean jealousy with which England is resisting France all over the world. Are we resisting France, or do our contemporaries see men as trees walking? So far as the country knows, the Government is not interfering with France anywhere, and most certainly the people are not. We do not feel quite sure that M. Challemeil-Lacour, who has strong anti-British prepossessions, is not giving a cue to the Press, and should like to know what he is specially seeking. In what possible department of energy can it pay France to raise an impression that but for circumstances, her Government would at once come to a rupture with Great Britain? It is inconceivable that English action at Pekin, where our only interest and effort is to prevent war, can be so misrepresented.

Mr. Healy has carried Monaghan for Mr. Parnell, receiving 2,376 votes, or within 262 of a clear half of the registered electors. His Tory rival, Mr. Monroe, obtained 2,011 votes; and the Liberal, Mr. Pringle, only 274, an instance of political ingratitude hardly paralleled even in Ireland. Mr. Healy, it will be perceived, received more votes than both his opponents put together. The election was fought out altogether on the agrarian dispute. Mr. Healy said nothing of Home-rule, still less of Irish Independence; but promised that the Land Act should be improved in the tenants' interest, even if the land did not actually pass to the tenants. Mr. Monroe also was compelled to accept the tenants' programme, but did not promise them the land. It is said that almost every Catholic vote and 300 Protestant votes were given to Mr. Healy, but the ballot keeps its secret, and religion had very little to do with the matter; Mr. Healy is not exactly devout, and lies with his party under the direct censure of the Pope for calumniating worthy men, stirring up law-breakers, and omitting to protest against outrage-mongers. The electors of Monaghan care nothing about that, or anything else, except low rents,—an ominous sign for the future of Ireland.

The Corrupt Practices Bill has been under discussion all the week, and sincere as the House evidently is in its determination to curb the influence of wealth, we begin to fear that the Bill is too elaborate, and its prohibitions too minute, to result in a good workable measure. Its principles are hardly consistent, for while it permits private persons to lend their own vehicles for the conveyance of voters, it does not permit private persons to hire the vehicles of others for the same end, and Mr. H. Fowler's very reasonable amendment to forbid both practices was rejected. Again, while it allows candidates to hire the large room in an inn for electoral meetings, it does not allow them to take a room either in an inn or in any house of refreshment for a committee-room. And on the law of agency it seems likely to be so strict, that unless both parties are very forbearing, hardly any election in the kingdom will stand the tests of purity which this measure seems likely to apply. On the whole, we wish the Bill had insisted chiefly on a few broad principles,—including especially the strict limitation of election expenses,—and had busied itself less with minute restrictions.

On Tuesday night, an hour or more was wasted owing to the unseemly behaviour of Lord Randolph Churchill, Sir Henry Wolff, and Mr. Gorst, who on their return to the evening sitting wanted to insist on the re-reading of an amended clause which had already been re-read (soon after ten o'clock) before these gentlemen and their friends thought fit to revisit the House. Even their own party were forced to condemn their behaviour, and to point out that if every gentleman who returned late to the House insisted on having an amended clause re-read for his own behoof, no progress with a Bill could possibly be made. Lord Randolph Churchill, Sir H. Wolff, and Mr. Gorst forfeited completely on this occasion the sympathy even of extreme partisans of the Tory party like Mr. Chaplin. Discreditable pertinacity of this sort ought to be both punishable and punished.

Lord Derby, on Wednesday, announced that the Government had determined to reject the annexation of New Guinea. The Colonial Office had received despatches from Queensland, and had found no reason for the action of the local Government, except a fear that some Power was about to seize some part of New Guinea. That Government could have asked permission by telegraph, and would therefore be informed that its act was cancelled, and that while the Queen's Government would hold any descent by a foreign Power on New Guinea to be an "unfriendly act," it would not itself take the island. If, however, Australia would federate herself, and undertake the conquest of New Guinea as a State, the whole question would assume a new aspect. The Australians are not ready to do this yet, but they are vexed with the decision, and may make strong representations. These will not be less vigorous, if it is true, as reported, that the French have annexed the New Hebrides, contrary to an understanding with the British Government that neither Power should take those islands. This report, however, requires confirmation. As to New Guinea, it is clear that a Colonial annexation could not be allowed; while the delay in absorbing the island is of no importance. Australia will take it some day, if combined Europe protests.

The Times has published a summary of Lord Randolph Churchill's evidence against the Khedive. With the exception of one item, it amounts to very little. The exception is that Tewfik Khedive is said, on "reliable authority," to have forwarded to Omar Lutfi, Governor of Alexandria, just before the outbreak of June 11th, a telegram couched in these words:—"Arabi has guaranteed public safety and published it in the newspapers, and has made himself responsible to the Consul, and if he succeeds in his guarantee the Powers will trust him, and our consideration will be lost. Also, the Fleets of the Powers are in Alexandrian waters, and men's minds are excited, and quarrels are not far off between Europeans and others. Now, therefore, choose for yourself whether you will serve Arabi in his guarantee, or whether you will serve us." If that telegram was really sent, it would show that the Khedive requested Lutfi to nullify Arabi's guarantee by breaking public order, and that is Lord Randolph's allegation. He has, however, to prove the authenticity of his telegram. It is exactly the message a tricky and weak Oriental might send, though he would hardly trust the telegraph so far, and it is also exactly the message which a clever Asiatic hating the Khedive would forge to produce his ruin. Whatever the truth, we hardly wonder that the French papers ask why the British Government is just now informally trying the Khedive. Will they, if the telegram is traced to him, send him before a court-martial in his own capital? We thought they held the Khedive to be a Sovereign.

Mr. Chamberlain presided at the annual meeting of the Cobden Club last Saturday, and delivered an admirable speech, which he commenced by quizzing the Observer,—"a paper which is the organ of those whom Mr. Disraeli used to call 'superior persons,'"—for having said of Mr. Cobden that he was "a very worthy, well-meaning Member of Parliament, who was neither a statesman nor a philosopher, and who is now chiefly known as the author of a number of prophecies all of which had been falsified by the event." "Well, as to that," said Mr. Chamberlain, "the doctrines of the Christian religion have not received universal acceptance; yet I suppose we should conceive it a little presumptuous, even in a Sunday newspaper with a limited circulation, to describe the Apostles as very worthy fishermen, who were neither philosophers nor statesmen, but who were chiefly to be remembered as the authors of a variety of predictions which were falsified by the event." It was true that the United States, aided by the vast range of their territory, had been able to decline Free-trade with the rest of the world with but little conscious suffering to themselves; and Mr. Chamberlain, as an Englishman, could not regret it, since he could not help being grateful for the delay of the shock to English commercial pre-eminence which American Free-trade, when it comes, must bring. The latter part of his speech was devoted by Mr. Chamberlain to the subject of the recent retirements from the Cobden Club, which gave him occasion to discuss the relation of the Radicals to the Liberal party at large, and to point out that if Radicals are to sacrifice something of their own wishes in order to co-operate with the Moderates, the Moderates must not grudge the Radicals the right of free exposition and free discussion of their more daring wishes.

Mr. Thorold Rogers, in responding to the toast of the Cobden Club, referred to Tenniel's admirable picture of Mr. Chamberlain as the daring duckling launching out into the pond of Radicalism, and ventured to suggest that, like Hans Christian Andersen's "ugly duck," Mr. Chamberlain might yet turn out the swan of the brood. Sir Charles Dilke afterwards made an interesting speech on the actual progress of Free-trade. A commercial treaty had been signed with Italy on the 15th of last month, which is a great step in the direction of Free-trade; and even before this our trade with Italy, which some years ago fell off greatly, had completely recovered. Moreover, the Anglo-Italian Commercial Treaty contains a general arbitration clause, with detailed regulations for the appointment of arbitrators in case of divergencies of interpretation. The renewal of our relations with Mexico is another great step in the right direction, and with Portugal, a "most favoured nation" treaty has been signed. With Spain there is more difficulty, though Sir Robert Morier gives us hope that happier counsels are likely to prevail in Spain; and in the United States, Sir Charles Dilke recognised not so much a distinct progress of Free-trade doctrine, as a much clearer admission of the doctrine that tariffs should be constructed on a revenue basis, and not on a basis of Protection. On the whole, the policy of Governments in civilised countries had been recently becoming more and more favourable to Free-trade, instead of less and less so.

On the same day, a banquet was given to Mr. Benjamin, Q.C., on his retirement from the Bar. The Attorney-General proposed Mr. Benjamin's health, in a speech which referred with more of honorific feeling than we could contrive to summon up, to Mr. Benjamin's career as a member of the great Slave Confederation of the Southern States. Further, Sir Henry James took great credit for Mr. Benjamin's reception here. "The Bar is ever generous even in its rivalry towards success that is based on merit." "The years are few since Mr. Benjamin was a stranger to us all, and in those few years he has accomplished more than most men can hope in a lifetime to achieve." Mr. Benjamin, whose abilities as a lawyer probably surpass those of the very ablest of his friends in this country, had well earned Sir Henry James's tribute of respect and admiration, and his speech in acknowledgment was manly and graceful; but after that, the "mutual admiration" grew somewhat too fervent. The Lord Chancellor in his "fond regret" for the years of his life at the Bar, became needlessly effusive on the subject of the extraordinarily honourable character of the Bar of the United Kingdom; while the Lord Chief Justice had no words to express his sense of "the honour, the eloquence, the integrity, and learning of the Bar." Of the modesty of the Bar, Lord Coleridge wisely said nothing, and perhaps it would not have been consistent with what he did say, to attribute modesty to the Bar. We have a sincere respect for the Bar; but the Bar has so much to say in its own praise, that nothing at all remains for others to say, and we cannot but wish to hear whether there might not be a debit side of the account, if solicitors and clients could be freely heard.

We regret to record the death of the Duke of Marlborough, one of Lord Beaconsfield's Dukes, a most respectable, most manageable man, who could always be educated, and therefore sat in Cabinets. He knew something of Church affairs, and though he sold the Sunderland Library, was in his way a man of intelligence and thought. He is succeeded by his son, Lord Blandford, supposed to be a Radical. That party does not want Dukes, and thinks it hard of Fate that Lord Randolph Churchill is only a second son. Perhaps, however, it is for the best. If he had been the heir to the Dukedom, the House of Commons might have been cruelly and indecently exultant over a death, and even the gain to the State would not have compensated for that.

There is no brutality like that of the panic-struck. The deaths at Damietta from cholera exceed one hundred a day, though the population is only 30,000. A cordon of troops has been accordingly drawn round the wretched town, with orders to shoot any one found leaving it. Consequently, every one is afraid to enter the place, which has become a fetid prison, and there are neither sufficient doctors, guardians of order, nor medical comforts. The people die or live uncared for, relatives are divided, business is stopped, and for all any one knows the inhabitants may be starving. At the same time, any one who can bribe the police gets through, so that if cholera were contagious, it would be conveyed in spite of the cruel restrictions. It is believed that the outbreak is, in the main, local; and Lord Granville on Tuesday read an opinion from Sir William Gull, stating that he saw little ground for alarm, as severe epidemics of cholera were always preceded by small outbreaks in the previous winter and spring. All the States of the Mediterranean have published quarantine rules, and the French and Italian papers insist that the cholera came from Bombay. There is no ground, Lord Granville says, for the allegation, which, if true, might be perpetually so, the great Indian cities never being quite free of cholera cases.

A great controversy has been raging in the Standard as to the quantity of education now given in Board Schools. Correspondents, usually female, report that the hours are too long, that the work to be done at home is too heavy, that payment by results induces forcing, and that the children, consequently, look sickly, puny, and careworn. The Inspectors, as a body, deny these charges, and attribute them to the dislike of all Conservatives and of most women to any extension of education. We have very little belief in the story of overwork, knowing the perfect protection English children derive from their armour of stupidity, but we have a doubt sometimes about sanitation. The effect of cooping up numbers of children in London rooms in summer weather is not good, even when the children are much better fed than the children of the poor often are. It is the want of milk and meat from which sharp scholars suffer much more than from the learning, and it is very difficult even to think of the remedy. The State cannot feed all the children, or the philanthropists either. We wish some one of the latter, though, would try the effect of milk in some one rather crowded school, and report thereupon, and ensure that in hot weather the tired mites should have good water to drink at will. There can be no reasonable difficulty about the latter.

A meeting was held in Exeter Hall on Wednesday to promote a scheme for lending money to Indian peasants at reasonable rates. They now pay 24 per cent., which Mr. Bright, who spoke on behalf of the scheme, considers fatal to agriculture. He will find on inquiry that this rate has been paid for hundreds of years, and is not fatal to agriculture, though over-much borrowing is. The Indian sun is not the English, or the Indian return from seed. The crux of the scheme is the peasant's character. If the ryot, being able to borrow at 12 per cent., borrows as much as he did at 24 per cent., the English lenders will benefit him and themselves; but if he borrows twice as much, he will, when payment is asked for, be worse off than before, while they will lose their money. The experiment is an excellent one, and ought to be tried, but we would warn poor investors, clergymen, and widows to leave it alone. Mr. Bright says the soucars, or native usurers, are all in favour of the scheme, and we have no doubt that is true. All their insolvent debtors will borrow to pay them off, which will be very convenient for the soucars, while the solvent debtors will go on as their fathers did before. No peasant will break with the soucar, who tides him over bad seasons, by going to a competitor, without the soucar's own consent.

A frightful accident, which seems to have cost about 120 lives, occurred on the Clyde on Tuesday, when a vessel christened 'Daphne,' built by Messrs. Alexander Stephen and Sons, Linthouse, Glasgow, for the Glasgow and Londonderry Steam Packet Company, was so launched that, instead of floating on the water, she heeled over at once and went to the bottom. The cause of the accident is not yet understood. It is only certain that the anchor on the port side was dragged much farther than the anchor on the starboard side, the one being moved sixty yards and the other not more than six or seven. It was conjectured, therefore, that the chains on the two sides had not moved evenly, and that the starboard side had been checked while the port side was unchecked. Another theory is that the vessel was top-heavy, but as yet the cause of the catastrophe is quite uncertain. A few of the crowd of workmen on board were picked up by the boats or swam to shore, but 120 are known to be missing, and the hold and companion-ladder of the 'Daphne' were found crowded with corpses. The building and launching of vessels on the Clyde have usually been so wholly free from accident, that the calamity has caused almost as much wonder as grief and consternation.

Mr. Spottiswoode was buried in Westminster Abbey on Thursday, at the request of a great number of eminent men, who, when they made their request, probably thought more of their own admiration and esteem than they did of the very limited space now available in the Abbey. Mr. Spottiswoode, distinguished as he was amongst his contemporaries, and beloved as he was also, had hardly achieved enough to earn a distinction which ought to be reserved for the few in each generation whom even posterity will never forget. In saying this, we do not in any way mean to detract from the honour in which a man of great acquirements, of very high originality as a man of science, and of large generosity, ought to be held by all his contemporaries. Still, Westminster Abbey should be reserved for those whom not only their contemporaries, but all subsequent generations, will agree to think of as the marked men of their generation. Not even such as these, however, could be laid in the grave with deeper and more universal regret than was felt by the mourners at the grave of Mr. Spottiswoode. The Royal Society have done themselves credit by electing a man of true genius as his successor. That successor is Professor Huxley.

Lord Salisbury distributed the prizes to the Arts and Science Faculty of King's College, London, on Tuesday, and in his remarks echoed (though mildly) the general complaint of the number of examinations. Lord Salisbury should read the late Professor Stanley Jevons's admirable paper on "Cram," in the volume just published. He would there learn that frequent examination is one of the most indispensable of all instruments of education, and that no good teacher ever allows his class to learn much without testing the character of that learning by examination. But Lord Salisbury did not confine his remarks to those with which Conservatives could sympathise. He made a sharp attack on the deference paid to Greek and Latin verse in the public schools and the Universities, and complimented King's College on giving no prize for Latin verse. "I never look back without a feeling of some bitterness to the many hours during which I was compelled to produce the most execrable Latin verse in the world. I believe that if a commission of distinguished men were appointed to discover what is the most perfectly useless accomplishment to which the human mind can be turned, a large majority would agree that versification in the dead languages is that accomplishment." Lord Salisbury, it will be seen, can be a Radical when he likes.

The banquet to Mr. Irving at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday, was a very enthusiastic one. Five hundred sat down to table, and some 400 ladies assembled in the galleries before the speaking began. Lord Coleridge presided, and showed considerable art in giving a sort of colloquial familiarity to the eloquence of his usually stately, though silver tongue. He declared that every after-dinner speech should have its joke, its platitude, and its quotation,—the American Minister subsequently remarking that the platitude was the real difficulty, and that a successful platitude requires "a very high order of genius,"—but Lord Coleridge was equal to the emergency, for he combined all three in one by quoting "All the world's a stage, and all the men and women merely players," as a passage absolutely new. In enumerating some of the great actors and actresses, Lord Coleridge might, we think, have remembered, when he complimented Miss Ellen Terry, that a sister of hers had once as great a popularity, and had reached, as a tragic actress, a far higher standard of genius. But the conclusion of Lord Coleridge's speech was the happiest. He described Mr. Irving in Cicero's words,—"Summus artifex, et, mehercule! semper partium, in republica tanquam in scena, optimarum." "I venture," he said, "to translate these words roughly, for the benefit of one or two people who, perhaps, do not understand them,—'He is a consummate artist, by Jove! and capable of the best parts, both on the stage and off it.'"

Mr. Irving's speech was not remarkable,—a speech of cordial thanks adequately expressed; but the Minister of the United States, who always speaks well, spoke even better than usual, happily defending the United States from the charge of self-laudation, by managing to suggest that they limit their Spread-eagleism to one day in the year, the day of the banquet; and we may at once admit that if his implication is true, that is a much more moderate allowance than that of any other people. The happiest passage, however, was Mr. Lowell's concluding story of a Methodist preacher at a camp-meeting of whom he had heard when he was young. He was preaching on Joshua ordering the sun to stand still:—"My hearers," he said, "there are three motions of the sun; the first is the straightforward or direct motion of the sun, the second is the retrograde or backward motion of the sun, and the third is the motion mentioned in our text,—'the sun stood still.' Now, gentlemen, I do not know whether you see the application of that story to after-dinner oratory? I hope you do. The after-dinner orator at first begins and goes straightforward,—that is the straightforward motion of the sun. Next, he goes back, and begins to repeat himself a little, and that is the retrograde motion, or the backward motion, of the sun. And at last, he has the good-sense to bring himself to an end, and that is the motion mentioned in our text of the sun standing still." And so Mr. Lowell carried off the laurels of the evening.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN ON THE COBDEN CLUB.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S admirable speech at the Cobden Club this day week will do much to extinguish the memory of the trifling mistake which he made three weeks ago at Birmingham, when he intimated that he hoped that the people of England would not treat any Reform Bill as a discharge of Liberal liabilities which did not come up to his own standard of universal suffrage, equal electoral districts, and payment of Members. The error there was in that indifference to his own Ministerial position which went so far as to weaken beforehand any settlement on which he and his colleagues might agree, since he appeared to bespeak an immediate agitation against the deficiencies which he anticipated. In the Cobden Club on Saturday his tone was very different. He not only did not deny, but roundly asserted that it was the duty of Radicals to make concessions in order to carry the country with them, and not only to make concessions, but "to make good every foothold before taking another step;" "I desire," said Mr. Chamberlain, "to carry with the party, as we have in the past, the convinced judgment and the intelligent opinion of the great majority of the nation." That is the language of statesmanship, and we accept it with great pleasure as evidence that the words, dropped by Mr. Chamberlain at Birmingham, which seemed to advise an immediate renewal of the Reform agitation after the passing of the next Bill, in the name of his own more advanced opinions, were hastily dropped, and did not express his deliberate conviction. With every word that he said in the Cobden Club we can heartily agree. It is only fair that Radicals who go beyond the mass of the Liberal Party, should have the free right of explaining their own individual views, and why they advocate them. But that is a very different thing from an attempt to keep great constitutional reforms always in agitation, a very different thing from giving notice beforehand that whatever you agree to as a fit and sufficient measure for the moment, is to be denounced directly it is passed, on the authority of one of those who passed it, as an inadequate and niggardly solution of the problem before the country. We claim to be as good Radicals, as firm believers in the doctrine that you must frankly trust the people, as Mr. Chamberlain. But it is for that very reason that we go no farther than the advocacy of an extension of the present borough system of household suffrage, with its subsidiary lodger franchise, from the towns to the counties. Under that suffrage, every grown-up man who recognises the duty of exerting political influence can obtain it easily and exert it freely; and it is the duty, not the mere right, of political action which we wish to see recognised. Doubtless, even under this suffrage, there will be a great number of grown-up men who will never become electors; but that will be not from want of power, but from want of will. Is it desirable, or even right, to force on people who want the will to qualify themselves as voters, the consciousness of a political power for which they have not the smallest moral concern? Make political duty your ideal, and you will open freely to all who have a sense of political duty the opportunity of doing it; but in that case you will not try and swell your electorate with masses of supine, indifferent, and therefore probably either flighty or corrupt voters. Mr. Cobden, says Mr. Chamberlain, viewed "without alarm" the very widest extension which could be given to the electoral franchise. Perhaps "without alarm;" but did he ever express any desire to see the vote forced on men within whose easy reach it was already, but who did not care enough about it to secure it for themselves? We do not believe it. For the same reason, we differ with Mr. Chamberlain as to the payment of Members. We wish to see politics confined to the class of men who pursue politics from more or less disinterested motives, and not merely for the livelihood to be got out of it. Where there are such men with a deep interest in politics, though too poor to devote themselves to political life without help from their constituents,—by all means let the constituency find the means. Such a course is alike honourable to the constituency and to the representative whom it taxes itself to send to Westminster. But why, with a large choice of men who are willing to give their time freely to the service of the nation, we should go out of our way to make politics a mere bread-winning profession, it is quite beyond our store of Liberal wisdom to discover. It may, we think, be left to Mr. James Lowther, as Mr. Chamberlain himself oddly suggested, to support this "pious opinion" by reference to the ancient custom to which Mr. Chamberlain referred. For the present, we think a large class of purely professional politicians would not greatly improve the declining parliamentary morality of the day.

For the rest, Mr. Chamberlain's eloquent and unanswerable defence of Mr. Cobden for anticipating the early conversion of the world to his own views,—an anticipation, as he justly said, exactly paralleled by Apostolical predictions of the early triumph of Christianity,—was not less satisfactory than his wise limitation of Mr. Cobden's doctrine with respect to non-intervention. On that point, Mr. Chamberlain truly said that Mr. Cobden himself was never really satisfied with his own very strong and far too abstract assertion of that disputable doctrine, and that Mr. Cobden clearly betrayed from time to time the self-distrust with which he contemplated his theoretical assertions of it. And yet no one, we think, can read Mr. John Morley's "Life of Cobden" without seeing that during the latter part of Mr. Cobden's career, this unmanageable doctrine,—we may say this intrinsically false doctrine, if it is to be erected into an absolute standard of national duty,—occupied more and more of Mr. Cobden's thoughts, and lowered measurably the tone and character of his political influence. Cobden, indeed, mistook for a general principle of politics what came to no more than this,—that a nation should never involve itself in the quarrels of other countries without the advantage of a very noble, clear, and simple cause which it is not easy to misunderstand,—and not even then, unless it can clearly give effect to its righteous purpose without ruin to its own citizens. The question of intervention or non-intervention, in national as in private cases, is a question both of right and of prudence; and unless the right be very clear indeed,—which happens much more rarely than statesmen are apt to suppose,—the prudential calculation need not even be made. That is as far as most good Liberals can go with Mr. Cobden, and we heartily wish that Cobden himself had never gone farther. There are, however, few equally illustrious statesmen of any day who have not made much more serious mistakes; and it is with something like wonder, we confess, that we ask ourselves why Mr. Goschen retired from the Cobden Club, or else why he joined it. He was certainly not committed by his membership to all Mr. Cobden's views; and it is hard to suppose that he is not still in hearty sympathy with that great and simple mind, throughout the whole range of a very considerable arc of political thought.

Mr. Chamberlain's speech last week may not, perhaps, quite convince us that the daring duckling is, as Mr. Thorold Rogers happily called him, the swan of the Ministerial brood. There is, so far as we know, not one of what we may call his "peculiar" tenets, that seems to us stamped with a better kind of Liberalism than that of his more distinguished colleagues. But undoubtedly the complete frankness, the great manliness, and the happy humour of the speech at the Cobden Club will do much, and ought to do much, to increase the favour with which Mr. Chamberlain is regarded by English Liberals. It is a great thing to know not only how to retrieve a false step, but how so to retrieve it that a great forward step is made, and this is what Mr. Chamberlain has effected by his last vigorous speech. He has shown himself perfectly candid under criticism, and yet neither depressed nor elated; confident in himself and in his principles, and willing to recognise that he must give as well as take, and that what he has once given he must not at once proceed to retract.

THE LESSON OF THE MONAGHAN ELECTION.

WE do not see how it is possible to misread the lesson of the Monaghan Election. Mr. Healy's victory, which was quite complete, for he beat both his opponents put together, though he did not receive a majority of all votes on the register, means that the old truth which we have been preaching for twenty years, sometimes successfully and sometimes without an audience, remains true still. The "Irish Question" is, before all things, an agrarian question. The little farmers, who are for electoral purposes the Irish people, want, first of all, to possess their farms in full security, and at as low quit-rents or as low prices as practically may be. We see in the papers a great deal about the Protestant vote and the Catholic vote, and love of Toryism and hatred of Liberalism; but if Mr. Monroe, the Tory candidate, had not accepted the tenants' programme, he would not have attracted a third of his supporters; and if Mr. Healy had been commissioned by the Vatican to preach the Eighth Commandment, he would not have received a vote at all. As a matter of fact, Mr. Healy is a man at open war with the Pope, defying him in print and on the hustings, and he received the Catholic vote as completely as if he had been a devotee; while the Tory is no more returned than is the Whig, and the division of the votes made no difference. The obvious truth is, that all the farmers of Monaghan voted for agrarian change, that those who believed the Tories would grant it voted with Mr. Monroe, and that those who believed the Land League would secure it voted for Mr. Healy, who had shown, as they thought, not only heartiness, but ability, in the agrarian war. He, they believed, carried "the Healy Clause," and there was no more to be said. That they should have done so is to us, who fought for perpetuity of tenure while it seemed still a dream, a matter of profound regret. We believe that political ingratitude like that displayed in Monaghan shows want of judgment, as well as want of heart; we see lack of principle in this condonation of a party which has avowedly placed its objects above instinctive morals, and has approved, if it has not ordered, outrages; and we detest this cynical subordination of all political aspirations to the direct pecuniary interests of a class. Nationalism may be a mistaken creed, it certainly seems to us a fantastic one; but it is at least a nobler faith than land-grabbing, and it is the desire to get land, and not nationalism, which has carried this election. Mr. Healy offered "the land" vaguely, and a great extension of the Land Act in the tenants' interest definitely; and though he has no connection with the county, is personally, though able, one of the least attractive men in Ireland, and is one of the most outspoken of what Mr. Bright called the "Rebel section;" his offer swept away all sense of gratitude, all judgment as to political possibilities, and all considerations of creed, in the minds of the majority. If he had been excommunicated, it would under the ballot have been just the same, as it would also if, like his leader, he had been a Protestant, utterly English in temperament, and without a drop of Irish blood in his veins. Do the people who talk this nonsense about Catholic and Protestant, about the distrust of the landlord class and the hatred to the Saxon, believe for one moment that if Mr. O. S. Parnell, Protestant and Teuton, Cambridge graduate and landlord, had stood for Monaghan, he would have lost one single vote thrown for Mr. Healy? The agrarian agitator, because he was agrarian agitator, and for no other reason whatever, carried Monaghan.

It is almost as useless, with a community in the temper of the majority of Irishmen, to preach as to swear, and the interest as well as the duty of Englishmen is to look facts in the face, and settle in their own minds what they will do. Those facts are that the tenants of Ireland are still thirsting for more concessions, that the majority will postpone to that thirst every higher consideration, and that they think the thirst can be best slaked by supporting Mr. Parnell. That he may not at the next election "carry Ireland" is, of course, possible. The unexpected happens in Ireland as often as in France, or any other country where emotion is stronger than thought; and Mr. Parnell will, moreover, appeal to a suffrage in which the peasantry, though still a majority, will not be so easily supreme. With the thousands of new votes, new influences will come in. But the Irish have displayed agrarian passion for generations, and if Mr. Parnell is still there to promise its gratification, and if no new and unexpected movement occurs, it is a reasonable calculation that he will greatly increase his following in Parliament. Nobody who does not postpone his judgment to his hopes really doubts that, the conditions being granted, this will be the result. If it occurs, Mr. Parnell may hold the balance of power, and he will, of course, use it to obtain for his supporters as much as he can of his programme, which is to secure them the ownership of the soil, either in freehold or copyhold, at as low a price or as low a quit-rent as he can. That is the central idea which his agents, of whom Mr. Healy is the strongest, are putting forward on every occasion, and to which every fresh success at the hustings makes him more devoted. Mr. Parnell was not originally an agrarian agitator, but he has found in that agitation a lever, the strength of which, though it has surprised, has absolutely convinced him. He will push forward with the cold persistence which so differentiates him from every previous Irish leader to his end, disregarding every other consideration, the welfare of Ireland included; and will, if the two parties remain as at present, embarrass or overthrow Government after Government. That is the serious danger of the situation, for Tories as well as Liberals; but for Liberals first of all, because they are the party in possession of power. They must decide first how they will act, and, so far as we know, they have not as a party made up their minds to any line of action whatever. They will not, if we understand them, accept the plan which hovers rather as a dream than a scheme in the Tory leaders' minds, and by buying out the landlords make the State sole landlord,—and rebellion, therefore, the most enticing of all projects to the body of the Irish people. The old economic Liberals are too strong for that, even if the majority were unsound. They will not, we feel assured, on the other hand, forego all projects of reform, as the price of Tory support, in dumb resistance to any further concessions to Ireland. There is a theory afloat that this might occur, both parties agreeing not to notice a vote carried by Parnellite adhesions; but we agree with the Pall Mall Gazette that no such course could long be persisted in, as the cry of exasperation from Great Britain would become too loud, and would in the long-run develop a Home-rule party here. What, then, will they do? It is of no use growing pettish, or refusing to think the matter out, or declaring that a decision can only be arrived at when the emergency is actually present. They ought at least to consider themselves beforehand, and be clear as to their own resolves, and we see little sign that as yet they even perceive the danger. Will they consider any compromise, or will they yield, or will they blankly refuse concession, and take the consequences? We want them to think that out, remembering always that the tactics which carry a transfer of Irish soil may carry Irish independence, and, if possible, express before or at the election the result of their thought, even if it be only in the shape of certain negations. For ourselves, we still think that the old Liberal policy—to concede up to the extreme limits of justice, and not a step further—is the wisest course; and that would mean, in Ireland, to assent to the Ulster demand for the inclusion of leaseholds in the Land Act, to forbid the raising of rent on any tenant's improvement, and to allow any tenant to become a copyholder or freeholder on such payment as Parliament may fix. Beyond that, we see no plan which would not involve either confiscation, or such a burden on the British taxpayer as would be both oppressive and unjust. If the Tories, forgetting all their traditions, would go farther, and by aid of the Irish vote can seize power, let them seize it, and see whether they can work for a week with such allies without destroying their position for ever throughout the greater island. The responsibility would be on them, not us, and the burden of the result. That, however, is a mere suggestion. Our object to-day is not to discuss plans, but to call Liberal attention to the facts that the result of the Monaghan election shows agrarian feeling to be still all-powerful in Ireland, conquering alike respect for tradition, the sense of gratitude, and the influence of the Papacy; and that, consequently, after the election, Mr. Parnell may have at his beck a majority of the Irish Representation. That majority may very well exceed any difference between the two great British parties. A candidate openly hostile to English rule, and almost excommunicated by the Pope, has received the whole Catholic vote and some of the Protestant vote in Monaghan because he promises to make land cheaper to the tenant. More than half Ireland, perhaps three-fourths, resembles Monaghan in its wishes. That is the situation, and it is time the Liberals began to consider what it means, and how it is in the immediate future to be met.

THE COMTE DE CHAMBORD.

UP to five o'clock on Friday, the death of the Comte de Chambord had not been announced in England; but it is believed that his recovery is hopeless, and the end is immediately expected. This is not the time for comment on a character and a career which have both been nearly unique in modern history; but we wish to say a word on a misapprehension evidently widely spread. A preposterous importance is attached to the will of the dying Pretender. That will must, of course, have a certain importance for his family and his immediate devotees, who, with a disinterestedness not without nobility, have made of their loyalty to a disrowned exile a kind of religion. There are, we believe, families in France who would accept Henri Cinq's nominee as his heir, even if he named, as he was once asked to do, the lad who is now the hope of the Bonapartists. The titular Throne of France is not, however, disposable by will. Henri Cinq did not derive his "rights" from bequest, and has no more claim to bequeath them than Dr. Tait had to bequeath the Archbishopric of Canterbury. On his death, Louis Philippe d'Orleans is not, indeed, head of the Bourbon family, for that position passes to Don Carlos—or his son, Don Jaime, if the father is held to have abdicated—but he is head of “the House of France,” by right of prescription confirmed by law, by right of French adhesion for centuries, and of international Treaty. So long as a Bourbon reigns in Spain, at all events, the Orleanist rights under the Family Compact are indefeasible. The moment his far-away cousin dies, the Comte de Paris is titular King of France, and will be so regarded by all Frenchmen who think of him at all—a very small minority. If the Comte de Chambord has named Don Jaime his heir, a few Legitimists may secede from the party, but the body of Frenchmen who desire Monarchy will remain unmoved. If, on the other hand, as is reported with some authority, the Count has insisted that his successor shall accept the White Flag, his order will be as null as if he had directed him to use a black one. Louis XX. of France—for we presume the clear right of the Duc d'Angoulême to call himself Louis XIX. will be acknowledged, Charles X. having no right in the world, on the Legitimist theory, to pass over his eldest son as he did—will be as much and as little the free King of France as Henri Cinq ever was. The claim may be utterly worthless, a claim to a shadowy crown, but, such as it is, it is beyond attack from any competitor.

We notice the subject (which otherwise concerns only the Editor of the Almanach de Gotha) because the political importance of the Comte de Chambord's death consists in this. Those of the Marshals and Generals of France who are discontented with the Republic, know that the only alternatives are the ancient Monarchy with a Charter, and the Bonapartist Empire. They are disinclined to the latter, partly because the memory of Sedan is too recent, partly because they reject the head of the Bonaparte house, Napoleon Jerome, yet cannot set him aside, and partly because, if they nominate a Bonaparte they must recognise the organic law of that family, and take a plébiscite which might end in millions of “Noes.” They prefer, therefore, it is said, to declare for a King of France, whose claim rests on descent, who has personally no enemies, and who can bring to his Government the effective aid of a General popular in the Army, yet Royalist,—the Duc d'Aumale. It is, therefore, asserted—and Prince Bismarck, for one, believes—that, should “the Army of France” take independent action against the Republic, the representative Orleanist will be proclaimed. It is probable, in our judgment, that this impression is well founded, though we believe its importance to be greatly exaggerated. There is no proof whatever that the Army, apart from a few great officers, is discontented, none that it is united, none that, if discontented and united, it will act against the people. If it is not discontented, it will remain passive; if it is not united, its chiefs will not move,—not wanting, as Marshal MacMahon said, “civil war in the barracks;”—and if it will not act against the people, the people are for the Republic. The wild assumptions being made on all sides may be true, but there is no evidence of them; and this, at all events, is against them. The Generals cannot act without the consent of the Comte de Paris, a cool, thoughtful, rather priggish Prince, about the last man in the world, one would think, to risk his head and fortune for a Throne on which he would be a mark for every dynamiteur in Europe. He is much more likely to arrest all action, by declaring that, though his claims are undoubted and indefeasible, he will remain a citizen of the Republic until called to another position by the free vote of the Assembly, expressing the will of the people of France. It is the destiny of his House, as of the Stuarts, to blunder in great crises; but destiny sometimes spares an individual, as it did the cool, witty, sceptical actor, Louis XVIII., who saw the French Revolution through from the oath of the Tennis Court to Waterloo, and yet died in his bed King of France.

MR. GLADSTONE ON CABINETS.

NOTHING is more remarkable in modern English politics, or, indeed, in the politics of all free States, than the slight interest felt by the outside public in the mechanism of the Executive. An old statesman like Earl Russell may form strong views about the functions of Ministers, or a thinker like Mr. W. Bagehot may write essays on the extraordinary value of a Cabinet as an instrument of government, but the great body of politicians continue calmly indifferent. There are Monarchical parties, and Republican parties, and Constitutional parties in Europe, but we never hear of a party devoted to any particular scheme of forming or reconstructing the Executive. Indeed, we never hear of any statesman with that for his object, the subject presenting no attraction apparently even to the far-sighted men who might be expected to detect its extreme importance. Sir Cornewall Lewis, we believe, once said that the mere change from collective responsibility to individual responsibility among Ministers would “remodel the Constitution;” and Napoleon III. not only thought so, but acted on his thought. Now and then an opinion is expressed that the machine works cumbrously, and occasionally, when a Government is being constructed or a jar has occurred among Departments, one hears important people mutter that there must be a “change in the Administrative system;” but no general interest is felt, and unless actual danger is visible, as it was visible when Lord Palmerston by a dead-heave fused the Ministry at War with the Ministry for War, nothing is ever done. The public does not understand, and does not care. We doubt, for example, if one in ten of the ordinary readers of debates, unless interested in education, studied Mr. Gladstone's speech of Friday week on the proposal to create a separate Ministry for that Department, yet it was one of unusual Constitutional and historical interest. Ostensibly, Mr. Gladstone was only evading a popular but ill-considered demand for a new Ministry, by granting an “Inquiry,” which can be of little use, as the principles of government cannot be settled by Committees; but really he was trying to warn the public of what he believes, and we believe, to be a serious danger. The great “Interests” have awoke to the advantage they may obtain from representation in the Cabinet, and are pressing for new Ministers, until there is risk of a change in the very principle of the Elected Committee which has so long governed the Empire. Parties, or rather groups of Members quite numerous enough to affect divisions, are now asking, with a loudness which grows more vehement, for a Ministry of Education, a Ministry of Agriculture, a Ministry of Commerce, a Ministry for Scotland, a Ministry for Ireland,—five new Ministries, at least. They all want their Ministers to have seats in the Cabinet, and they none of them, when pleading for their proposals, bring forward any scheme for the scientific reconstruction of that Committee, or even ask for the abolition of the sinecure offices, such as the Privy Seal or the Duchy of Lancaster. Their idea evidently is that the more Cabinet Ministers there are, the better; and it was this which Mr. Gladstone endeavoured to resist, with the whole weight of his vast authority and his long experience.

We are not quite certain that, except so far as we should defer to his wealth of knowledge, positive knowledge, of the subject, we can accept all Mr. Gladstone's arguments, though we adhere heartily to his conclusion. He has been a Cabinet Minister for more than forty years, and he obviously thinks that the practice of confining the selection of Ministers to Peers and Commoners who are Members of Parliament is the very keystone of our Constitution, and no doubt there are advantages in the system. It enriches Parliament, which it makes the sole avenue to the highest office. It limits directly and visibly the jobbing power of the Crown, which is forced to favour only men who have cloven their way into a limited political circle. The Queen cannot make Lord Lorne Chancellor of the Exchequer, or the Duke of Connaught Minister for War, or Sir Bartle Frere Minister for the Colonies. And no man not a Peer, if hopelessly unpopular with constituencies, can be forced upon Parliament as Minister in the way Lord Palmerston tried to force the Marquis of Clanricarde. Above all, the system leaves the defeated Minister still a Member, ready and authorised to criticise the policy of his successful rival, and thus preserves, as hardly any other plan could, continuity of Administration. But the system has terrible disadvantages, too. It shuts out from even the hope of ruling some of the ablest administrators, some of the most competent Generals and sailors, and, as a rule, though Mill proved a momentary exception, the most influential of political thinkers. It limits the choice of the Crown to a thousand persons, who are practically reduced to about one hundred, and it elevates the gift of oratory to factitious, and sometimes injurious importance. It enables a very limited class, the Political Peers, to keep a steady grip on office; and it exaggerates, to what may prove a dangerous degree, the necessity for wealth as a qualification for the highest State employ. We are not sure as yet that the Continental system, under which a Minister becomes de facto a Member of both Houses, would not work better; and are quite sure that two officials, the head of the Army and the head of the Navy, ought to obtain seats—of course, without votes—by official right. But, with that reserve, we believe Mr. Gladstone to be much more in the right than the public as yet perceives. The Cabinet, the Governing Committee of the Empire, to reach its highest utility, should be united, homogeneous, and secret, able to take strong decisions, and to act on occasion with the rapid energy of an individual. Those qualities can be secured, as Mr. Gladstone intimated, only in a small Committee. A Cabinet such as ours now is, with eleven persons who must be seated in it, and two more who think they ought to be, is not only difficult to construct—for you have to find thirteen men who are at once influential in the Houses, weighty in Council, able to do the heavy work, and ready to work with one another—but tends to become a little Parliament, with disputes, parties, groups, and habits of compromising away every distinctive and therefore irritating proposal. It becomes a representative body, and as it is wanted to be an executive body, it either shows weakness—which is, on points, the defect of the present Cabinet, as, for instance, we fear, on the subject of the payment of Debt—or reduces the evil by winking at an interior Cabinet, or abolishes it, as happened with Lord Palmerston, by transferring initiative to one man. We do not object just now, be it understood, to any of those methods. We could imagine that a scheme of Government under which Mr. Gladstone, Lord Granville, Lord Hartington, and Mr. Chamberlain first agreed on a plan, then talked it over in Cabinet, and then submitted it to Parliament, would be a very effective scheme; while a Dictatorship, tempered by discussion and subject to veto, may at odd times, and with the right man, constitute an admirable guiding force. But then neither of these plans constitutes true Cabinet government—government, that is, by an elected Committee of confrères, possessed, in theory at all events, of equal rights—which has worked so well, and is so thoroughly understood, and has in it such potentialities of development that its supersession, or even modification, ought to be, as Mr. Gladstone throughout repeated, matter of the gravest concern and thought. Yet such supersession, if we go on increasing Cabinet offices, is next to a certainty. A Committee of sixteen or seventeen notabilities—and eighteen are already proposed—cannot be either united, or homogeneous, or rapid in decision, and will, under the pressure of necessity, so transmute itself in some way that the Constitution may be seriously modified without the world perceiving that any change has taken place. The Constitution may need change, but then those who make proposals which change it should understand and defend what they are doing.

It is rather saddening to perceive that Mr. Gladstone does not think the Executive, on the whole, improving. With many Premiers in his position such an opinion would not matter, for he is advancing in years, and men over seventy are inclined to doubt whether, when they were younger and stronger, their world did not go better. But Mr. Gladstone is no laudator temporis acti. His disposition is sanguine, or he could never have survived Obstruction; and his career has not been one of declining, but of increasing success. He is, too, for all his vehemence of thought, very tolerant, remembering clearly how many "insuperable difficulties"—Ohat Mosses of difficulty—he has seen bridged over. He can remember when the public tone was far lower, when jobbery was rampant, when a few families claimed office as property, when public men were far more cynical, when the great machine of Government seemed unable to move for the sticky clay of vested interests, and class beliefs, and Royal and aristocratic prerogatives. He quotes a statement of 1856, made by Sir Robert Peel to himself, when the work of administration was so difficult that the great Conservative said, "Nothing in the world shall induce me again to undertake the work of constructing a Government." Yet he says, "I can assure the Member for Barnstaple that after my long experience, my opinion of human government, taken at its best, and whether in Conservative or in Liberal hands, is that it seems every year that I live to verge [edge?] a little further from the ideal." That is a depressing opinion, even from a man who may place his ideal a little too high, and forget too much that human nature, which Christianity has not cured, will not be rendered perfect by Parliamentary Government. Fortunately, the young will not regard it, and will go forward changing and, as they think, reforming, in full confidence of ultimately reaching the unattainable. Nevertheless, the opinion, coming from one so experienced and so successful, is one which should make all who claim to be statesmen very careful to be clear and certain when they touch the delicate mechanism through which Parliamentary Government is enabled to do the work of governing. Very few see precisely how anything will work. We remember an incident in Mr. Gladstone's own history which shows how dull the eyes of a whole Parliament may be. The late Mr. White, the eccentric Member for Brighton, proposed one night to abolish the duty on comfits. It cost, he said, about twice what it brought in. Everybody coincided, and the House was about to agree to a resolution, when the Secretary to the Treasury thought it well, as matter of discipline, to inform Mr. Gladstone. He came down to the House, and in ten minutes poor Mr. White, always a lumbering kind of man, was stammering out apologies. He had very nearly abolished the sugar duties, of which the duty on comfits was an indispensable outwork. Yet ten men understand imposts, for one who comprehends the mechanism of Cabinets.

THE CORRUPT PRACTICES BILL.

THERE can be no doubt that the House of Commons is really in earnest as to the Corrupt Practices Bill, perhaps in part because it honestly wishes to diminish the growing expenses of elections, but also, because it very naturally reflects the hearty desire of the leading constituencies to be rid of the disgrace of corrupt elections. Whether, however, the earnestness of the House in the matter may not injure, instead of improving, the Bill in some respects, is, we think, very questionable. So far as we can judge, the attempt to stop every gap at which corrupt practices can enter is nearly a hopeless attempt, and we would much sooner have seen a few great principles laid down, and the application of them left to the judgment of the Judge who may try the election petition, than have had all this paraphernalia of complex prohibition and exception. For instance, it was surely a mistake to prohibit the engaging of committee-rooms in any place of public entertainment. The principle that not more than a given number of committee-rooms are allowed for a given population, is the important one, not the uses of the houses in which they are engaged. Of course, the engaging of committee-rooms in places where food or drink is sold does often lead to "treating." But it is much better to punish treating wherever, in the opinion of the Court which tries an election petition, it has really prevailed, by voiding the election, than to try and exclude all opportunities of treating, which is an almost hopeless business. Moreover, we do not believe that the prohibition of committee-rooms in places of public entertainment will really diminish the expense of elections. The great difficulty of finding suitable committee-rooms which this will create, is but too likely to enhance, rather than to diminish, the cost of the committee-rooms, for people who are not accustomed to let their rooms will naturally expect a much larger sum for the hire of them, than people who possess more room than they themselves use, for the very purpose of letting it. We fear that the Government and the House of Commons are going too far in the direction of stopping the earths into which the electioneering foxes run, and that this is an endless business, which will make the law so intricate that it will be very difficult to master and apply. On the other hand, every provision which really helps to mark the disgraceful character of corruption is thoroughly sound, and we congratulate the Government heartily on its steady adherence on Thursday night to its proposal that any barrister or solicitor who is found to have been personally concerned in any corrupt practice shall have his conduct reported to the Inn of Court, High Court, or other tribunal which has power to take cognisance of such professional misconduct. That is a significant step in the right direction,—the direction of emphasising the social disgrace which ought to attach to any kind of responsibility for corrupt practices. Mr. Henry Fowler, M.P. for Wolverhampton, himself a solicitor, did good service in vindicating this clause in words to which his professional position lent great weight. Nor do we see the smallest weight in the objection that lawyers should not be subjected to especial penalties of their own, besides those incurred by any one who transgresses the provisions of the Act. For a lawyer is specially bound to promote the observance of the law by others, and is specially guilty, if he assists in devising modes by which others may conveniently evade the law.

But we should have looked forward with more hope to the passing of this Act, if more discretion as to the imputation of agency had been left to the Election Judge, and if it had not been rendered so very probable that Members will not only lose their seats, but incur heavy penalties for acts which they could by no sort of care have prevented. It seems to us that the Judges should have been allowed a good deal of discretion in saying how far the Member or his agent was or was not responsible for any illegal practice, and that when they declare that neither the candidate nor his agent was so responsible, illegal practices, though they might still void the election, should involve no other penal consequences to the candidate. With some condition of that kind, and with stringent provisions for limiting the total expense of an election in proportion to the number of the electorate, the new Bill would certainly have been workable,—which is just what we fear that it may not be found to be, if it passes in its present shape.

Moreover, in his perfectly sincere desire to keep down election expenses, Sir Henry James has not been careful enough to bear with equal pressure on the influence of all kinds of property alike. It seems to us absurd to say that a man with many carriages and many carts may use them to convey electors to the poll, while a man with no carriages and no carts, but with the wealth which these carriages and carts represent, may not hire them to convey electors to the poll. We should have been very glad to see both practices prohibited; and nothing would have been easier than to declare the conveyance of any elector to the poll in a carriage or cart not belonging to himself, an illegal practice. But to accord all the political influence it can exert to property of one kind, and to refuse the very same influence to property of another kind, is an anomaly so absurd that we can hardly understand on what principle the Attorney-General justified it, for the report of the speech attributed to him fails completely to make out even the shadow of an excuse for the very odd course taken. It is a sound position to say that the polling-places should be so far multiplied as to make it possible for every person in decent health to walk to the poll,—we cannot legislate for invalids without introducing all sorts of dangers,—and that it is a very fair test of an elector's interest in the election to require that, if he happens to have no carriage or conveyance of his own, he shall walk to the poll. Or again, it is reasonable enough to say that every party man may do all he can do to facilitate the access of other electors to the poll, by either paying for their conveyance or lending them a conveyance. But it sounds like a joke to say that only those who have carts, or carriages, or bicycles, shall help their brother-electors to go to the poll; while those who have not, but who are willing to hire them for the purpose, shall be denied that right, except on condition that they purchase out-and-out every vehicle which they lend. If you want to keep down the expenses of elections, prohibit all the assistance which property of any kind can lend. If you do not want to keep down,—in this direction, at least,—the expenses of elections, legalise the conveyance of voters to the poll in any vehicle, whether hired or owned by men on either side. But to veto the use of vehicles hired for the day of election, and to allow the free use of vehicles acquired before the day of election, is a course so anomalous that it is sure to lead to evasion. What is to prevent a man from buying a number of vehicles on the day on which Parliament is dissolved, and selling them again on the day on which the new Parliament assembles? Yet, as it seems to us, that would be nothing but another sort of hiring. Surely a distinction so flimsy as this cannot possibly stand.

We hope the Bill will now pass through Committee in two or three days, and that when it goes up to the House of Lords that Assembly will seriously attempt to simplify its provisions, and to leave a great deal more discretion to the Election Judges—especially on the question of agency—than is allowed now. If it passes in too stringent a shape, it will be almost useless. If it passes in a shape in which the great majority of honest men can secure their election, without fearing that it will be invalidated by the trivial errors of others with whom they have no real connection, and in which very few except genuinely dishonest men will have to fear being unseated by its provisions, it will mark one of the greatest advances yet made in the morality of Parliamentary life.

“THEIR NOBLE SELVES.”

THE Dinner given by the Bar to Mr. Benjamin was remarkable on two grounds. The first, of course, is plain to every one. Mr. Benjamin's professional career has been something altogether out of the common run. He has passed from a foremost place in the Courts of one country to an equal, if not greater, place in the Courts of another country. More than thirty years after his first call, he came—a broken man alike in private fortune and in political hopes—to a foreign land, and a system of law in many respects different from the one with which he was familiar. At the Bar of his adoption he at once took leader's rank and did leader's work, and fifteen years afterwards he retires, amid expressions of professional sympathy and good-will at least as unusual as so many other incidents in his life have been. This is enough to make the dinner in the Inner Temple Hall memorable. It was a well-earned tribute, not merely to a great lawyer, but to a lawyer who became even greater in exile than he had been among his own countrymen.

In some ways, however, it is the second point of interest about this dinner that has most attraction for us. It is a rare privilege, we know, to see ourselves as others see us, but it is an equally rare one to see others as they see themselves. False modesty, or a fear of being thought as conceited as they really are, constantly keeps men silent about their own merits. Their hearts are hot within them on the great subject, but, long as they may muse on it, the fire does not kindle and the tongue does not speak. On the whole, no doubt it is well that it should be so. Even that approximate estimate of our neighbour's merits with which they not seldom favour us, is apt to be tedious, and in common hands the full truth might be even fuller of weariness than the half truth. But in the Inner Temple Hall on Saturday, no common hands were at work. We had the Bar painted, indeed, by itself, but painted in the most masterly and artistic fashion. We may have guessed before this how highly-favoured England is in its silk and stuff gowns, but it has been only guess-work. On Saturday, faith was exchanged for sight, and we felt that for the first time we realised the greatness of our privileges. We are better off than Wordsworth. With us, it is no longer, “The time has been when earth was proud of lustre so intense,” but the time is. We walk not among the mighty dead, but the mighty living.

The mental attitude of all the speakers—with the exception, of course, of the guest of the evening—was one of wondering awe. They gazed at themselves from every point of view, and at each turn of the kaleidoscope they were more entranced with the lovely colours revealed to their gaze. Only one thing was wanting to make the scene perfect. The speeches should have been set to music. The theme was worthy of Handel, and it would take an oratorio to express it properly. How appropriately the overture would have been followed by “Recitation (Mr. Attorney-General), ‘The Bar is very generous’”! And how simply, yet beautifully, the original theme would have reappeared in the closing solo, by the Lord Chief Justice, “The matchless generosity of the Bar”! As it was, we have to be content with the unaccompanied human voice, and with the human voice not attuned to concert pitch. But such practised speakers as Lord Selborne and Lord Coleridge can do much, and the impression left by them on Saturday was that, even with a full orchestra and chorus, the praises of the English Bar could not have been better sung. If we have not mentioned Sir Henry James as well, it is not because he would not have been equally eloquent, had the opportunity been afforded him. But the programme of the evening denied him that opportunity. As Chairman, the toast of the evening fell to his share, and in proposing the health of Mr. Benjamin, he had for the most part to speak of Mr. Benjamin. But the two chiefs of Equity and Common Law amply made up for any unavoidable omissions on the part of the Attorney-General. The Lord Chancellor, as might have been expected, was particularly ingenious in his praise. While he was really glorifying the Bar, he appeared to be glorifying Mr. Benjamin. Mr. Benjamin, Lord Selborne says, has in an eminent degree seven eminent qualities:—1, the greatest learning; 2, the greatest shrewdness; 3, the greatest ability; 4, the greatest zeal for the interests entrusted to him; 5, the highest sense of honour; 6, the greatest kindness and generosity; 7, the greatest geniality in his intercourse with all branches of his profession. And why did he bring all these moral and intellectual gifts to the English Bar? Because like loves like, because he knew that among English Barristers these gifts were already honoured, and honoured for the best of reasons,—that they are familiarly known. Learning, shrewdness, ability, zeal, honour, kindness, generosity,—these are the characteristics of the English Bar, and wherever they are found united, there, potentially at all events, is an English barrister. They were united in Mr. Benjamin; consequently, the moment that circumstances permitted it, Mr. Benjamin became an English barrister. No wonder that Lord Selborne looks back “with fond regret” to the days when he was at the Bar.

Then, he may well say, I was numbered among the children of God, and my lot was among the Saints. When I partook of "the manifold interests, the keen intellectual conflicts, and the generous rivalries of the Bar," I was tasting true happiness, as well as making an excellent income. Lord Coleridge had, in one respect, the advantage of Lord Selborne, because he was directly commissioned to praise the Bar; whereas Lord Selborne, having to return thanks for "The Bench," could only become laudatory by becoming retrospective. Lord Coleridge, on the other hand, had his work cut out for him. There, at the long tables down which his eye wandered, sat the men he had to talk about. He saw them ranged in order like so many slices of toast waiting to be buttered, and with no ungenerous hand did he ply the knife. He was as great in what he left unsaid as in what he said. Not a word would he spare for the honour, the eloquence, the integrity, the learning of the Bar. "We know them—they may be taken for granted—they have almost passed into proverbs." After this modest reason for remaining silent on these topics, he allowed himself to touch upon two characteristics, and two only,—the independence of the Bar, and the generosity of the Bar. The merit of this selection lay in the fact that it covered the past as well as the future. Independence has always been the glory of the Bar, and just now it is an easy virtue. But if the occasion again calls for it, it will be at once forthcoming. The Bar are not to be "deterred from the exercise of their high privileges by any sense of danger. It never has been so, and it never will be." Still, even the independence of the Bar pales before its generosity. No profession is so "generous in its conduct and in its judgment." Nowhere is the competition so keen, the struggle between man and man so personal; yet nowhere is there such fast friendship between professional rivals. Look at Mr. Benjamin,—was there ever one spark of jealousy at his unrivalled success? Look at me when I was fighting John Karlake,—was there ever anything between us but the most cordial and intimate friendship? The lot of a barrister is, indeed, a happy one. If among the Juniors there is an occasional empty purse, it is as good as filled by the consciousness of merit, and the knowledge that all your brethren in the profession think as much of you as you think of them. Surely, here, if anywhere, is the virtue which is its own reward! To be perfectly good and unapproachably great, what more can man desire; and where, save at the English Bar, can man attain it?

GIBRALTAR.

NO Englishman will easily forget the feeling of pride he experienced when, for the first time, he saw the grim, grey mass of the Rock of Gibraltar rising from the blue Mediterranean. However unimaginative he may be, he could hardly fail to see in it a fitting expression of the might of England. The feeling is very intelligible, and is bound up with the natural majesty of the place, its fabled connection with the remote past, and the memorable defence of a hundred years ago. Yet it is well to realise clearly the present military value of the great historic fortress, and to understand to what extent modern artillery has affected that value.

The average untravelled Englishman is, it is to be feared, deeply impressed with the idea that the guns of Gibraltar directly command the entrance to the Mediterranean, and that we could at any time close the latter to the ships of an enemy. Lord Henry Lennox, who ought certainly to know better, seems imbued with this notion, for he is reported to have told the House of Commons on the 7th ult., that the Spaniards propose to mount guns along their coast "so as best to command the Straits of Gibraltar." The geographical facts are, however, otherwise. From Gibraltar to the nearest point of the African coast, the distance is about thirteen miles. Further west, nearly opposite the Spanish town of Tarifa, the Straits are between eight and nine miles wide, but soon broaden out into the Atlantic. It would be rash to limit the range which future guns may command; but, with artillery, as with small-arms, the power of hitting a mark at extreme distances does not keep pace with the power of throwing projectiles to those distances; and it may probably be asserted with safety that no gun will ever be built which will render the entrance to the Mediterranean dangerous—not to say impossible—to the slowest steamer, even by day-time.

What, then, is the military value of Gibraltar? Northwards from the Straits the coast of Spain is indented by a deep Bay, about six and a half miles long. The peninsula of which

Gibraltar is the southern point forms the eastern boundary of this Bay, and is faced along its whole length and overlapped on the south by the Spanish coast, which bounds the Bay on the west. The guns of Gibraltar effectively command this Bay, and deny its use to an enemy's shipping. To silence them by a naval attack would probably require the combination of two Powers, and one or two years of preparation. The operation might prove as costly and dangerous as a great war. Holding Gibraltar, therefore, it may be said that we possess a secure coaling station for our war ships and trading steamers, a place of safety at all times for our vessels of every class and those of our allies, a harbour for ships endeavouring to maintain a blockade of the Straits, a base from which unarmoured cruisers might operate freely in the Mediterranean. As a base, however, Gibraltar has sharp limitations. Possessing no docks, the possibilities of repair are extremely small, while the anchorage is not a good one in westerly gales. But Gibraltar is much more than a mere harbour and coaling station. It is an advanced post, a strongly fortified dépôt, from which men and stores can be rapidly pushed forward to any point along the great route to the East. The use of Gibraltar in this sense was lately exemplified, when the infantry regiments in garrison were despatched to Alexandria, in advance of the home portion of the expedition. Finally, in maintaining a foothold on the Spanish peninsula, we secure a base of operations in case it were necessary to carry war into the heart of Spain; yet not by any means a good base, on account of the nature of the intervening country, and one we should certainly decline to use if Portugal were our ally, possibly even if she were hostile. The above is a fair summary of the advantages of the possession of Gibraltar. Allusion to the prestige conferred by that possession may fairly be omitted, since, in this connection, the word "prestige" has little real meaning, and cannot be construed into a military factor.

From what has been said, it will be evident that the value of Gibraltar to England in war-time depends entirely upon the inviolability of the adjacent Bay. Our merchant steamers and our war-ships must be able to coal, our transports to embark men and stores, in perfect security. Gibraltar Bay is inviolable only so long as Spain permits it to be so. Varying in breadth from 8,000 to 9,000 yards, it is now throughout its length brought within practicable range of modern guns mounted along the Spanish shore; while of its total circumference of more than fifteen miles, only about three miles belong to England. Krupp or Armstrong is doubtless able and willing to supply the guns in a very short time. The cost of mounting them in simple earth-works will be comparatively small, and if Plevna has any meaning, the Remington rifle will make them perfectly secure against a landing party. All this is thoroughly well understood in Spain, where the Gibraltar question has been much discussed of late.

But, it may be said, our ironclads would at the outbreak of war easily silence and destroy these guns. The experience of Alexandria points entirely in the other direction, and as artillerymen Spaniards might prove very different to Egyptians. Or, it may be urged, the range, after all, is great, the Spanish guns on the other side of the Bay would never hit our ships. But, ex hypothesi, it is necessary that the latter should be able to lie safely at anchor. The Spaniards have merely to shoot deliberately and in perfect safety all day. Expenditure of ammunition need be no object to them, with Spain at their backs and a railway line (now on the point of being constructed) to connect them with their arsenals. Allowing for plenty of bad shooting, there will still be quite enough hitting to deny Gibraltar Bay to unarmoured and lightly armoured ships, except by night. It is conceivable that people will be found to propose that we should not permit Spain to mount these guns and to construct this railway, but such a view hardly seems to need refutation. Considering that our guns now command the Spanish town of Linea, at short range, and that Gibraltar is undergoing a continuous process of strengthening and rearmament, it would be an outrage on international justice to deny to the Spaniards the right to mount what they pleased whenever they pleased.

The unavoidable conclusion, that Spain can now, without any grand effort, render the Bay and with it the Fortress of Gibraltar useless to England, should not be shirked, or lightly put aside. Per contra, the guns of Gibraltar render the Bay useless to Spain and her allies. In case of war, therefore, the military position is one of stalemate. There is an alternative, however, which must be stated. At the outset of war, England might seize Algeciras and the adjacent territory across the Bay. This means, practically, the occupation of Andalusia, and those who know the country are best able to form an idea of the magnitude of the operation. In other words, if involved in a European war, Spain being hostile, it may be necessary for us to embark on a considerable campaign for the indirect object of securing the advantages of the possession of Gibraltar, though it might well happen that this campaign would have no direct bearing on the main issue. To enter on a war with hands tied in a way perfectly understood, by possible enemies, is never a satisfactory position. But the very possession of Gibraltar means a hostile Spain, and the weight of that hostility is limited only by her military strength. That strength may at any time assert itself to an extent which has not been suspected, and the recovery of Gibraltar, or the neutralisation of its value to England, is to such a nation precisely the kind of object to arouse enthusiasm, and to create a new point of military departure. Moreover, even if the power of Spain were to remain as weak as it is, sometimes assumed to be, nothing short of an unquestioned military advantage of primary importance should determine us to accept her certain hostility, in the event of war with a Mediterranean Power. The cession or exchange of Gibraltar may at any time become a political question of the first order, and its aspects should be studied in advance; while the comparative advantages of Ceuta call for careful consideration. At least, it is to be hoped that the retention of the place may not ignorantly be deemed a test of patriotism, as was the idle abuse of Russia a few years ago. The moral aspects of the question have been carefully avoided. It is sufficient to note that, while nature seems to have decided that Gibraltar should belong to Spain, it may prove, strangely enough, that modern artillery will vindicate her decision.

PLAGUE AND PANIC.

THE panic which the Cholera is apparently exciting in Egypt will hardly increase the respect in which the Western world is held by Orientals who have to submit to its guidance. The knowledge of life in which the West excels the East is in part compensated by the undignified dismay and confusion with which anything like a general notice to quit is received amongst the Western races by whom the art of living has been so effectually studied. Mr. Kinglake described, with even more than his ordinary vivacity, between forty and fifty years ago, in his "Eothen," the contrast between the conduct of the Levantines at Cairo, pallid with terror, and shrinking from the touch of every fluttering garment or rag in the city, as if it were a sentence of death,—and as if, too, but for the plague, men would be immortal,—and the conduct of the Mahomedans, who calmly pitched their tents for the celebration of their religious festival, and hung swings for their children, in the very burial-ground where the howls of the arriving funerals were heard, hour after hour, proclaiming the rapid depopulation of the great city. The Oriental, whatever his faith, does not seem to consider prolonged life as the only conceivable and intelligible contingency for himself, outside which all is unmeaning and chaotic,—contingencies not even to be approached with dignity and presence of mind. On the contrary, he seems to regard life and death as alike contingencies which he is bound to meet with the same equanimity—alternative branches of the same inscrutable decrees. But the average European can only die with dignity where the steady pressure of opinion and expectation in the class in which he lives supplies a stimulus that enables him to do so; and if that pressure is removed by the contagion of a general panic, such as is caused by the rout of an army or by a frightful epidemic, all restraints vanish at once, and the result is general demoralisation and bewilderment, of which flight appears to be the only fixed idea. Mr. Kinglake contrasts with this undignified flight, the grave demeanour of the Mahomedans. "I did not hear whilst I was at Cairo that any prayer for a remission of the plague had been offered up in the mosques. I believe that, however frightful the ravages of the disease may be, the Mahomedans refrain from approaching Heaven with their complaints until the plague has endured for a long space. Then at last they pray God, not that the plague may cease, but that it may go to another city"! We know not how far this may apply to the attitude of Mahomedans of the present day, but nothing could express better the belief that the plague is sent to answer some specific purpose,—of course, a purpose of destruction,—but that that purpose will in all probability stop short of the complete destruction of a given city, and is likely rather to involve the partial depopulation of other cities. According to Mr. Kinglake, the deaths in Cairo had reached 1,200 a day before he left, and even that was not a point at which it was thought decent by Mahomedans to assume that the purpose of God in sending the plague had been sufficiently fulfilled to make it right to pray that it might pass on to a new place. Thus, the average Oriental evidently faces boldly the possibility that it may be the purpose of God that he and a great number of his companions should die; while the average European averts his mind altogether from such a possibility as purely unnatural, and bolts from the danger which he perceives, so soon as he understands its fatal character, just as, without discipline, he would bolt out of the line of fire of a mitrailleuse, the moment he saw his comrades falling thickly around him. And those words "without discipline" tell the whole secret of the average European's strength and weakness. A disciplined force would be kept in its place by the respect paid to the opinion of those who had been trained to value courage and fidelity to orders more highly than life itself. An undisciplined crowd flies, because there is no such respect for trained opinion, no knowledge that there is such a body of opinion worth respecting, and, finally, because there is no restraining instinct in the individual strong enough to take the place of that social discipline which governs a trained body of men. The Oriental does not fly; because there is in him such a restraining instinct,—an instinct consisting in part, perhaps, of the feeling that life is hardly worth so ignominious a retreat from death; partly, again, of the feeling that life cannot ultimately be so rescued, but will be shortly forfeit again, under circumstances of still greater ignominy, even if for the moment death be delayed. In other words, the value for life is less vehement and potent in the Oriental, while the belief in a discernible destiny is stronger; the value for life is overwhelmingly predominant in the European, while the belief in a destiny that in any sense overrules human action, is more theoretic than practical. The Oriental is less terrified by the prospect of death, and more profoundly impressed by the impossibility of escaping it when the time comes. The European fears premature death as something altogether irrational, unnatural, and almost intolerable except under the social coercion of a professional instinct which has become a second and stronger nature; and, therefore, except when this social coercion is in full force, a European multitude is subject to much more disgraceful panics than an Oriental people, being both more tenacious of life and less tenacious of dignity.

But where Europeans are above all such panics,—and there are not a few who are quite above them,—they are so from very different causes than those which influence Orientals. Either they implicitly believe in the Divine care, and hold death cheap in the cause of duty; or, what is even commoner, their minds are so little accustomed to dwell on anything beyond the immediate task of the day, and are so thoroughly concentrated on that, that even the risk of death does not interfere with their accomplishment of that task. Indeed, we believe that there are not a few Englishmen who, quite as much perhaps from deficiency of imagination as from pertinacity of will, regard a great risk when it attends necessarily the discharge of their duty more as a novel excitement than as a bewildering or dismaying influence. Mr. Kinglake, in the brilliant early work to which we have alluded, tells us of one such case. There was an English doctor in the service of the Pasha, who never took private practice, but who came at once to Mr. Kinglake when appealed to to prescribe for a sore-throat, and, in spite of Mr. Kinglake's warning that an Italian doctor who had since died of the plague had examined him and prescribed for him, insisted on marching straight up to him, and on shaking his hand with "manly violence." It is probable that that man thought no more of the risk of death from the plague than he would have thought when taking a high fence in the hunting-field of the risk of death from a fall,—and this not from any spiritual indifference to life, but because to the vision of such men danger seems a thing to be either faced and overcome, or else faced and not overcome, but in any case to be faced without spending superfluous thought on the contingencies. It is the power of keeping the mind in a groove for purposes of action, and simply ignoring the risks which attend that action, except so far as they add a sense of stimulus to the energy which is thrown into it, which gives to many Englishmen the effect of being superior to panic. We doubt if it is really superiority to panic, though it is impenetrability to panic. Strict superiority to panic is gained only by men whose minds can vividly dwell on and fully realise the prospect of painful and immediate death, and calmly prefer it in the cause of duty. But there is an admirable impenetrability to panic which is totally different in kind, and which springs rather from the habitually narrow groove in which the mind moves, so that all new excitement is instantly transformed into fresh propelling power which quickens the motion in that groove, not from any comprehensiveness of imagination which deliberately weighs the terrors of death in the scales, and finds them wanting in deterrent force.

Nothing is more curious than the fact that dying as one of a crowd, seems to be more terrible to a man than simply dying his own individual death. Unquestionably there seems to be no kind of death more dreaded by men than death either from sudden catastrophes—like that of the Ring Theatre at Vienna and that on the Clyde, for instance—or from pestilence. No doubt, it is perfectly true that death cannot be shared in the same sense in which a peril or a pleasure can be shared;—you cannot, in all probability, be conscious of the strength of companionship after life begins to flicker low, nor are there above one or two people in the world with whom most men would covet the sense of companionship in such a moment as that of death. Still, it is somewhat curious that death on a grand scale always seems to be more terrible, even to the separate individuals, than the ordinary death by units. Of course, terror is very catching, and, therefore, the terror of a crowd always enhances the terror of the individual. But though that explains the supreme agony of a sinking ship or a burning theatre, it does not in the least explain the additional dread of death which plague seems to inspire in individuals, for between the inhabitants of a plague-stricken city there is always very much less active sympathy than there was before the pestilence appeared, and it is rather through the growth of mutual repulsion than through the heightening of a common sympathy, that the influence of pestilence is chiefly felt. Perhaps it will be said that men do not fear death the more on account of the number dying around them, but only that that number makes evident the greatness of the risk. But that can hardly be the explanation of the matter, otherwise we might expect a much deeper terror in every man to whom the doctors have frankly acknowledged that death is imminent, than we ought to find in the healthy inhabitant of a plague-stricken city, whose chance of death is probably much less than one in two. As a matter of fact, very few patients stricken with ordinary disease who are told that death is inevitable, show any panic at all, while the perfectly healthy man, surrounded by pestilence, is too often consumed with a terror which renders him absolutely unfit for the discharge of his duties. It seems certain that the selfish terror inspired by the sight of dying crowds does unnerve men in a manner in which a sentence of death passed upon themselves would not unnerve them at all. We wonder why this is; and suppose the reason to be that it is only a great risk in combination with the chance of escape that unnerves a man whom the prospect of certain death would not unnerve at all. It is the eager passion with which all the mind rushes into the alternative of prolonged life, that really unmans a nature which would be steady enough in facing certain death. Mingle a great fear with a vivid ray of hope, and you will turn a head which could hold its own against inevitable fate. The tumultuous element in the case of plague is, we believe, the selfish desire to escape, rather than the actual prospect of death. The panic felt is really the panic of impetuous hope, rather than the panic of fear. Extinguish the hope, and the panic will often cease as completely as if you had extinguished the fear itself.

THE MURDER AT TISZA ESSLAR.

OUR Jewish contemporaries are quite annoyed because we recently suggested, à propos of the trial at Tisza Esslar, that if evidence were ever produced in favour of the absurd libel on them that Christian victims were slaughtered at the Passover, it might only indicate that some Cabalistic sect with a traditional faith in human sacrifice was embedded among their people. We intended to suggest a defence unassailable by evidence as to special cases, but they accuse us of "philosophic dislike" to Jews, and readiness to receive accusations against them. They are entirely mistaken. We have no more dislike for Jews than for Arabs or Parsees, or any other Oriental people—disliking only the Jewish desire to remain separate, yet cease to be thought so—and have immense respect for the intellect, the fortitude, and the philanthropy of the higher men of the race. We have steadily supported its emancipation in all countries, and in the most absolute and complete form, and have acknowledged in all discussions the debt which the world owes to the race, who for so many ages held up alone the torch of monotheism. We suppose they would not deny that some of them, at least, are earthy, or question our right to dislike that quality in them, as much as brutality in Englishmen or selfish fineness in Italians. Our interest in the affair at Tisza Esslar does not arise from any latent wish or belief that the Jews may be proved guilty—which seems to us simply impossible—but from a strong desire to ascertain, if we can, what the origin is of the rancorous hatred displayed in Hungary, as in a hundred other places, towards a people who deny that they give any cause for it, who neither do nor can oppress their fellow-citizens in any ordinary way, and who are markedly obedient to law, which, in Hungary, as everywhere else, they regard as their strongest rampart. Look at the facts, not denied by anybody, Jews included. Here is a quiet community, dwelling for years, it may be centuries, among the Hungarians—who, again, are accustomed to see among them a medley of races—and yet exciting such hatred, that the moment a Christian girl disappears they are suspected of murdering her, and entire classes help to eke out the "blood accusation." On the theory of the defence, which we implicitly believe, the police agents compel evidence against the Jews by torture, the neighbours volunteer statements which are most of them lies, and everybody whom the police threaten into giving evidence yields at once, and throws his or her stone of testimony against the detested people. In all cases, except that of Moritz Scharf, it is perfectly clear that the "compulsion" was not of the kind to which unwilling men would have submitted. In the Hungarian Court, all these facts come out as clearly as they could have come out in an English one, with the result not of shaking the popular belief in Jewish guilt, but of intensifying it to a fanaticism. There may be some exaggeration in the reports, but as we understand the telegrams, the temper of the population is rising to white-heat. The President can hardly keep his authority. The Public Prosecutor, who clearly disbelieves the whole story as a fanatic fabrication, is threatened with death for his disbelief. An official who revealed in a very quiet and straightforward way the terror to which the lad, Moritz Scharf, was subjected, was loudly accused in Court of taking bribes. A boatman who acknowledged that his evidence had been tampered with was hooted in Court, and several witnesses are under police guardianship, lest the populace should kill them, for admissions on the Jewish side; while, finally, a garrison has to be sent to Tisza Esslar to protect the Jews from general attack, which, nevertheless, as the Jews fear, may still come off. They distrust the soldiers, the police, and the populace almost equally, and are flying in considerable numbers, and with great loss of means. Surely that is a scene strange enough in this century to justify us in seeking to ascertain its causes, and in doubting whether religious prejudice is sufficient explanation. The Protestants, who are just as inimical to the majority, are not hated like that; nor are the Gipsies, who swarm in Hungary, who are Pagans, and who are let alone.

For, let the Jewish Chronicle observe, this populace is not pretending to believe the charge; it does believe it. It is doubtful whether even the police agents, such as Bary and Peczei, who have secured so much of the evidence—and who will, we trust, be prosecuted—are mere perjurers, acting from love of wickedness or hatred of a particular sect. They have no apparent object in inventing the charges; they run, and must have known they would run, immense risk in Court; and the populace which applauds them has nothing whatever to give, except a popularity they do not ask for. There are hints, indeed, of "priests" behind, as in a Catholic country there always are; but what have the priests to gain by murdering particular Jews, who are not in their way, who are not apostates, and whom they have not tried to convert? It is much more probable that the police agents are just as credulous as the populace and the priests, and really believing in the murder, have set themselves, after a fashion too well known upon the Continent, to produce—that is, to invent—sufficient evidence for conviction. At all events, the populace believe, and believe so strongly that evidence to the contrary has no effect upon their minds. They can credit statements in accusation, but they literally cannot credit statements in disproof. They regard Moritz Scharf's accusation of his father as the English mob regarded Lady Tichborne's acknowledgment of her son, as proof of the sort that is above discussion. They are under an impression which operates like a mental disease. Nothing will convince a man under delirium tremens of the unreality of the objects he sees, and nothing probably, not even his own confession, would convince an uneducated man of Tisza Esslar that Moritz Scharf did not see his father cut the throat of Esther Solymosi. A fanatic credulity of that kind has repeatedly struck considerable populations. We have little doubt that the Roman mob, when it yelled, "Christianos ad leones!" often believed that it was demanding the punishment of criminals guilty of perpetual human sacrifices, the only crime apparently which, even in the name of religion, Roman opinion did not tolerate. The London jurors who condemned Catholic citizens upon the evidence of Titus Oates, evidence on the face of it almost ridiculous, believed to a man in the guilt of the accused, though the King who signed the warrants for execution did not. The citizens of Salem, Massachusetts, who tried, condemned, and executed so many witches, were absolutely honest and upright, so honest and so upright that years after they voluntarily acknowledged their error, and endeavoured to expiate it, many of them declaring openly that the strength of their illusion was such that they must have been "possessed." There are still living among us men and women who upon the subject of the Jesuits are not strictly sane, who are not so much unwilling to receive exculpatory evidence about them as powerless to do it, who, if a child of fourteen alleged that boys were weekly slaughtered at Stonyhurst in order that their property might go to the Pope, would consider the statement equivalent to proof, and, like the poor Hungarians of Tisza Esslar, would think all witnesses to the contrary either terrorised or bribed. The phenomenon, however, needs no evidence, for it is universally admitted, and the point of intellectual interest is its operative cause. What is it that in certain cases sweeps out of the minds of whole classes, composed of individuals many of whom must be shrewd, the power of appreciating, or even understanding, evidence?

Many observers who have studied the history of such scenes believe that the cause of them is a positive brain-disease,—a form of lunacy generated by excitement, and passing away as the excitement wears itself out. The facts in the Salem case, and, in a less degree, in the case of Oates's victims, certainly bear out that theory, the capacity for judgment returning as visibly and as slowly as physical health to the victims of spine disease or some forms of epilepsy; but there is another explanation possible also. These fits of suspended judgment very closely resemble in their symptoms fits of protracted panic. No victim of a scare can judge evidence, and hundreds of cases are on medical record in which the most positive testimony has not relieved the mind of its impression. In almost all instances of popular credulity, a fear of some kind has been the motive-power. The Roman Plebs hated the Christians, but also believed that their open defiance of the popular Gods and refusal to sacrifice to them would draw down the wrath of Heaven. The vulgar of the middle-ages had the same belief as to the worshippers of Satan, worshippers whom they firmly believed to exist, and who probably did exist, much lunacy, much defiant misery, and much recoil from Christianity taking that form, which, again, was nourished by the slowly dying traditions of the older creed, and its god Pan. The London juries dreaded even more than they hated, the Catholics, as all of them potential Guy Fawkeses. The citizens of Salem walked in positive physical terror of Satan, and also of the Lord, who might be aroused, if they did not drive Satan out of their midst. The sentiment against the Jesuits has its root in fear, though the actual fear could hardly be defined by its victims, even while they recognise its effects. There must be fear, dread, of the Jews in Tisza Esslar, or hatred could hardly rise so nearly to insanity, and we should like to know what the root of that fear is. The Jewish Chronicle will not tell us, we dare say, but perhaps other witnesses, who know Hungary well, will. Is there not in Hungary, Roumania, and South Russia, mixed up with the dislike for Jews as separatists, and the envy of them as accumulators, a distinct belief that they among mankind are specially sorcerers, and can inflict disease by wishing it? Such a belief prevails among many Mussulman peoples, and it may well have wandered North and West, kept up by the Jewish traditional knowledge of medicine, their legendary lore, and their strong temptation when powerless under wrong to invoke the Powers above to avenge them. Such a belief would account for much, if not all, of the popular credulity, among peoples who in their habits of mind still retain the deep impress of the East.

IRISH LACE AT THE MANSION HOUSE.

THE arrangement of the Exhibition of Irish Lace at the Mansion House is not altogether satisfactory. It does not convey the impression that either accurate knowledge or good-taste has presided over the disposition of the objects. The Exhibition includes both a loan collection and a number of articles for sale, but it mixes them up together, and provides no special exposition of the various kinds, and of the actual condition of the Lacemaking industry in Ireland, so arranged as to be immediately attainable by visitors who wish for information on that important practical point. One central case, containing samples of each of the fabrics exhibited, with labels giving the name of the lace, the place of production, the address of the convent or school where the article has been made, with the date, and the local (not the shop) price, would afford information really requisite, and likely to produce practical results. Inspecting a number of cases, like more or less well "dressed" shop windows, in which guipure and point, lacet and pearl-tatting, Carrickmacross, Innishmacsaint, Clones, Ardee, and Limerick lace are all mixed together, and in many instances "made-up" in utterly common-place fashion—for example, an exquisite piece of lace put over a baby's petticoat of staring white satin, and dabbed with hideous rosettes—is a fatiguing process, and one carries away from it hardly any more distinct idea than one would derive from a milliner's show-room. The absence of background is detrimental to many of the finest specimens in the Loan Collection; for instance, Lady Louth exhibits a superb piece of old Ardee "lacet," a lovely silky, harmonious, delightful example of this beautiful kind of lace, but it is hung at the back of a case, with the fine central wreath awkwardly out of the centre, and a dull wall behind it, so that the object might readily be mistaken for a small window-curtain or a large antimacassar. That lace loses its chief meaning, and fails to convey its full beauty, when it is divided from the idea of drapery, is a self-evident truth; and it makes itself felt here, for the draped samples at once catch the eye, and satisfy it. We look in vain for any specimens of that beautiful old Limerick lace, with its exquisitely soft and fine ground, delicate tint, and patterns of shaded flowers—the effect being produced by an outside thread run round each petal, leaf, and stem—which dates from half a century ago, and may still be seen among the laces of ladies who wore bridal veils, and flounces, and scarfs of it, in the second decade. Limerick lace is a harsh fabric now, with staring, straggly patterns, and the art of shading seems to be lost. The appliqué and guipure made at Limerick (to these the above remarks do not apply) have not prospered. If the old patterns and the former texture of the foundation were revived, the "home demand," which, as we learn from the descriptive pamphlet issued by the Committee, is daily declining, would soon revive also, and in the second particular there ought to be no difficulty. One is struck at once, on examining the Carrickmacross lace, by the evenness, smoothness, accuracy, and beauty of the net or foundation on which it is worked. This, we presume, is to be placed to the credit of the Belfast manufacture. It is a mistake to suppose, as it generally is supposed, that lacemaking is a modern art in Ireland, and that the best lace has been made from Venetian and Spanish patterns. The Irish convents in old days turned out rich and rare laces, and had beautiful designs of their own, synchronous with the stately designs of Venice and Spain, but not borrowed from either. Some of these patterns still survive in what is called the Jesuit lace, and are very rich and beautiful. It is true that as a commercial industry, Irish lacemaking, except at Carrickmacross and Limerick, dates from the famine years 1846-7-8. From 1820, lace had been made at Carrickmacross (the story of Miss Reid's school, told in the descriptive pamphlet, is well worth reading), a town which stands upon the Bath and Shirley estates:—"In 1846, Mr. Tristram Kennedy entered upon the management of the Bath estate. Seeing the great benefit that Miss Reid's school had been to the poor, he conceived the idea of extending, as far as he could, what he called 'cottage industry.' A stimulus to his energy in the matter was given in this year through the failure of the potato crop, by which famine was spread over the land. By a public grant he was enabled to build seven schools on the Bath estate, which consisted of 15,000 acres, with a population of 13,000 souls. . . . While the schools were building, the training was carried on in a house on the townland of Drumlusty. The schools were completed in 1850, and after that date Carrickmacross became the principal, as well as the central school, and gives the name to all the lace made in the district." The Exhibition at the Mansion House shows us what has been the spread and the prospering of Mr. Kennedy's good work, and proves that Ireland is second to none of the famous lacemaking countries in this refined and beautiful art.

We have been told of late that real lace is "out," that its value has greatly decreased; that the dressmakers use lace so profusely, and the modern kinds of imitation, all made in France, are so fine, that ladies prefer them to real—in short, that the future is to the machine—but we doubt it. The cascade of frippery now worn will go "out" in its turn, like the over-worked sunflowers and the sage-green garments of a year or two ago, and "good" lace will have its turn. To this end the Mansion House Exhibition will, it is to be hoped, largely contribute, for English ladies may there see for themselves that no better lace is to be had than that which they may order from the Irish schools; direct, if they will take the trouble to do so, and thus benefit the poor lacemakers in the first degree, or, if only their taste be consulted, and charity have no part in the impulse, through the shops which supply the various fabrics. There is hardly any taste in lace that cannot be suited by the products of Carrickmacross, Limerick, Cork, Youghal, Clones, Ardee, and Innismacaint; but it is urgent that all that is common and utterly cheap should be rigidly discarded and suppressed. The author of "The Lutaniste of St. Jacobi's," the most perfect lacemaking story that ever was written, has set before the world the ideal of the art; now is the time to fit that ideal to our modern days, and to keep this rare and beautiful art at its best among the poor Irish girls and children, who may be saved in great numbers from either the workhouse or the emigrant ship, if only mysterious "fashion" turns her smile their way. "What'll ye buy, ladies, what'll ye buy?"—shall it be the grand and stately lace that reminds one of the Hôtel de Cluny and Louis Treize; of Venice and Mr. Browning's "Galuppi," of the Low Countries and Anne of Austria, that calls up a whole gallery of pictures, in short, and makes one feel it almost audacious for every-day folk wearing the garments of the period to put it on; or shall it be the gossamer sort, that goes well with a rosy cheek and sweeping eyelashes, and might have been designed for Titania, by command of Oberon? If you will have the former, some of the very poorest of the Irish peasantry, dwellers on a desolate tract of land on the southern shores of Lough Erne (the interpretation of its native name is "The Island of the Sorrel Plain"), will put forth for you from under their toil-worn fingers the native flax in the form of the ancient Venetian, Spanish, and Rose point lace. And it will bear the closest inspection for design, and stitch, and texture; it will drape your gown royally, and be the "old lace" of your great-great-grandchildren, when all the Irish difficulties, and your own, have long been settled. For Innismacaint bears away the palm easily among the heavy laces, and each specimen that one makes out among the clumsy arrangement, seems more beautiful, laborious, and stately than the last. This fabric dates from 1849; it is also made at Cappoquin, in County Waterford. It all arose from a piece of old lace that strayed somehow into the village of Tynan, in County Armagh, and inspired the wife of the Rector of the parish to teach the children to imitate it; and the story of the Youghal lace, or "Irish Point," which is of surpassing beauty, is very similar:—"The famine was sore in the land, the children who attended the school of the Presentation Convent at Youghal wanted bread; the only employment offered was muslin embroidery, at which it was then calculated that a moderately good worker could earn one penny by ten hours of diligent labour. An old piece of lace was found in the convent; a worthy nun, after much thought and meditation, tried to copy it, and to teach the poor children to do the same." This was the beginning, but the nun studied, examined, procured new patterns, and improving upon them, added many a stitch of her own invention. Hence the Irish Point Lace, with its peculiar cachet of genius and skill. A magnificent specimen of Youghal lace is exhibited by Mrs. Alfred Morrison; it is as though a cobweb had been held out in the sunshine, and all the daintiest leaves and buds, blossoms, notes, and fantasies that ever grew, blew, or floated, had been captured and fixed on its meshes.

The subject of the Lacemaking industry of Ireland has practical and economical aspects which need to be treated elsewhere; the object of the present writer is only to draw attention to the artistic beauty and value of the exhibits, and to urge the remunerative nature of purchases of Irish real lace.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

BISHOP COLENZO.

SIR,—I shall be permitted, I hope, to point out in your columns that a wrong impression, as it seems to me, is likely to be conveyed by some of the expressions employed by you in your review of the labours that a week ago were brought to a close in Natal.

In referring to the influence which the writings of the late F. D. Maurice are supposed to have had upon my father's mind, you say that,—“With the essential genius of those writings Dr. Colenso can never have had any deep sympathy, since his own mind was much more impressed by such matters as the blundering numeration of the Book of Exodus, than the moral revelation it contained. Later on, he developed the rationalism—or shall we say the mathematical matter-of-factness?—of his Scriptural criticism in the book which excited so much more interest than it deserved, and which really only proved what all genuine scholars knew,—that the historical part of the Pentateuch is a human composition, by no means exempt from error.” Is the above quite consistent with the account given by my father himself of the motives which led him to investigate the history of the composition of the Pentateuch?

“There was a time in my own life when I could have heartily assented to such language as the following, which Burgon (Inspiration, &c., p. 89), asserts to be the creed of orthodox believers, and which, probably, expresses the belief of many English Christians at the present day:—‘The Bible is none other than the Voice of Him that sitteth upon the Throne! Every book of it—every chapter of it—every verse of it—every word of it—every syllable of it—(where are we to stop?) every letter of it—is the direct utterance of the Most High! The Bible is none other than the Word of God—not some part of it more, some part of it less, but all alike the utterance of him who sitteth upon the Throne—absolute—faultless—unerring—supreme.’ Such was the creed of the school in which I was educated. God is my witness! what hours of wretchedness have I spent at times, while reading the Bible devoutly from day to day, and reverencing every word of it as the Word of God, when petty contradictions met me, which seemed to my reason to conflict with the notion of the absolute historical veracity of every part of Scripture, and which, as I felt, in the study of any other book, we should honestly treat as errors or misstatements, without in the least detracting from the real value of the book! But, in those days, I was taught that it was my duty to fling the suggestion from me at once, as if it were ‘a loaded shell, shot into the fortress of the soul,’ or to stamp out desperately, as with an iron heel, each spark of honest doubt, which God's own gift, the love of Truth, had kindled in my bosom. And by many a painful effort I succeeded in doing so for a season. But my labours, as a translator of the Bible, and a teacher of intelligent converts from heathenism, have brought me face to face with questions from which I had hitherto shrunk, but from which, under the circumstances, I felt it would be a sinful abandonment of duty any longer to turn away. I have, therefore, as in the sight of God Most High, set myself deliberately to find the answer to such questions, with, I trust and believe, a sincere desire to know the Truth, as God will's us to know it, and with a humble dependence on that Divine Teacher who alone can guide us into that knowledge, and help us to use the light of our minds aright. The result of my inquiry is this, that I have arrived at the conviction—as painful to myself at first as it may be to my reader, though painful now no longer, under the clear shining of the Light of Truth—that the Pentateuch, as a whole, cannot possibly have been written by Moses, or by any one acquainted personally with the facts which it professes to describe, and, further, that the (so-called) Mosaic narrative, by whomsoever written, and though imparting to us, as I fully believe it does, revelations of the Divine Will and Character, cannot be regarded as historically true.”

He then distinguishes between the class of difficulties which in the end determined his conclusions and difficulties of another sort, such as those which are created by the numerous petty variations and contradictions in the Old-Testament narrative,—those arising from the consideration of its miracles, or when we regard “the trivial nature of a vast number of conversations and commands ascribed directly to Jehovah, especially the multiplied ceremonial minutiae laid down in the Levitical Law;” and finally, such as “must be started at once in most pious minds, when such words as these are read, professedly coming from the Holy and Blessed One, the Father and 'Faithful Creator' of all mankind":—

"If a man smite his servant or his maid with a rod, and he die under his hand, he shall be surely punished. Notwithstanding, if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished: for he is his money."—E. xxi., 20-21.

With regard to this text, the Bishop wrote:—

"I shall never forget the revulsion of feeling with which a very intelligent native, with whose help I was translating these last words into the Zulu tongue, first heard them as words said to be uttered by the same great and gracious Being whom I was teaching him to trust in and adore. His whole soul revolted against the notion that the Great and Blessed God, the Merciful Father of all Mankind, would speak of a servant or maid as mere 'money,' and allow a horrible crime to go unpunished, because the victim of the brutal usage had survived a few hours!"

The moral difficulties last indicated, however, brought his mind "to a stand." As he wrote in 1872 ("Lectures on the Pentateuch," second edition, p. 112):—

"But the fact that such barbarous commands as those we have heard to-day, were here attributed to the Fountain of all Goodness, was painfully forced upon my mind while engaged in translating the Book of Exodus into Zulu. I felt that it was absolutely impossible to believe this, without abandoning all trust in a righteous and perfect Being, whose children we are, and whose moral excellencies are faintly reflected in our own. From that time, I resolved that, cost what it might in time and labour, ay, and in other things which men hold dear, I would, God helping me, search into the mystery, and master, if possible, the history of the composition of the Pentateuch. . . . And if I have helped in any way to relieve your minds and the minds of others, as well as my own, from the misery of finding such laws as I have quoted, and other like laws, ascribed to the God of Truth and Love, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, in a Book which traditionary teaching represents as divinely infallible, I feel that I shall not have lived in vain."

I do not know where, if not in the columns of the Spectator, one would look for a recognition of the two great facts that underlie the Bishop's writings,—the fact, namely, that at the time when he published his work on the Pentateuch, whatever the conclusions to which lay scholars had come, the bulk of his fellow-clergy deeply resented any criticism, however devout, which did not accept Bishop Wilberforce's view of inspiration; and the fact that it was Bishop Colenso's reverence for the moral revelation contained in the Old Testament, and nowhere more impressively dwelt upon than in the most recent of his many sermons, which forced him to enter upon the investigation that led to his throwing off what he felt to be the intolerable yoke of the traditionary teaching in vogue twenty years ago.—I am, Sir, &c., ONE OF HIS SONS.

THE LIBERALS AND PROVINCIAL MEETINGS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your two last numbers letters have appeared from correspondents in the country complaining that Liberal M.P.'s are lukewarm, if not positively indifferent, to the duty of attending public meetings in the provinces. This is not so. There is no difficulty whatever in getting Liberal M.P.'s to go to public meetings within reasonable or even unreasonable distance of London, if they are approached through some recognised authority, such as the Liberal Central Association, or the London and Counties Liberal Union. The fault lies at the door of the promoters of the meetings.

I happen to know that at the request of the two associations I have just named, the services of at least forty Liberals M.P.'s have been secured for different public meetings in the home counties during the past winter. The usual course pursued by local Liberal Associations is, first, to engage their hall and complete their arrangements, and then go to work to obtain speakers, with the date irrevocably fixed. Then they write to forty or fifty M.P.'s, and ask them to come. If it is a favourable day, some eight or ten of them may accept; and in that case, when the reminder comes a few days before the meeting, and each M.P. sees there are seven or more going, nobody goes at all, and the affair is a fiasco.

The next invitation that comes of a similar kind, A finds that B, C, D, E, F, G, &c., are also invited, and by common consent they all refuse. This is exactly what happened in the case which gave rise to the correspondence. Invitations were sent simultaneously to thirty-six M.P.'s, and they all declined, believing some other one would accept. Had the Secretary of the association written three or four weeks before the meeting to either Mr. J. Noble, of the Liberal Counties Union, or to the Liberal Central Association, with a choice of two or three dates, I am quite certain that two Liberal M.P.'s would have been at the meeting, and "Publius" would not have rushed into print with his complaint.

Not very long ago, I met in the lobby of the House the Secretary of the Liberal Association of a large Lancashire town. He complained bitterly of the neglect of the Liberal Party to furnish M.P.'s for a meeting he had been trying in vain to organise for two winters in succession. I soon found that he had been following the usual methods. I asked him to give me three days to choose from, and ten minutes to get him his speakers. In six minutes I gave him the names of four Members willing to go, one of whom was a distinguished member of the Ministry. The meeting was held, the speakers willingly travelled over 200 miles to attend it, and were rewarded by an audience of nearly 4,000.

I can assure "Publius" that had he taken time by the forelock, entered the field with a choice of days, and applied through a recognised channel, he would have found it equally easy to get his platform made up.—I am, Sir, &c.,

"AUT CÆSAR AUT NIHIL."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—May I correct one or two errors in your notice of "Aut Cæsar aut Nihil"? It would be an affectation to strain at the gnat of truth, and swallow the camel of scandal. To use your reviewer's words, I "might have spared" you "the Perowska episode," and the death-bed of the Empress saint. But if you will turn back two years, and cast an eye over the infamous scandal and tittle-tattle of the "dailies" and "weeklies" of that date, I think you will agree with the drift of the words I put into the mouth of one of my characters,—"Where it is a question of the choice of evils, a bigamous marriage is better than an Eastern harem." Private lives are sacred. The lives of Emperors are public property; and if history is not allowed to speak the truth, gossip will abuse the prerogative of fiction.

Helena Perowska did not submit to a "mock marriage." She believed her marriage to be a bonâ fide one, and she submitted to it, as a young, innocent girl submits to family arrangements of the kind in many Continental countries. She was no saint then, and the Egeria episodes grew out of circumstances. That she did not seek "the vulgar revenge of a murderess" the story amply shows, though your reviewer evidently fancies assassination to have been her aim. When it came to the point, she risked her own life repeatedly to save that of the man she had once loved.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE AUTHOR OF "AUT CÆSAR AUT NIHIL."

[The question which the Countess von Bothmer raises is one rather of taste than of fact. It is precisely such a marriage of convenience as Helena Perowska's that to English eyes seems a mock one. She went through a marriage ceremony to please the Czar. Almost the moment it was over she became his mistress. While she was trying to play Egeria to his Numa, she was deserted, because—so at least she suspected—she was childless. Surely it is reasonable to describe as painful such an episode in the life of a woman represented as animated by the highest motives. Although Helena Perowska did not obtain the revenge of the murderess, she "sought" it, when she joined the Nihilists. She did so simply and solely to punish her faithless lover, and she could not fail to divine the meaning and aim of their conspiracy.—Ed. Spectator.]

POETRY.

TWILIGHT.

THE Sunrise waits behind Heaven's gates,
Unclosed of lagging Morning;
In shadows slow the world below
Fore-greets it, self-adorning.

The sweet song-bird is rising heard,
The cold, grey light is growing,
To herald still on every hill
The red Sun's royal flowing.

The still dark night foresees the light
Before her heat she lends us;
And waning far, the dwindling star
Its mystic message sends us.

In glowing pride of prospect wide
The firmament uncloses;

And wakes to bliss with stooping kiss
The petals of the roses.

The watch-dog's sleep, serene and deep,
Breaks on the morning's breaking,
And pillowed head that mocked the dead
From dream to work is waking.

The sons of toil in earth's turmoil
Come forth ere day to labour;
And lazy wealth outsleeps his health,
To compensate his neighbour.

The world of sound springs up around,
In murmurs waxing ever;
And wearied men are armed again,
To face the long endeavour.

We know not, we, what this may be,
The mystery of ages,
Which day by day writes lives away
On unremembered pages.

But calm at least, they watch the East,
For victory or disaster,
Who firmly hold the best the old,
And Faith alone the Master.

MR. FREEMAN ON THE AMERICAN.*

THE book in which Mr. Freeman records his impressions of the United States will, no doubt, find many readers. The subject is one of abiding interest, and Mr. Freeman's treatment of it cannot fail to excite attention. He tells us that his book is the fruit of a six months' visit to the United States, and surely to have observed so carefully, to have accumulated so many facts in so short a time, must be looked upon as no ordinary performance. Nor is it his industry alone that deserves praise; Mr. Freeman desires to see the object fairly, and he reproduces the impression it makes upon him with much faithfulness; the result is that the likeness of Brother Jonathan which is accepted in England as exact, is seen to be a mere caricature. So much must be said in justice to Mr. Freeman. Inasmuch, however, as the political relations of the two countries make it important for us to see our Transatlantic kinsmen as they really are, the shortcomings of the book deserve notice. Now, these shortcomings are mainly due to the fact that Mr. Freeman has made it "something of his business to set forth the essential oneness of the two peoples;" in fact, the American is to him in all senses an Englishman. This confession is likely to astonish the reader; it is as if one tried to describe a species of foreign oak by enumerating and insisting upon the points of resemblance between it and the well-known English tree. Yet when Mr. Freeman tells us that to him the thought of the true unity of the scattered English folk, is a thought higher and dearer than any thought of a British Empire to the vast majority of whose subjects the common speech of Chatham and Washington, of Gladstone and Garfield is an unknown tongue, he seems, even if his political ideal be left out of the question, to have strengthened his position by an appeal to facts. It must be acknowledged that Mr. Freeman's portrait does bear some resemblance to the original. Chatham, Washington, Gladstone, and Garfield have all what is called a family likeness. One might, in fact, go further, and say that the two Englishmen here mentioned could better stand for Americans, and that the two Americans are quite peculiarly English. This is equivalent to asserting that there is a type of manhood as distinctively American as is our English type distinctively English, and not German. Now, if this be true, our disagreement with Mr. Freeman is no mere formal one; it results from a difference of standpoint. The facts, then, will bear a different reading to that which pleases him. We intend, accordingly, to draw attention to some distinctive features of the American, in order to correct Mr. Freeman's picture. This ought to be done by an Englishman, inasmuch as to insist upon differences may be to insist upon superiorities; it, therefore, becomes an Englishman better than it does an American to lay stress upon peculiarly American traits.

* Some Impressions of the United States. By E. A. Freeman. London: Longmans, Green, and Co.

Mr. Freeman remarks that the Americans now speak of "Englishman," where they formerly spoke of "Britisher," and he seems to draw hope from the disuse of the contemptuous epithet that the Americans may yet come to call themselves Englishmen. This is one instance of how Mr. Freeman reads facts which must, we think, be differently interpreted. The Americans have passed from contempt to appreciation of the English people in like measure as they have become conscious of their own peculiar excellencies. They can now afford to recognise worth in others; pride in their own national qualities moves them to give each race its due. Now, this pride owes much of its strength to the Civil War. The Southerner liked to dwell upon his English origin, he thought and spoke of himself as an aristocrat, and as this called forth sympathy in England, the Northerner was thrown upon the past of his own land, and came to pride himself more and more upon his birthright as an American as the Northern and Western armies gained ground. Each victory tended to define the national character more sharply, by making it more self-conscious. In fact, with the triumph of the North the American may be said to have reached manhood; that is, just at the time when he first began to use the word "national" instead of "federal," which usage Mr. Freeman is content to condemn as "often inexact," without trying to explain its origin. With this pride in himself and in his nation came a natural revulsion against the braggartism and restless self-assertion, which had been, till then, characteristic of the American. The passengers had not faith in Bludso's nobility; no,—

"We all had trust in his cussedness,
And knewed he would keep his word."

Now, this pride, this self-disparagement, is peculiarly an English trait, and when the American also exhibits it, he seems but to have come nearer to us. Yet the pride of the American has, so to speak, a different root. An English reviewer recently noticed with some indignation that Mr. Howells and Mr. James depict Englishmen as rather stupid and the American as having more brains. In this opinion, these novelists are at one with their countrymen, who speak of the Englishmen in Canada as Kanucks. Even the average American feels that the Canadian is borné, is somewhat of a Philistine. For the American—and this is his characteristic feature—has a marked liking for intellectual power. "Old-fashioned," "slow," words which to an English ear seem rather complimentary than otherwise, convey to an American the most damning blame; "wide-awake," "keen," on the other hand, are apt to inspire an Englishman with some fear lest the individual so characterised should be too shrewd to be honest, whereas these words only express praise or admiration when used by an American. Now, this change of mental attitude has innumerable consequences. The American hopes all from energy rightly applied, the Englishman relies upon steady perseverance. The one abandons immediately what he sees to be a hopeless undertaking the other, believing "'tis dogged as does it," sets his teeth hard, and is even more obstinate in the wrong than in the right. The American prefers thoughts, and is quicker to seize upon generalisations; the Englishman loves facts, and believes in the logic of events. The one is more flexible, more sympathetic; the other more constant, were it to rigidity. The reader can now see what we meant by saying that Chatham and Gladstone are more distinctively American than Washington and Garfield. The characteristic trait in the first pair is intelligence, in the second, strong moral sense.

We now pass to modifications of character which are the result of a new social environment. Strangely enough, Mr. Freeman regards all the phenomena arising from this cause as accidental and isolated; he is like a botanist who collects specimens without knowing any system of classification. Yet it must never be forgotten that the form of society in America is democratic, while in England it is aristocratic. Now, although Mr. Freeman is determined "to set forth the essential oneness of the two peoples," he yet acknowledges that "the American and the British daily papers must be set down as two essentially different things," and this because of a peculiar feature of the American journal, "Even the New York Tribune," he writes, "admits personal paragraphs which would certainly never find their way into the Times, the Daily News, or the Standard;" and he accounts for this by asserting "that the American paper is clearly written for a class of readers inferior to the average reader of the English paper." Now, De Tocqueville goes deeper than does Mr. Freeman, for the Frenchman saw that the public life of a democracy, representing as it does the feelings of the masses, is likely to fall below the standard of taste maintained in an aristocracy, which represents the feelings of a small and select class. Yet neither De Tocqueville nor Mr. Freeman explains the difference; they both are content to see it as an inferiority. "The baby of Mrs. B. weighs, we are informed, 12 lb. The lady hopes to be about again soon." Such an announcement as this is common enough in an American paper. It is vulgar, silly, what you like, but the average American reader likes any piece of news which emphasises the fact that all men are brothers, whereas the heart of the Englishman dilates with loyal pride when he reads that "the Princess B. rode in the morning, and dined in the evening." The parallel to personal paragraphs is to be found in the Times under the heading of "The Court." As regards manners, good-natured vulgarity is the failing of a democracy, as flunkeyism is the failing of an aristocracy. Without determining which failing is the more vicious, we pass to the corresponding social virtues. Mr. Freeman remarks that "the American 'Justice of the Peace' holds a position very inferior to the position of his English brother," and adds, "so does the American Sheriff." This he explains by the fact that "the one is a paid, and the other an unpaid functionary." Now, this fact, brought forward as an explanation, is a mere consequence of the form of society, and in itself explains nothing. Mr. Freeman might have noticed that in America no dignitary stands apart from and above his fellow-man as does an English dignitary, and this less because the English dignitary is superior in character and ability to the American, than because the average American stands in education and influence far above the average Englishman. "Servants," "hands," "yokels," "paupers," are almost unknown in America; while these classes form here, if not the majority, at least a large minority of the nation. Had Mr. Freeman remembered that America was a democracy, he would not have been surprised, as he was, on finding that the murder of President Garfield was treated not as the murder of a President, but as the murder "simply of one James Abram Garfield." The italics are ours. The virtue of a democratic form of government is to be found in the natural, kindly feeling between man and man, as the virtue of an aristocratic form lies in dignity, and in a high sense of honour. Now, this dignity of the aristocrat is often represented in America by the dignity of conscious worth of manhood, just as the kindly feeling between all men in a democracy is sometimes represented in an aristocracy by the kindness of the master to the servant. Before Mr. Freeman spoke of "inferiority," he should have called to mind that the lowest class of Americans (the negro and the emigrant are here excluded) compares favourably with the English middle-class. Nor are the heights in America uninhabited. Ralph Waldo Emerson was but the central figure of a group, the best representative of a large and constantly increasing class.

It would, indeed, be surprising that Mr. Freeman should have spent six months in America without noticing the one capital fact, viz., "the Jonathanisation of John," were it not that in considering quite ordinary facts, facts which "he who runs may read," Mr. Freeman shows himself equally at fault. Of a large class of phenomena his explanation is that in America "the tendency to stand still sometimes strangely contrasts with the tendency to go ahead." For instance, the bad roads seem to Mr. Freeman to be due to this "tendency to stand still," whereas the true explanation must at once suggest itself. The roads are bad because distances are great, labour dear, the rate of interest on capital high, because other public works are more remunerative and more pressingly needed than well-paved roads. Again, the hire of hackney-carriages is in America very costly for similar reasons. But no such considerations occur to Mr. Freeman, and his explanation of this latter fact is so characteristic as to be amusing. Inasmuch as in the Eastern States Irishmen are generally the drivers, he couples Paddy with the "unreasonable cost," and asks, with some heat, "Why should transplanted Englishmen, or transplanted Dutchmen either, bow down their necks to this Irish bondage?" Now, one might hint that in the Western States the drivers are Americans, and the cost of hiring still more unreasonable, but nothing would lessen Mr. Freeman's dislike of all things Irish. Yet here he could surely console himself with the reflection that the Irish "cabby" in Dublin, at any rate, is compelled to drive five or six miles for sixpence. The other day, an American—such is the difference of mental attitude—used this fact to explain the readiness of "Skin the Goat" to assist the Invincibles. The remedy for "whatever is amiss in America would be," according to Mr. Freeman, "if every Irishman should kill a negro and be hanged for it." This joke (Mr. Freeman tells us that it is one) becomes serious, when we are told that Paddy is not a Teuton, and that Sambo is not even a Western Aryan. Here we touch the spring of Mr. Freeman's determination to set forth the essential oneness of the two branches of the English folk; in doing this, he confirms his appreciation of all things Teutonic. Well, as we, too, see the limitless expanse of ether as a mere blue dome, we must not judge Mr. Freeman harshly, who sees the American as a flaxen-haired, broad-built, phlegmatic Teuton. It is only as characteristic of this peculiarity of mental vision that we notice Mr. Freeman's contempt for American scholarship. Not that we altogether disagree with his estimate of American scholars; we are not minded to break a lance in defence of professors of history who know nothing of the "original sources" of historical knowledge, nor can we agree with him on the point in question, for we are of those who believe that these fabled springs must rather be found in the mind of the historian, than, as Mr. Freeman asserts, on the shelves of his library. If, however, one would measure the whole difference between the scholar as conceived by an Englishman and the scholar as conceived by an American, let him take this,—that Mr. Freeman cannot understand "why any man should either pretend to know a thing that he does not know, or pretend not to know a thing that he does know," and put it beside this, "translate, collate, distil all the systems, it steads you nothing, for truth will not be compelled in any mechanical manner."

ALFRED DE MUSSET AND MR. POLLOCK.*

ACCIDENT has left us late in the field with a review of a worthy piece of work. The memory of Alfred de Musset's Night of May, Night of August, and Night of October, the last especially (December is omitted from the collection before us), lingers like a strain of music with those who love them well. It is highly to the credit of the old company of the Théâtre Français that they should once have been able to produce, in Madame Favart and M. Delaunay, two actors capable of reciting the Nuit d'Octobre on the stage in the manner in which those two did it. Made up, as the players call it, in close resemblance to the well-known pictures of Musset himself, Delaunay brought to bear on the character of the poet the gifts he had so sedulously cultivated, of graceful bearing and scholarly elocution, with the tender and sympathetic voice which he had acquired, like his other qualities, if we are to believe the critics of his early appearances, by hard and ungrudging work. The translation before us is appropriately dedicated to him. As the poet's muse, Madame Favart fairly surpassed anything in which we remember her. It can have been no easy matter so to divest a purely spiritual conception of all merely human feeling, and yet to stamp upon it a deep sense of personal tenderness, as in this case the actress did. Imagine Ariel a woman, with something of a woman's attachment to a mortal man, yet withal supernatural and divine, and the difficulty of submitting the muse of the October Night to the earthly, footlight test will be realised at once. But through that test, by an exceptional display of her graceful art, Favart carried it. We can recall the accents now with which she soothed her poet's vexed heart and wearied fancy, when he had poured out to her the griefs which a woman had wrought for him:—

"Si l'effort est trop grand pour la faiblesse humaine
De pardonner les maux qui nous viennent d'autrui,
Épargne-toi du moins le tourment de la haine :
À défaut du pardon, laisse venir l'oubli !"

There was something in it quite wonderful, for it had in it even the ring of passion, yet without earthly alloy; not the love of a mother, nor of a mistress, nor of a wife, but passionate and living, for all that, as of some spirit-sister sent to watch and to care, and full of yearning,—over the poor, struggling, human soul. As we think of the type of French actress which has since Favart's younger day been thrust into Favart's place, and forced into a foolish and artificial prominence, we can only ask ourselves where criticism on things of art, if it is to exercise any wholesome and guiding influence at all, has gone to niche itself.

It is doubtful if Alfred de Musset has yet taken the place which we believe he will take among the dramatists of the world. It may seem a bold thing to say, but to us he has more of the special magic of Shakespeare than any other man. Like Lord Byron, in some respects his model, he did not write his plays for the stage; but unlike Lord Byron, he held it when he came there. No company but that of the Français as it was, perhaps, could well have attempted pieces so unconventional in their frame and diction from the theatre's point of view. "Laissez tomber sur les pièces de Scribe, c'est-à-dire de l'écrivain le plus expert dans son métier, une seule goutte d'Alfred de Musset, qui était le poète le plus naïf et le moins expert dans ce métier-là, et vous verrez tout le théâtre de Scribe se dissoudre et se volatiliser comme le mercure à une chaleur de trois cent cinquante degrés." We believe that we are quoting from a criticism of the younger Dumas, and must apologise for errors, as we quote from memory. In the "Caprices de Marianne," "Il ne Faut Jurer de Rien," and "On ne Badine pas avec l'Amour," there are scenes and characters whose special quality of humanity seems inspired by the spirit of Shakespeare himself.

By right, probably, of that naïveté of his, and consequent unstaginess, Musset has fortunately escaped in England the cruel process of "adaptation," that wholesale mangling of an author's language and characters, which surely he has a right to invent for himself, as unfair to him as a direct and scholarly translation is fair and advantageous. We believe that only one or two of his shorter pieces have been used here. One we remember—the "Caprice"—where one sentence, "J'ai mis M. de Chavigny à la porte avec son petit meuble," is transmuted by the adapter's alchemy into this (printed), "I have put M. de Chavigny at the door with his little piece of furniture." A good and sympathetic translation of Alfred de Musset's works has yet to be made in English, and will be a valuable addition to our literature when it is made. Meantime, Mr. Walter Pollock deserves thanks, and great thanks, for giving us a version of the "Nights," which will always be a chief favourite with the poet's readers. Mr. Pollock has aimed, as he says in his preface, at a version rather an accurate translation of the original, and has tried to preserve it in spirit rather than in letter. There are the two legitimate forms of translation, and the choice must depend upon the translator. We must credit Mr. Pollock with knowing his own capabilities best, when he tells us that he has chosen to use blank verse throughout, rather than preserve the varying metres of the original,—exquisite, as he truly calls them. For that, we are, as he admits that he expects lovers of Musset will be—what is the reason for the peculiar use of the name "Musset," in this instance in French, instead of "De Musset"?—ourselves something inclined to quarrel with him. The sudden but harmonious changes in the French poems "come o'er the ear like the sweet South," and produce in the reader an infinite pleasure of sound; and we should have preferred it if Mr. Pollock, who has more than once shown himself possessed of a true gift of rhyme, had grappled more boldly with his difficulty. Take this from the original:—

Rentre dans ton tombeau, si tu t'en es levé;
Laisse-moi pour toujours oublier ma jeunesse,
Et, quand je pense à toi, croire que j'ai rêvé."

And on this passionate adjuration of the poet fall the words of the Muse like a charm, in the varied rhythm,—

"Apaise-toi, je t'en conjure:
Tes paroles m'ont fait frémir.
O mon bien-aimé! ta blessure
Est encore prête à se rouvrir."

The translation, being in continuous blank verse, necessarily, as we think, misses much of the peculiarity of this effect:—

"Let me believe I dreamed of such an one.
Calm thee, my Poet, for thy very words," &c.

Taking Mr. Pollock's translation as it is, however, it has resulted, to our thinking, in a considerable measure of success. And treating the "Nights" as a stage poem, blank verse, which is the natural language of the Stage in English, has its advantages. It is much to be regretted on all accounts that both the writing it and the speaking it upon the stage are almost as lost arts. Blank-verse plays, once the staple of the dramatic year, are now few and far between; and as, not being published, they cannot secure readers, they do not much tempt the ambition of authors who have any command over blank verse. Within the last fifteen years, Mr. Gilbert has given us five or six, Mr. Wills three or four, Mr. Merivale one or two, and as far as we can remember, that is about all.

Mr. Pollock, if we are not mistaken, should be able, with a good choice of subject, to do good work in blank verse for the stage. Some of his lines show real power in that direction, and most when the original is the most dramatic, for after all the "Nuits" only becomes so in parts, being essentially a reflective poem, whose text is the loss of inspiration which follows first on a great sorrow, and the new inspiration which is afterwards born of it, shadowed by Musset in the visits of the Muse to the Poet:—

"It is a law severe, a law supreme,
Old as the world, and as fatality,
That men must be baptized in suffering.
Tears are the dew that quickens human hearts."

How should'st thou love the garden-scented breeze,
The birds' rejoicing anthem, and the arts
That lend a grace to Nature, if through all
Thou did'st not hear the echo of past sighs?
The heaven's illimitable harmony,
The silence of the night, the murmuring flood,—
How should'st thou love all those, unless thy pain
Had made thee long for an eternal rest?"

It is difficult, or rather impossible, to lay down rules about blank verse, which can only be judged and tested by ear; and no one ear is like another. Authorities will differ among themselves for ever upon one line of Shakespeare,—

"Why thy canonized bones, hear'd in Death," and while some will steadily maintain that the emphasis in "canonised" must be on the second syllable, from the eternal necessities, others, among whom the present writer must be numbered, insist upon the natural emphasis on the first syllable as giving a musical and most legitimate irregularity to the line, which should offend the ear in nowise, judicious irregularities being one of the charms of good blank verse. What is to decide, when the irregularity becomes a blot? Take, for instance, a line from Mr. Stopford Brooke's published version of Biquet of the Tuft:—

"Flowed in a ripple, paused at her ear, then fell."

Many may think that there is no excess of licence in that line. To us, it is simply detestable. But it is a question of ear. We write, therefore, with hesitation about blank verse, which cannot be brought to book as rhyme can, for definite and flagrant sins. But the lines from Mr. Pollock's translation which we have quoted strike us as thoroughly well balanced, with words well chosen, and periods regularly tunable.

"The birds' rejoicing anthem, and the arts
That lend a grace to Nature," are to us an instance of what may be called a complete blank-verse period, satisfying the ear in itself.

There are other and striking passages scattered through the translation, which are too long to quote.

"The finest songs are children of despair,
And some immortal strains are one vast sob,"

where the two monosyllables which close the second line strike us as a little awkward, as a sibilant, introduce a very good rendering of the Homeric simile of the pelican, in La Nuit de Mai:—

"Lorsque le pélican, lassé d'un long voyage."

And very gracefully rendered are the opening lines of the poem:—

"Take thy lute, Poet. Turn and kiss thy Muse,
It is the birth-night of the Spring. The breeze
Stirs with fresh life to catch the new-born scent
Of sweetbriar blossoms; on the first green boughs
The wagtail perches, waiting for the dawn.
Take thy lute, Poet. Turn and kiss thy Muse."

Mr. Pollock has prefaced the poems by a short blank-verse introduction of his own, which he gives, we suppose, in order to explain to the English reader the purpose of the original, which might otherwise have been obscure. There we think him wrong, on the ground on which we have protested against adaptation. If Alfred de Musset had meant his poem to have an introduction, Alfred de Musset would have written it. But the introduction is harmoniously written, and shows that Mr. Pollock has not translated his poet without loving and studying him:—

"My heart is dead, and what shall bring it life?
Most idle sorrow for an idle thing,—
But what shall cure it? All that once I loved Seems barren, and my mind, that did delight
To give expression to the fleeting forms
Of fancy, is weighed down with heaviness
Of recollection,—all the world is dark,
And I the heaviest blot upon its face.
She who, before I knew that faithless one,
Filled all my life with dreams of happiness,
Of fame and name immortal,—she, my Muse,
My comforter, has left me here to die."

These are fine lines, and quite in the spirit of the poem itself. If Mr. Pollock proposes to introduce us to more of Musset, or to try a stronger flight of his own, he should be on his guard against one or two colloquialisms which belong to prose, and should not, to our thinking, find a place in verse.

"No single thing Around me but's alive with memories," is a specimen of what we mean. One of the charms of blank verse is the infinite elasticity with which it lends itself in skilful hands to every form of expression, dramatic, passionate, humorous, colloquial. But for that very reason, it wants, most of all, in dealing with the last, very cautious handling. We doubt, too, if Mr. Pollock can find a justification for using "lyre" as a dissyllable. "Fire" has Shakespearian precedent for being so used,— but the other is more dangerous. But however these things may be, Mr. Pollock has made a very desirable addition to our literature by translating this, one of Musset's most beautiful fancies, and we hope again that it is the prelude to more. Apart from the value of the original, so much amazingly bad blank verse dribbles out now-a-days, no verse and all blank, that there is some danger of our losing the trick of it; and Mr. Walter Pollock, dealing with it, knows what he is about.

"Oh, who can hold a fire in his hand?"

OTTILIE.*

THIS is a graceful little sketch of German life in the eighteenth century, so graceful, that it is almost disappointing in its scantiness. The main subject of the idyl is left something too faint for the author's purpose. There is plenty of skill in the delineation of the weakly sentimental Christoph, whose selfishness and feebleness are the background on which Ottilie's self-devotion are displayed; but that self-devotion itself is suggested rather than painted, and never brought vividly before us, even on those occasions on which it is most clearly indicated and implied. This is, we think, a fault, though the intention of the idyl is rather to bring the German manners of the times vividly before us, than to dwell on individual figures. What Vernon Lee aims at is to show what the culture of Germany in the last thirty years of the last century and the first ten years of this, was like, what elements it lacked in which the austere life of the first part of the eighteenth century had not been deficient, and how unbridgeable was the chasm between the ignorant practical life of the German townspeople and the feeble and passionate æstheticism in which the literary life of the century first showed itself. That Vernon Lee's little story succeeds in illustrating this, we do not deny; but it would have succeeded much better if Ottilie had been at least as clearly defined as her lover, Councillor Moritz, who, though only outlined, is outlined very clearly. In Councillor Moritz you have a figure not unlike that of Goethe's father, a man hard, definite, not at all deficient in warmth of feeling, but utterly contemptuous in relation to that want of self-restraint in which the sentimentalism of the revolutionary period was beginning to pride itself. Ottilie, brought up with as clear a sense of self-dependence and as strong a respect for the duty of reticence and self-restraint as Councillor Moritz himself, is, nevertheless, capable of all the self-devotion of a true woman of the highest calibre. But this, though it is suggested, is not adequately shown to us. Vernon Lee appears to shrink from giving us any picture of Ottilie's state of mind when her selfish brother insists on her choosing between himself and her lover,—which really means on her giving up her lover for himself. Nor does the author venture to delineate her adequately in the later scene, in which the brother who has so selfishly insisted on Ottilie's giving up her best hopes of happiness for him, coolly upbraids her with wasting his life because she wants him to be cautious about taking the final step of abandoning her for a wife of whom he knows little or nothing. Ottilie is characterised solely by what she does. The author has not the courage to attempt to show her as what she is, in any important scene with the brother for whom she has to sacrifice so much. This is a defect, even in relation to the chief object of the book,—the picture of eighteenth-century manners in Germany which it contains. The inner life of that century was not so reserved that a woman of force and character, who had been twice compelled by her brother to perceive that he expected her to sacrifice herself wholly to him as if she were nothing in the balance, would have failed to give him some glimpse of the scorn with which she must have regarded selfishness so profound.

For the rest, we have nothing but praise for this agreeable little sketch, which is drawn with full insight into the period described and very considerable grace of style. Here is a passage in which the author describes with even more skill than usual the jealousy with which the brother discovers that his sister is placing another in the position which he had always thought sacred to himself:—

"Little by little I began to be aware of a change; was it in myself or in my surroundings? I cannot tell, but I felt it nevertheless painfully. It was like the first gentle motion of a boat; the traveller can scarcely say whether it is he or the shore that is moving, and if he abandon himself to the impression he becomes filled with an indefinable discomfort. Gradually the feeling became stranger; it was as if I were being pushed by imperceptible degrees out of the circle occupied by Ottilie and the Councillor. They were getting nearer each other, and I proportionately further and further from both. Yet there was not the slightest coldness or diminution of affection on the part of my sister. I was still what I had always been for her, but—but another was becoming, not indeed what I had been, but something quite different and superior in her affection. I felt all this long before I could explain it to myself; but when I did explain it, the feeling became insupportable to my excessively sensitive and egotistic nature, rendered morbidly jealous by having been my sister's sole thought, her life, her tyrant. What was I now? Merely her brother. I was at once effeminate and passionate in temper, requiring constant caresses and flatteries, and capable of furious outbursts if denied them. A strange mixture of the child and of the man—I, who ought to have been simply a boy. Feeling as a child, I felt overcome by heart-breaking loneliness; I would have cried and sobbed and forced my sister to soothe me. Feeling as a man, I despised my morbid affection, and would have looked at everything with almost brutal indifference. I had moments of the bitterest weakness, and others of the most stubborn stolidity. At one moment I could scarcely refrain from throwing myself into my sister's arms and entreating her to send away Moritz. At another I was ready to tell the Councillor that he was free to take Ottilie, that I did not care what she did, that I wished only for liberty. At times jealousy would drive me out of the house, and I would throw myself sobbing on the grass of the ramparts. At others I sat buried in my books, answering rudely and insultingly whatever remark was made to me. And I was for a long time the only one who suspected the real state of matters. Neither Ottilie nor Moritz realised their feelings towards each other, and old Willibald was blinder than either of them. But the extraordinary change which had come over me was unmistakable; there was no possibility of being blind to my melancholy, my sulkeness, and my outbursts of violence. Ottilie, incapable of solving the riddle, asked the Councillor's advice on the subject. The cold, resolute, unsentimental man laughed at it all, and told her to send me to school if she would cure me. 'He has been spoilt,' I heard him say; and from that moment I hated him implacably."

Let us add that Wilhelmina is hardly as happily sketched as the other figures in this graceful idyl. Her playfulness as a bride is pretty enough, but her sulky inexorability when she finds her husband softening towards her after their first estrangement is of a kind quite different from that which the character, as hitherto sketched, had led us to expect. A common-place little beauty of a sentimental kind, without depth and without much character, would hardly have been likely to set her heart so stiffly against a husband with whom she had been heartily in love, solely because she had discovered that she was not all in all to him, as she had been at first. But as regards the other figures of the little story everything is definite and satisfactory, and everything in keeping with the epoch. What we regret most is that the central figure is left so much more to the imagination than the very inferior figure intended to be a pendant to it, and to bring out its significance and meaning.

ON SUMMER SEAS.*

THIS is in many ways a pleasant book of travel. Mrs. Scott-Stevenson is possessed of a good deal of varied information and knowledge, and occasionally shows some power of description. But the whole effect is disappointing. First of all, the title On Summer Seas is a delusive one, suggestive as it is of a delicious, dreamy sort of cruising; whereas, the land journeys were not wanting in importance; and when these poor people were on their summer seas, it was anything but enjoyable, in consequence of the discomforts of all sorts to which they were subjected, not the least of which was the frightful overcrowding of the vessels, either by an influx of Cook's tourists, or of refugees from Alexandria, or, still worse, of Levantine Jews. However, the Scott-Stevensons are really good travellers, inclined to enjoyment and to make the best of things. It is this tone of mind which is pleasant all through. The book, which is too much like a mere diary amplified and put into some shape afterwards with the help of a Murray, suffers from having too much in it; indeed, both the travels themselves and the account of them would certainly have been far more enjoyable if half the distance had been traversed, and the author had not tried to compress so much into a small space. One is irresistibly reminded of the complaint of the young tramp who was always told to "move on." Why these travellers should have felt obliged to see and do so much, it is not easy to understand, for they had apparently no object in view other than to enjoy a four months' holiday. Yet listen to this quotation:—"I longed to have plenty of books, and leisure to sit all day under the trees listening to the bands of music and watching the people; it would be a delicious holiday of perfect rest! For though our travels are supposed to be our holiday, still we have always to keep 'onwards,' and never seem able to pause and linger as we would like over the spot that suits our fancy. Like that of many others, I fear our real holiday will only come when we are too old to enjoy it."

It is a personal narrative, and yet in one way very impersonal, if it may be so expressed, for though the book begins with enumerating the different members of the party, it was scarcely worth while doing so, so little do they appear and so little individuality has the diary style allowed them. Indeed, if the reader happened to overlook the passage where all the party, with the exception of Captain and Mrs. Scott-Stevenson, leave Venice for England, he would scarcely discover that the travelling party has been diminished from eight to two. It is, perhaps, only fair to mention that the nurse and the baby were two out of the returning six.

The tour began from Cyprus (where Captain Scott-Stevenson was Commissioner of Kyrenia), whence they went to Smyrna, and from Smyrna over to Athens, which seems to have been nothing but a disappointment; the glare, the dust, which penetrated everything, the constant wind, the dearth and badness of the food, the appearance of the modern town, nothing better than a poor imitation of Paris, and last, but not least, the dislike and distrust they felt for the modern Greek, having apparently robbed Athens for them of almost all that unique delight which most travellers find in its wonderful ruins. The travellers passed on by Corinth to Corfu, which with its greenness and fertility was a rest and a delight after Athens, notwithstanding the pang felt that the island had been "so unnecessarily" given up by Mr. Gladstone. From Corfu they crossed, in a Florio steamer, to Venice. Here the descriptions are thoroughly unsatisfactory. Mrs. Scott-Stevenson finds it at first dingy, and though she allows that this was only a first impression, and that afterwards they "learned to appreciate to the fullest extent the picturesqueness and beauty of its palaces and public buildings, many of which are quite distinct in origin and character from any others to be found in Italy;" still, it may be surmised that Mrs. Scott-Stevenson prefers the Venice with its Piazza seen through the spectacles of Mr. Logsdail to the Venice of Ruskin:—

"Undoubtedly, the most cheerful part of Venice is the Piazza San Marco. In front rises the lofty campanile or belfry, and the three red-cedar masts, from which formerly floated the three gonfalons, in silk and gold, emblematic of Cyprus, Candia, and the Morea. Beyond them is the façade and noble domes of the Church of St. Mark. On one side stands the Procuratie Vecchie, and the famous clock tower, with its arched passage, leading into the Merceria; on the other, the Procuratie Nuova, terminated by the Libreria Vecchia. Arcades extend round the square on three sides, within which are the principal shops; but to see them to advantage one should be abroad after the lamps are lit, and the full moon is lighting up the centre of the piazza till all is bright as day. Then come out, too, the élite of Venice, who sit at the little tables outside the cafés eating ices and sugar-plums till midnight, or walk up and down listening to the military bands which play every evening. The shops are ablaze with light, showing off the Venetian glass, mirrors, beads, necklaces, ornamental vases, chandeliers, Oriental gold and silver stuffs, exquisite mosaics, and the beautiful Venetian gold-work, till one becomes bewildered with the variety and gorgeousness of the articles, and only a confused idea remains of what the shops actually contain."

No one can doubt but that the enthusiasm here is all bestowed on what is not Mr. Ruskin's Venice.

From Venice, the travellers, who consisted now only of Captain and Mrs. Scott-Stevenson, went by land to Vienna and Pesth. Mrs. Stevenson makes out rather a good case for the Germans, as against the Hungarians. She has no sympathy for the intense aversion which these latter feel for everything German. It is true enough that there is a great deal of vanity and selfishness among the little States, and if Hungary were to be separated now from Austria, it would become in Mrs. Stevenson's mind nearly as ridiculous as Bulgaria or Servia, or any other petty kingdom; "the perpetual grumbling or vaporous vanity of the Hungarians is too like what we see in the Levant, for us to feel much sympathy with it." The patriots always made Mrs. Stevenson think of Parnell and Co., because under their patriotism there was probably a keen love of notoriety, and much cunning in making use of others for their own ends. There is a great deal of this in Hungary, according to our travellers, and people are weak enough to think it fine.

The voyage down the Danube to Constantinople did not repay Mrs. Stevenson for the great discomfort on board the river steamers. After stating that she has no intention of acting as guide through the scenes and sights of Constantinople, she manages to make the account of that city and her visits to the environs and to Broussa, one of the pleasantest portions of the book. Perhaps it is on account of the great sympathy, and one might almost say admiration, she feels for the "poor Turk." The travellers who were bound for Palestine arrived at Alexandria the very day before the massacres of June, 1882, and the account of the perfect quiet and apparent peacefulness of the city is most curious. They visited Alexandria, moreover, on the morning of the day itself, and there was not the least sign of the insecurity which was said to be then rife in the country. On the Saturday night, before returning to the ship, they had a fancy to see the Arab quarter:—

"It was Saturday night, the little shops were brilliantly lit up with paraffine lamps and paper lanterns hung on poles; crowds of gaily-dressed Arabs belonging to every tribe in Africa, from Algeria to Egypt, or from Abyssinia to Ashantee, were sauntering about, or bargaining at the fruit-stalls for melons or apricots. Women crouched on the pavement, with flat cakes of bread piled in front of them; cooking-shops were overflowing, and sherbet-and-water sellers clinking their glasses at every turning. It was a busy and animated scene; an endless chatter of women's tongues, and bargaining, and begging, in deep, guttural tones, and now and then a half-tipty nasal song rising above the other noises. But the people, those who on the morrow were to behave with such tigerish ferocity, seemed as childishly happy and peaceful as if Arabi had never been born or rebellion heard of. Till long past midnight we roamed about unmolested and unheeded, save for here and there a passing glance of curiosity."

Next day they again went on shore. Natives were swarming everywhere, half asleep on the pavement or lazily smoking, perfectly indifferent in manner, and respectful as usual if addressed; in fact, nothing could be quieter or more orderly than the town. When they returned on board, they found the vessel crowded with numbers of the upper class of Arabs from Alexandria, who seemed to have fears of a rising. The account of the voyage to Joppa with these people on board is graphic and well told. They seem to be anything but a prepossessing class. It is in these sort of half-social descriptions that Mrs. Scott-Stevenson is at her best. The accounts of Palestine, on the other hand, are trivial and inadequate to the subject. Of course, Palestine is quite the most difficult subject for an ordinary writer to grapple with, for, in addition to the profound interest it is invested with from every point of view, not only religious but historical, there is another great stumbling-block, which is that it has been already so much written about by those who are not ordinary writers, that anything which now appears cannot fail to call forth comparisons which must be disparaging.

There is a moral to be drawn from this book which some may consider trite and hackneyed, but which will bear repeating to the end of time, and that is, that no one can do anything really well which he does not care for, or with which he is not in sympathy. An artist must feel his subject himself, before it can be felt by others. So, too, a writer. It is in this way that we can distinctly trace Mrs. Scott-Stevenson's success or failure. When she writes of places remarkable for historical and artistic associations, it is merely perfunctory description which produces a feeling of boredom in the reader; whereas, when she writes of people she uses her own observation, which is sharpened where her sympathies are roused, and then the result is spirited, characteristic detail. On the other hand, it is nothing better than Murray-and-water where art and history are concerned. In conclusion, we must add that the book would be certainly useful as a guide-book to any one who wished to travel the same road. There is plenty of trustworthy information as to means of locomotion, prices, inns, good, bad, and indifferent, and plenty of useful hints on many minor matters. Mrs. Stevenson seems to have gained great proficiency in all bargainings, and some of the accounts she gives both of failure and success therein are very entertaining. Travellers could not do better than profit by her experience, if they wished to bring home specimens of foreign manufactures, for she displayed great skill in discovering the best places at which to get old lace, gold and silver embroideries, to say nothing of bronze and earthenware pots of all sorts,—real treasures in the eyes of most travellers.

ACROSS CHRYSE.*

MR. COLQUHOUN publishes in these volumes his experiences during a journey in the early part of last year across China from Canton to the Burmese frontier, and the first lines of his preface are an apology for the style and character of his narrative, on the plea that it was written on the ground, and that it is no more than a collection of daily notes. We fear that the apology will be considered necessary by his readers, and that some charity will be needed to admit that "the want of literary finish is compensated for by the freshness and realism of the descriptions." Mr. Colquhoun tells a story of some friend of his at a club who thought Marco Polo was "the man who crossed Africa two years ago," and he seems to draw from the unfathomed stupidity of club conversation the inference that the state of knowledge concerning South-west China is exceedingly limited and often contradictory. Full of this idea he proceeds to place before the world as matters beyond cavil or dispute his opinions on the subjects that come under his notice, or that suggest themselves to his imagination. The question of land communication between India and China has, no doubt, its important as well as its interesting features; but it shows a total inability to appreciate the relative importance of things to declare, as Mr. Colquhoun does, that "if we are to hold our place in the international commercial contest," we must solve the problem speedily. We have dwelt upon the contents of the preface, for the reason that Mr. Colquhoun shows in it a more correct sense of the shortcomings of his volumes than he does in the course of the work itself. But it does not seem to have occurred to him at any time that the best way to obtain the fullest recognition for his own efforts was to rewrite his narrative from his notes, instead of publishing them in their crude state, and then making the best arrangements he could in the way of corrections with the printer. If he had done this, or obtained the services of some literary friend of experience to do it for him, his Across Chryse would have obtained the favourable reception its author counted on, and which nothing but the sympathy naturally felt towards an adventurous traveller in a strange land has prevented being turned into a distinct literary failure.

The first part of Mr. Colquhoun's journey lay through the region which was the home of the Taepings and the scene of their first outbreak. The traveller's comment on the beginning of what was the most formidable internal revolt from which China has suffered in our time, and which nearly resulted in the disintegration of the Celestial Empire, reads as follows:—

"The mark made by the Taeping rebellion in this region, close to its birthplace, where it effected such a firm hold, is to be found in the lawless spirit of the people, as well as in the material injury to be witnessed in its ruined cities, villages, and temples. The revolt first took rise [sic] in the north-east of Kwangsi; but the whole of the Province was the heart and soul of the insurrection. The people here say (one of our boatmen had relations killed by the rebels, and narrowly escaped himself) that close by Nanning was the locality where Taeping Wang first gained a following, though this I think must be incorrect. His pony is said to have been able to lie down and kneel when ordered, and other wonderful stories are told of it; in fact, he has almost developed into a deity."

This passage is no unfair sample of Mr. Colquhoun's method of writing, and his descriptions are seldom of a more interesting or exciting character than "the wonderful story" of the Taeping chief's pony, which could lie down, and which made either itself or its master—which, is not clear from the wording—appear as a deity in the minds of a superstitious people. What struck Mr. Colquhoun greatly during this part of his journey were the poverty of the country and the scantiness of the people. The region watered by the Sikiang seems to possess, neither in its present state nor in its immediate prospects, the necessary wealth and resources to make it an advantageous avenue for trade. Mr. Colquhoun's experience unconsciously confirms what both M. Dupuis and M. Rocher have said, on the authority of Chinese informants, as to the trade of Yunnan having been temporarily diverted by successive civil wars from the Songcoi route to that by the Sikiang. If this be a correct supposition as to cause and effect, the commercial outlook for the French in Tonquin must not be deemed altogether unpromising; and Chinese opposition to their plans may arise in a great measure from the knowledge of what advantages might accrue to a foreign Power from the possession of a short and convenient approach to Yunnan, with its turbulent population and its numerous savage and semi-conquered tribes.

The most interesting passages in Mr. Colquhoun's volumes are unquestionably those relating to national habits and to the peculiar customs of some of the inferior races, who differ from the Chinese in appearance and manners, while they are very backward in respect of civilisation. It may not, be generally known that the Chinese, having a due respect for their persons, pay great attention to, and spend a great deal of their money on, their clothes. "The dresses of the officials, even the petty ones, are handsome and costly-looking; the wardrobe of many an official is worth 2,000 dollars (about £400), an enormous sum. I have been told that a witty Chinaman has said, in regard to this subject, 'Englishmen live in their houses; Chinamen in their clothes.'" Mr. Colquhoun confirms the general opinion as to the popular antipathy towards Missionaries, and he furnishes further testimony to the practical prudence of the Chinese, by the true explanation of their always drinking hot water or tea, instead of cold, on account of the impurity of the water. In more than one large town, the friendly demeanour of the people formed a pleasing contrast to the excitement and hostile demeanour shown elsewhere. His experience at Lungan, a town on the Sikiang, was very gratifying in this respect:—

"In our wanderings through the town, down the main street, and on the ramparts at the back of the town, where we strolled in order to obtain a view of the plain and surrounding country, we met with no scowling looks nor angry cries of 'Fan-qui lo.' What seemed still more strange, was that we were not subjected to that trying curiosity which knows no restraints. We were courteously treated by all whom we met, and engaging in conversation with a few young men who were loiterers at the southern gate, we were offered not only such information as they had at their command, but also their guidance to a large cave lying in a hill to the south, close to a temple."

Nothing did more to force a favourable opinion of the Chinese character on Mr. Colquhoun and his companion, Mr. Wahab, than the excellent behaviour of the crew of the river boat in which they travelled for several weeks. They were always civil in their demeanour, if there was no fawning subservience about them, stuck to their work with extraordinary vigour and tenacity, and never gave any trouble on the score of ill-health or exhaustion. They proved themselves to be machines of an enduring and not unamiable kind. Mr. Colquhoun's farewell to the Sikiang may be quoted on this point of his subject:—"It was not without some feeling of emotion that we bade farewell to the West River, with its most beautiful and noble scenery and its ruined cities. We also parted with regret from the boatmen of the hotau, with whom we had learned to sympathise, for their simple, childish ways, and to like for their pleasant good-will."

Mr. Colquhoun gives some interesting sketches of the aboriginal races with whom he came into contact, and some of the Lolos attracted his admiration by their remarkably fine appearance, and by their resemblance to Europeans. He shows in support of this an illustration—taken, it should be stated, from Garnier's great work—of a scene in a Yunnan valley, where the figures in the foreground bear a strong resemblance to the Incas of Peru. But although some of their characteristics give them a claim on our sympathy, they do not, on the whole, convey the impression that they will ever be very useful as agents of commerce. Mr. Colquhoun, while leaving himself open to the charge of optimism in respect of his own project, deserves the credit of stating many facts which tell very forcibly against his own opinions. The point on which all his contentions turn is the assumed superiority in natural resources of western over eastern Yunnan. It is the part nearest India which is, according to Mr. Colquhoun, the region that holds out such a promising opening for our trade, and that contains the indigenous wealth that will well repay the merchants of Rangoon and the producers of Lancashire. But it will be asked with some degree of curiosity, and it is Mr. Colquhoun's special function as a traveller to reply to it, what is the present condition of this "land of promise"? The answer furnished by this most sanguine of explorers is, to our mind, extremely discouraging, and quite destructive of the theory which he attempts to build upon it. One of the most promising spots, the very centre of this new El Dorado, is the district of Puerh and

* Across Chryse. Being the Narrative of a Journey of Exploration through the South-China Border Lands, from Canton to Manda'ar. By Archibald R. Colquhoun, Executive Engineer, Indian Public Works. Ssumao. Well, what has Mr. Colquhoun to say about it? Let him speak in his own words:—

"Puerh is a large walled town, with one main street, and shops and houses running along either side, and a few straggling by-streets, with houses scattered behind. Large waste areas are seen on every side, and at first it is hard to believe, notwithstanding the ruins here and there still apparent, that at one time, before the devastation of the civil war took place, they were covered, as report says they were, by a large and prosperous population. We saw no signs of a large trade or great commercial activity; but the trade is gradually recovering here, as elsewhere throughout Yunnan. The shops are mean. . . . Few symptoms of European merchandise were visible. . . . All these towns, of the importance of which one has heard so much, bear an unmistakable air of decay, and do not at first favour the idea that any large trade is to be effected with them."

This is candid enough, but Mr. Colquhoun cannot have a very high opinion of the effect of his own words, if he supposes that such facts as these will induce English capitalists to provide the means of laying down a line of railway having as its goal the region he describes in these gloomy colours. Nor is this an isolated passage. There are many other statements to the same effect, and we may particularly refer to that concerning the deserted valley of Chingtung, abandoned by its inhabitants in consequence of the ravages of the plague. We can just afford the space to give, as a final quotation, his description of this valley:—

"Our first impression of the beauty and richness of the Chingtung plain, which had been such a surprise to us—for we had never heard it mentioned by any of the people whom we had met—was more than borne out by what we saw later. It is the finest plain which we had seen, and, both in regard to fertility and beauty surpassed all those in the south of Yunnan, and probably, from what one could learn, any in the whole province. We marched for more than two days up the winding causeway, which skirts the plain at the base of the hill-spurs, and the ever-varying beauty constantly forced exclamations of surprise from us. The deserted villages continued and became more frequent, while razed sites were common, and in parts of the valley might be said to make for miles a continuous line. In one village of forty houses, we found only one inhabited; in another, of a hundred and twenty, there were only twenty-two left. Such was the story we heard everywhere. Fine, solidly-built temples, yamens, pai-fangs, and village dwellings, all with tiled roofs, brick walls, and sandstone-block foundations, were deserted and left to fall into ruin. When we did not see these, we saw the razed remains of whole villages,—sometimes hamlets of some half-dozen farm-steading, sometimes a village of large area, where the ruin begun by war, and followed by pestilence, had been completed by time. This scene of ruin in such a beautiful valley, bespeaking peaceful prosperity if ever scene did, culminated at Chingtung."

Such is the present condition of that western portion of Yunnan which, according to Mr. Colquhoun, is the richer and more productive half of the province. It is here that the merchants of this country are to find a great opportunity. Mr. Colquhoun, of course, believes in the possibility of restoring prosperity to this region, and of supplying the people with the means and the courage of facing the pestilence that has devastated their homes, and of checking its ravages. But it is obvious that this will have to be done, and with the most emphatic success, if there is ever to be that flourishing trade intercourse that it is very desirable should exist between India and China, if it can be brought about in a natural way. The present condition of this region is undoubtedly discouraging, and shows that the progress towards recovery has been slower here than in the other parts of China where the Imperial authority had been set on one side by rebels. But it is not a question of the Governments of British India and China alone in this particular quarter. The problem is rendered far more intricate by the presence of the kingdom of Burmah, and of those Shan tribes whom it is Mr. Colquhoun's pleasure to call independent. It looks very well on the map accompanying these volumes to show a most important region beyond our Burmese frontier as being independent, but the independence of the Shan tribes is an elastic phrase, and not likely to receive more than scant respect at the hands of the Chinese or the officers of King Theebaw. Of course, these Shans might be subsidised, and those under the authority of Siam would, no doubt, present no obstacles to the laying-down of a railway, which they would be employed in constructing. But the question would be of how this railway could be preserved from the attacks of these "independent" tribes, whose independence is synonymous with their being marauders and outside the pale of a regular government, except by the advance of the British frontier or by the strengthening of the authority of Siam. To neither of these measures is any Chinese Government likely to be well disposed. English influence will strengthen and give consistency to those hostile elements among the races and creeds of Yunnan which have given Peking trouble in the past; and the governing classes are not likely to regard with a favourable eye the introduction within their jurisdiction of that pronounced sympathy towards Mahomedans, and of that beneficent disposition towards the Lolos and other non-Chinese races, which Mr. Colquhoun and other English officials before him have betrayed. Mr. Colquhoun's suggestions as to the line for a railway may, from an engineering point of view, represent the best route, and the one that may in course of time be finally adopted. But the political objections to it at the present time are very strong, and we cannot believe that in face of them the Indian Government will venture on any decided step towards carrying-out Mr. Colquhoun's project. In this matter, private enterprise can do little without State initiation, and before the Government of India can move it will have to secure the co-operation of China, as well as to ascertain much more clearly than we have any means of knowing at present what are the true Chinese views in their frontier policy with regard to India.

THE MAGAZINES.

THE larger Magazines are not at their best this month, no one of them containing any article of first-rate importance, and many of them publishing papers which do not fulfil the first law of magazine articles,—that they be readable. The Contemporary begins with the first part of a monograph on Luther, by Mr. Froude, almost brutally uncompromising in its statements, and so far without any novel interest. Mr. Froude gives with extreme brevity the life of Luther up to his publication of the translation of the New Testament into German, the turning-point of the Reformation. Mr. Froude makes few reflections, his object being as yet to describe rather the life than the inner self of his subject, who in his pages is only a brave and opinionated monk, convinced that the Scripture is above the Papacy. We have also the beginning of a study of the four chief Apostles, Peter, Paul, James, and John, by Professor Godet, of which we have nothing to say till its object becomes a little more clear; and an argument from Cardinal Manning as to the necessity of the idea of God as the basis of any Commonwealth, which will not, we fear, convince sceptics. The Cardinal holds that the Commonwealth springs from the family, and assumes that the family comes from God, and that an Agnostic Parliament might abolish laws which he holds essential to civilisation. His description of these laws shows a lack of the sense of proportion, as he places laws preventing divorce, laws prohibiting incestuous marriages, and laws protecting Sunday, Good Friday, and Christmas Day all on the same level. To the majority even of pious Protestants there is an element of bathos in eloquence of this kind:—"Why should not a Parliament which has ceased to call God to witness to its fidelity, not only to an earthly Crown but to a Divine Lawgiver, abolish its chaplain, and cease to take its seat at prayers? Why not hold morning sittings on Sunday, and general elections on Sunday, and throw open not museums only, but theatres on Sunday? Why not legalise all labour and traffic, thereby adding a seventh of time and gain, as political economists have argued, to the national wealth? Why should it not abolish all laws against blasphemy?" The fact that the Greek and Roman laws punished blasphemy with death is no more proof of the righteousness of such laws, than the fact that Rome ordered divine honours to be paid to Cæsar is proof of Cæsar's claim to worship. The Cardinal, if he wishes to convince, must either produce a Christian precept ordering us to punish blasphemy, or a proof of the necessity and utility of the law. Modern legislation is not evil simply because it is without precedent. Where is the precedent to justify a legal equality of creeds? The sketch of Count Rumford, the American savant who reformed pauperism in Bavaria and founded the Royal Society in England, by Professor Tyndall, is bright; but contains little that is novel, unless it be the suggestion, which is, we think, true, that Rumford was impelled in some of his schemes as much by the love of exercising his unusual power of administration as by philanthropy. He certainly believed strongly in despotism, though not in cruel cures for the misery of human life, and had discovered the well-known truth that human beings, however low or wretched, if forced to labour in association, will always earn their keep and a profit. Count Rumford's extraordinary misery from his marriage with Madame Lavoisier, an able, amiable, and wealthy woman, is not explained by Professor Tyndall, who only quotes the Count's declarations that she was an "unfeeling, cunning, and tyrannical woman." Even his daughter did not believe this, and thought the match would have been excellent, if only they could have agreed. Madame Lavoisier was probably a woman with a passion for independence in details, which the Count, a born despot, could not endure. Mrs. Oliphant protests once more against the irreverence of biographers for the dead, and Miss Ellice Hopkins, in "Social Wreckage," pleads for national remedies for overcrowding, pauperism—through more individual dealing with the poor on the Elberfeld plan—and the neglect of pauper children, who ought to be compelled to emigrate on the Liverpool scheme. Ordinary readers will, we fear, pass on with relief from both articles to M. Gabriel Monod's admirable sketch of recent events and literature in France, as full as ever of white-light. The proprietors of the Contemporary have also introduced a monthly review of new literature, by qualified persons, which may attract, though we are not sure it will. The plan has not been a success in the Westminster Review, where it has often been carried out with singular ability and exhaustiveness.

The Fortnightly opens with a strong article upon the future of Radicalism, which is defined as "the general opinion of the more advanced section of the Liberal party for the time being," to the exclusion of fantastic or impracticable crotchetteers. The writer insists upon the word "general," maintaining that the whole people is not only more entitled to govern itself than any class, but is better able to do it,—a proposition which logically involves not only "universal suffrage," but universal suffrage of both sexes. The essayist looks to Mr. Chamberlain as the Radical leader, and maintains that he will prevail; that Parliament will become more representative, and be filled with men more like Mr. Illingworth, Mr. Jesse Collings, Mr. Burt, and Mr. Broadhurst; and that the Radicals will become the dominant, if not the sole, factor in the Liberal Party. He suggests no programme for them, but only observes that they will rather ignore or equalise differences of religion than attack religion, and that they will fight, whenever the majorities in the constituencies perceive the obligation. The article is worth reading as a description, by an unexcited mind, of many visible phenomena; but we do not think it will make any deep impression, any more than another, by the Marquis of Blandford, on "The Limits of English Revolution." His theory, roughly stated, is only that England is too rich to endure attacks on property, which would be more conclusive if the people, as in France, were the property-holders. The two articles on Egypt, one on "Non-Political Control," and one on "The International Position of the Suez Canal," are both too technical, though in the latter we note that the writer, Mr. T. E. Holland, Professor of International Law at Oxford, maintains that the Canal is legally an arm of the sea, though, like the Dardanelles and the Solent, it runs between coasts both of which are owned by the same Power, the artificial character of the channel having no international bearing. Bishop Wordsworth's autobiography is full of reminiscences, sometimes of men who are now almost totally forgotten. Take this sketch, for example, of Mr. James Hope, afterwards Hope-Scott, of Abbotsford, of whom the Bishop says, had he been ambitious, and had he not,—

"Early in life, under Newman's influence, joined the Church of Rome, I should have been prepared to predict, with scarcely less confidence, the same of him—viz., that he would one day prove a brilliant Prime Minister like Gladstone, and, in some respects, a more popular one. But, unlike Gladstone, Hope was singularly unambitious—a testimony which I remember to have seen strikingly confirmed by Newman, in the sermon which he preached upon his character after his funeral. His great abilities, both as a pleader and otherwise, were well known at the Parliamentary Bar, where, without being luxurious or extravagant in any way, or unduly fond of money, it satisfied him—and he was not displeased—to realise an income supposed to be not less than £20,000 a year, much of which, I have reason to believe, was charitably and munificently spent. The then Bishop of Exeter (Philpotts) had such an opinion of Hope, though he must have been some thirty or forty years his junior, that when he (the Bishop) was in London, he used frequently to come and take a quiet luncheon with him on Sundays, in order to pick his brains upon points of ecclesiastical law. And his speech, afterwards published, in defence of cathedrals, upon a Bill then before the Committee of the House of Lords, made such an impression, that, when he sat down, Lord Brougham was overheard to mutter, 'That young man's fortune is made!'"

Dr. Wordsworth affirms that Mr. Gladstone's father, while most cordial with his son, and fully acknowledging his abilities, thought him wanting in stability, an opinion in which Dr. Wordsworth subsequently heartily concurred. He adds the extraordinary opinion that Mr. Gladstone's departure from Tory principles was due to the fascination of Sir R. Peel's administrative ability and succes-ful management of the House of Commons. Does the Bishop mean that Sir R. Peel became a Liberal? None of the remaining articles interest us at all, and Mr. Traill's imaginary conversation between Plato and Landor is decidedly below his usual level. Plato has nothing to say, and Landor only denounces modern Hellenics as being artificially sad, and totally without the "simplicity, repose, and reserve" which were the notes of Hellenic art. Landor despises all that he sees around him, and hopes only in the English Democracy, and that only because it is a bundle of contradictory qualities and essentially Conservative. How, then, asks Plato, does your State subsist?—

"LAN. By the grace of the gods. The English democracy is the most remarkable in the world. It is at once the strongest and the weakest, the fiercest and the tamest, the least instructed in the learning of books, and the most highly trained in the discipline of life. None was ever so studious of liberty yet so submissive to control; none so angrily intolerant of remediable hardships and yet so sanely and so nobly patient under those which nature has imposed.

PLA. To what is this happy balance of their tendencies to be referred?

LAN. I know not. I know only that it exists, and that the unbroken tranquillity of our country attests it."

There is surely not much light, there. It is only the old cry, that "All is bad, but we get on," which will add no strength or perception to any human brain.

Nor have we found much to interest us in the National Review, which is this month distinctly snippety. We see no wit in the rather vulgar travesty of Liberal ideas called "A Stroll with Corkhouse," by "Lord Sangfroid," and not much reason in Mr. H. H. Gibbs's argument that bimetalism would correct the appreciation of gold which Mr. Goschen describes. Of course it would, if law could make gold and silver of steady, proportionate value; but then, law cannot. Mr. Gibbs might as well try to make coal and corn exchangeable at a fixed rate. He says Mr. Jevons proposed to issue one-pound notes to correct the appreciation, and asks why silver would not do as well; but the notes would be limited in quantity, and exchangeable for gold, therefore, at par. Silver would not. We have always admitted that if silver were made a Government monopoly by international treaty, its value could be fixed, because its production could be limited; but short of that extreme measure, nothing in the power of legislatures could make the price of the two metals keep step, and if they did not keep step, one would oust the other. How much has the remonetization of "the dollar of our fathers" done for American currency? There are two grave political articles, in one of which Mr. Kebbel argues that the middle-class, though Liberal, has Conservative interests, and in the other Mr. Percy Greg predicts Conservatism for the working-man. With the former we do not care to argue, as the middle-classes no longer rule, but to the latter we have a word to say. Mr. Percy Greg thinks the Tories protect property, enforce order, defend liberty, and fight for the honour of England, and that the working-classes are in favour of those things being done. Therefore the working-men will ultimately vote for Tories. That is a perfect syllogism, provided the Liberals will not protect property, enforce order, defend liberty, and fight for the honour of England; but where is the proof of that? Mr. Greg says the workmen want these things, and if they want them, why should not Liberals give them? We should have said, and we think Mr. Greg would say, that the grand weakness of English Liberals was an over-readiness to respond to demands from below, and that in stating the desires of the majority, the Liberal course would be stated also. If that is so, what becomes of Mr. Greg's prophecy?

The Nineteenth Century opens with an attack on British domination in India, by Mr. J. Seymour Keay, called "The Spoliation of India," which assuredly does not err from a desire to utter smooth things. The writer declares that, exclusive of the rank and file of the Army, there are 25,402 Europeans holding Government posts in India, and drawing £12,776,573 a year from the country, besides £4,006,000 drawn by non-residents. Mr. Seymour Keay alleges that India is getting poorer, that our taxation is merciless and cruel, that the people are underfed, and that in no long time hunger will produce a catastrophe such as the world has rarely seen. He describes the salt-tax, the only tax paid by the Indian poor, as a fearful oppression, and the Abkaree duties as demoralising agencies. It is quite right that the other side of our domination in India should be seen, but exaggerations of this kind do no good. Mr. Keay should study the account of the silver import of India, that is, of the increase of wealth caused solely by the order which we maintain. Lord Cowper continues his paper on the Whigs, but we do not see that it comes to much, except that the Whigs are nearer to the Radicals than to the Tories, that the extreme men talk, while the moderate men are silent, and that the Whigs will not be attracted by the present Tory leaders,—three undeniable propositions. Politicians are more interested to know whether the leading Whigs apprehend a point of progress at which they must quit the Radicals, and whether they really believe that they have any army behind them. Earl Cowper asserts strongly that the Radicals cannot do without the Whigs, but he does not prove his case, which, in our judgment, is only true if he assumes an unreformed House of Lords always to be a co-ordinate portion of the Legislature. That is a very great assumption. Major-General the Hon. W. Feilding advocates Australia as the best place for emigration, particularly for young men with capital, but adds little to current information on the subject; and Mr. Coutts Trotter defends the annexation of New Guinea, though in a temperate manner, and with evident doubts whether the acquisition would be immediately profitable. He, however, minimises the expense, by a declaration, which we think unreasonable, that England need only extend its government in the island gradually as necessity arose. Does Mr. Trotter think the pioneers will rest content without government, or that the island once British, they will abstain from settling? Mr. A. M. Sullivan argues that the removal of Irishmen from Ireland is no cure for Irish disaffection, the reduction in the population having been accompanied with an increase of bitterness and a distinct decline in the wealth of the country, which, he maintains, is in no way increased by the substitution of grazing for tillage. He writes temperately and eloquently, but with the underlying feeling of Irishmen that justice is not to be expected from the English, and that the American-Irish will ultimately enfranchise their countrymen by subscriptions. He does not explain why, if that is so, the Irish at home do not subscribe, so as to dispense with aid from abroad; but his paper is worth reading, if only for the sense of despair it excites. If a man like Mr. A. M. Sullivan writes under the emotion of hatred visible in every line of this paper, what hope is there? Separation clearly is no remedy, for the Irish-Americans are separated, have no grievances, and are rather possessed by hate than merely feel it. By far the best paper in the Nineteenth Century is Dr. Jessopp's history of "The Coming of the Friars," an essay brimful of compressed knowledge, and as interesting as any chapter in Macaulay or Green. He agrees in the main with Macaulay that the mendicant friars reconquered for Rome the dominion which the parochial clergy and the monks had lost. They were the "evangelisers of the English towns for 300 years," growing, of course, like all conquerors, in the end corrupt.

The cheaper Magazines carry off the palm this month. We noticed the new sixpenny Cornhill last week, and Longman's has at least three admirable papers. Nothing can be better than Mr. Hardy's account of "The Dorsetshire Labourers," who, he maintains, are as diverse as the members of any other class; Bret Harte's new story, "In the Carquinez Woods," is, at least, original; and, in its way, we have rarely read anything so good as Mr. Stevenson's "Across the Plains," an account of a trip with emigrants through the States. If Defoe's humour had been drier still, he would have written very like Mr. Stevenson, who realises to his readers an emigrant's miseries as if they had emigrated themselves. We can, however, quote only this most characteristic paragraph:—

"I must tell here an experience of mine with another newsboy. I tell it because it gives so good an example of that uncivil kindness of the American, which is, perhaps, their most bewildering character to one newly landed. It was immediately after I had left the emigrant train; and I am told I looked like a man at death's door, so much had this long journey shaken me. I sat at the end of a car; and the catch being broken, and myself feverish and sick, I had to hold the door open with my foot for the sake of air. In this attitude my leg debarred the newsboy from his box of merchandise. I made haste to let him pass when I observed that he was coming; but I was busy with a book, and so once or twice he came upon me unawares. On these occasions he most rudely struck my foot aside; and though I myself apologised, as if to show him the way, he answered me never a word. I chafed furiously, and I fear the next time it would have come to words. But suddenly I felt a touch upon my shoulder, and a large juicy pear was put into my hand. It was the newsboy, who had observed that I was looking ill, and so made me this present out of a tender heart. For the rest of the journey I was petted like a sick child; he lent me newspapers, thus depriving himself of his legitimate profit on their sale, and came repeatedly to sit by me and cheer me up."

"Fortune's Fool," Mr. J. Hawthorne's novel, is at last resumed in Macmillan; but we confess we have so much difficulty in remembering the former chapters, the first one excepted, that we can hardly piece the bits together. "The Wizard's Son" grows more interesting than ever, as the supernatural element influences the story more directly; and Mr. Fawcett sends a coldly thoughtful criticism of modern schemes of State Socialism. He is, we think, too pessimist in his view of all schemes for rehousing the people, though it is true that any plan of construction supported by the State might kill the Building Societies, now so wonderfully successful. Could not the need which Mr. Fawcett fully admits be met through the agency of those very societies, assisted by loans, and by a grant of heavy interest for their deposits,—perhaps the only "aid" which really helps without demoralising? The criticism of M. Renan's "Autobiography" is full of a faintly smiling humour, which M. Renan would appreciate, and which, panoplied as he is in gentle self-esteem, would, if he read it, reach the skin.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The most interesting article in the Month is the editor's continuation of his account of "A Personal Visit to Distressed Ireland." Several matters well worthy of note are to be found in it. There is a doubt, for instance, expressed whether it is the distressed holders of small farms or the artisans that are getting the benefit of assisted emigration. The emigrants whom the writer came across were artisans. There are some terrible stories told of evictions. Matters seem to be in a state of great tension in some parts, a tension increased by the operation of the Land Act. The landlords, enraged at the forced reduction of their rents, exact the diminished payment with relentless severity. Canon Shortland gives an account of the persecutions of the Christians in Tonquin and Annam, and criticises the action of France. In archaeology, we have an article on "Recent Excavations in the Roman Forum;" and in science an essay on "The Botany of Albertus Magnus." Garibaldi and Henry VIII. are not persons who are likely to get justice at the hands of Roman Catholic writers, and do not, we think, receive it here. The article on "Mr. Gladstone and Garibaldi" is, in particular, nothing less than discreditable to the writer. It is strange that a man of education should condescend to use such language as we find in it.—Gentleman's Magazine.—Mr. Buchanan continues his story of "The New Abelard," and introduces a couple of characters, "Professor Mapleleap, Solar Biologist," and his sister, Eustasia, a famous medium, who promise to be interesting. Mr. Allen C. Ewald tells the story of Sir Walter Raleigh, keeping the balance commendably fair. Raleigh had great faults, and Mr. Ewald does not extenuate them; as for the conduct of the King, it seems difficult even to suggest an excuse for it. Miss Gordon Cumming gives us the first part of "Notes of Two Wintry Cruises in the English Channel," telling us not a few things that are scarcely creditable to our English arrangements. There are some really amusing pages about "Hedgehogs," by Mr. E. Kay Robinson. The hedgehog, poor creature! is an animal that has fallen upon evil times; let us hope that this humane account of him may do something to rehabilitate his character.—The Melbourne Review (April) contains an account of the failure of Victoria to raise a loan in England in 1882, and deals with a matter which seems to have excited much indignation in the colony very fairly. Mr. Start, in his article, "Governor Gordon and the Maoris," criticises severely the conduct of the New Zealand Government in reference to the natives. We should like on some future occasion to hear what he has to say about Queensland, in reference (1) to the aborigines, and (2) the imported labour. One thing strikes us with envy, the delightful leisure which an Australian critic must enjoy. There is a list of "works published in Australia during the quarter ending March 31st, 1883," and it numbers seven.

Teutonic Mythology. By Jacob Grimm. Translated from the fourth edition, with notes and appendix, by James Steven Stallybrass. 2 vols. (George Bell and Sons.)—These volumes are as full as might be expected of curious information. Literature, legend, and the oral lore which preserve so many ancient beliefs, are put under contribution, and the result is an extraordinary collection of facts, or, perhaps, we should rather say, fancies. And to think that the whole of this mass—which is only one out of several similar masses to be found in other branches of the human race—has been evolved out of the consciousness of man! One may dip into the book almost at random and find something strange and interesting. Here is something under the head "Phases of the Moon:—" "Into a new house you must move at new moon, not at the wane; count money by the new moon, she will increase your store; on the other hand, she loves not to look into an empty purse. All through the notion is that money, married bliss, and home stores will thrive and grow with the growing light. So the hair and nails are cut at new moon, to give them a good chance of growing; cattle are weaned in the waxing light, in the waning they would get lean; girls are to be weaned at the wane, boys at the full, probably to give the one a slim, elegant figure, and the other a stout and strong." "The Man in the Moon" furnishes the subject of another set of curious notions. A man carrying a burden is the idea common to most of them. Biblical knowledge has developed it now into Isaac carrying the wood for the sacrifice, now into Cain. Mr. Stallybrass seems to have performed his task of translator very well.

On the Wing: Rambling Notes of a Trip to the Pacific. By Mary E. Blake. (Lee and Shephard, Boston, U.S.)—This pleasant little volume, which, published this year, has already reached a second edition, well deserves a few words of notice. The author wrote some letters describing experiences of travel to a Boston newspaper, and was very wisely advised to collect and add to them. She began with Chicago, went through Colorado, saw the Grand Cañons, spent the greater part of her time in California, had a glimpse, which seems to have been quite as much as she desired, of Salt Lake City, and so went home, paying a short visit to Niagara on her way. The book concludes with a chapter of sensible advice on "Excursions."

A Woman's Glory. By Sarah Doudney. 3 vols. (Bentley and Son.)—"To love perfectly and entirely,—that is a woman's glory." This is Miss Doudney's summing-up of the whole matter, and she works up to this conclusion with a good deal of skill. She provides herself with plenty of characters to deal with. There are two who divide between themselves the part of heroine; there is an evil-minded woman of the Circe kind, who makes a weak-kneed Ulysses stray from the right path; there is a doubtful person, half good, half bad, who betrays her dearest friend, because she feels sure that her love for the friend's betrothed is the deeper and the more genuine of the two affections; and there are two minor persons, each sketched with a certain individuality. All have, of course, love-affairs of their own, and some have more than one. We must confess to a slight feeling of weariness at reading so much of a matter which, after all, is not the whole, or even the greater part, of life. But Miss Doudney's skill in managing her story, and the evident truth of her drawing, slight as is the plot, does away, for the most part, with this impression. And she introduces episodes or varieties which give a certain relief. Eunice Swift, the authoress, makes an attractive picture. Her unhappiness at home, with a family circle all worshipping the daughter who has made a rich marriage, and tormenting the girl whose genius it cannot perceive, and the bright blossoming of her life when she finds her proper sphere of action elsewhere, are admirably described. Mr. Swift, the father, and Mrs. Goad, the rich daughter, are touched with a really effective humour. Then there is an amusing child, who entertains us very well for a few pages. Add to this that Miss Doudney always writes well, and that her book is thoroughly wholesome in tone, and we may safely say that A Woman's Glory rises considerably above the average of the novel.

We are glad to see that a volume of verse, giving many proofs of culture and elegant taste—Poems, by Charles H. Hoole (Parker and Co.)—has reached a second edition. The chief poems are classical, having for their subjects "Hermione," "The Return of Ulysses, and "Alceste." "St. John" and "A Voyage to Britain" have sacred themes. "During the Siege" seeks to represent Christian feeling in the days of Alaric. A variety of miscellaneous poems follow, and there are some translations, generally to be commended for their neatness and spirit. We shall give one, in which Mr. Hoole ventures to challenge comparison with a famous rival:—

"What slender youth on beds of roses
Drenched with many a perfume sweet
Cours'd Pyrrha in a pleasant cave?
While she her yellow hair dispices
With all the neatness that is meet.
How oft the Gods who will not save,
And change of faith, will be lament,
And won't'er at the blackening wave,
Who now enjoys your free consent,
And loves you, thinks you best of all,
Hopes you will true and kind remain,
Unconscious of the faithless breeze;
Unhappy in whose way you fall
Untried; behold, in Neptune's fane,
My garments, dripping from the seas,
Suspended on the sacred wall."

The History of Antiquity. Translated from the German of Professor Max Duncker by Evelyn Abbott, M.A. Vol. VI. (Bentley and Son.)—Professor Duncker continues in this volume the history of the "Empire of the Medes and Persians." His first chapter relates the fall of the Lydian Empire, his authority being, in the main, Herodotus, whom he sees good reason for putting above all other writers. The third chapter, "The Fall of Babylon," brings us into contact with Jewish history. In the fourth, an attempt is made to discuss the principles on which the kingdom of Cyrus was administered, and to contrast them with those that had been followed by Assyrian or Babylonian conquerors. When we come to the death of Cyrus, we find our author at a loss. Professor Duncker is clear for rejecting the narrative of Herodotus. It gives one account out of several current at the time, the one which seemed most probable to him, that is, as Professor Duncker thinks, the one which most commended itself to him as according with his theory of a divine government of the world. The difficulty is to find something to substitute. Where all is so uncertain, we may, perhaps, consult our inclination, and prefer the poetical justice of Xenophon. The character of Cambyses, in the light thrown upon it by Egyptian inscriptions, comes out somewhat differently from the picture of Herodotus, the frenzied insulter of Egyptian religion. It is clear, however, that he was one of the many victims of the law which seems to make absolute power fatal, if not to its first, certainly to its after-possessor. The son of Cyrus and the son of Darius are each conspicuously different from their fathers. The history of Darius follows, and there are some very valuable chapters dealing with the internal economy of the empire, as it was consolidated in his hands.

Sandringham, Past and Present. By Mrs. Herbert Jones. (Sampson Low and Co.)—It is always something of a surprise to find what a number of interesting associations there are with places of which scarcely any one beyond the neighbourhood has heard. Sandringham was known to fame before the Prince of Wales purchased the estate. Now that every one is familiar with the house, and it becomes worth a writer's while to tell its history, one sees that it was quite worth knowing. Elizabeth Scales, Lord Rivers (one of the victims of Richard III.), the Cobbes, the Hostes (a family from Bruges), and the Motteux (a Huguenot race), have successively owned the estate. One of this last family, Peter Anthony Motteux was a man of some literary distinction; he translated Rabelais and Don Quixote, and wrote at least one successful play, to which Dryden contributed a prologue, and in which Mrs. Bracegirdle acted. The last Motteux left the house to the Cowper family, and they sold it to the Prince for £220,000, a sum which must represent an enormous increase in value. Mrs. Jones has filled up her volume with an account of other Norfolk places and personages. She describes Lynn, Castle Rising, Hunstanton, Great Yarmouth, &c., and tells the story of Miles Corbet, Sir Cloudesley Shovel, Lord Nelson, and others. She is not, we should say, a professed antiquary, and does not deal with her subject in a thorough and exhaustive way; but she has made a readable book out of it, and there are some attractive illustrations.

Agriculture for India. By Lieutenant Frederic Pogson. (Thacker, Spink, and Co., Calcutta.)—The writer's brief preface puts the problem which has to be met very clearly. The soil of India is decreasing in fertility, and various causes are at work, one of them certainly such as an outsider never would have imagined. This is irrigation. The water brings with it saline matters which sterilise the soil; and it also carries off fertilising substances. On the other hand, we have, thanks to the improved sanitary conditions and the humane laws, that, for instance, which forbids female infanticide, a rapidly-increasing population. There is only one way of meeting the difficulty. As Mr. Pogson puts it:—"Zemindars and ryots throughout the length and breadth of the land are now about to be called upon to make two blades of grass grow where only one grew before." Hence this book, which is an attempt to give practical instruction in agriculture as it is practised in India,—practised, it must be remembered, under very different conditions from anything that we are familiar with in England. The difficulty will be, not, indeed, in giving the necessary instruction—a course in an English agricultural college, supplemented by a year in India, would suffice—but in giving it to the right persons. The people to be taught are not young Englishmen, but Indian peasants. The author suggests "translating one or more practical works in agriculture into Hindu and Urdu, and causing them to be read by the educated men to the adult village population, assembled once a week for that purpose." This does not sound very hopeful. In any case, the process must be terribly slow, and most unlikely to overtake a rapidly-increasing need. Mr. Pogson, however, is not the less to be thanked for a valuable contribution to a great work.

Life as I Have Found It. By General Ainslie. (Blackwood and Sons.)—General Ainslie, though he seems to have risen to almost the top of his profession, seems to be by no means satisfied with his career. He has not, indeed, had the good-luck to see much active service. Beyond a few pages about India, in the time of the Mutiny, and these very barren of incident, we have nothing of the kind in this bulky volume. But he has a great deal to tell us about the places he has seen, and the people he has met, especially the ladies with whom he has fallen in love. These are numerous, scarcely does Waller's famous catalogue of his loves exceed them, and include ladies married as well as single. There is, indeed, a naïveté about General Ainslie's confessions in this respect which reminds us a little of Rousseau, though they are not so unedifying. Naturally, we hear various opinions about men and things, which may be valued according to our estimate of the writer's judgment and discretion. He expresses an unmixed regret for the extinction of the duel, and records his "conviction that the result has been a rapid and universal deterioration in manners, habits of society, language, &c." On the subject of the abolition of purchase of commissions in the Army he expresses himself with reserve, though his feeling is adverse. This is, of course, no more than was to be expected, and we may well allow him credit for the moderation with which it is expressed. On the whole, we may say that this book will be far more interesting a hundred years hence than it is now.

We have received a second edition, "thoroughly revised," of California, for Health, Pleasure, and Residence. By C. Nordhoff. (Sampson Low and Co.) We may specially commend to our readers the chapter on the culture of the vine in California. Vine-growing in the New World, now that the phylloxera is ravaging the vineyards of the Old, seems to be one of the most promising careers of the future, unless, indeed, the Total Abstiners succeed in putting an end to the occupation. Probably that is not more likely than that the Peace Society will abolish the profession of arms.—Introduction to the Critical History of Philosophy, by the Rev. Asa Mahan (Elliot Stock), being the introductory chapter of a large work bearing the same title.—Vibratory Motion and Sound, by Professor Everett. (Longmans.)—The War in Egypt, illustrated by Richard Simpkin (Routledge and Sons), the text and the maps being reprinted from the Times.—Copyright and Patents for Inventions, Vol. II., by R. A. Macfie. (T. and T. Clark.) There is a section specially interesting, to those, at least, who live by the pen, on the copyright question. Mr. Macfie is an advocate for the royalty system. A book once published, and the first edition sold (this concession has been made in the view of obvious difficulties), any one is to be allowed to republish it, paying a certain consideration to the author. That, we take it, would pretty well reverse the present situation of authors and publishers, as far as money is concerned. The profit would go to those who write the books. It is possible that this may be right, though the precedent of ages is against it.—The Guide of the Perplexed of Maimonides. Translated from the original text by M. Friedländer, Ph.D. (Published for the Society of Hebrew Literature by Trübner and Co.)—An Essay on Assyriology, by George Evans, M.A. (Williams and Norgate), published by the Hibbert Trustees.—Saint Augustine, a Sketch of his Life and Writings, by Charles Hastings Collette (W. H. Allen and Co.), a controversial work, disputing the arguments which have been drawn by Roman theologians from the writings of Augustine in support of Tridentine doctrine.—Education. By J. MacLochlin. (Elliot Stock.)—The Arabian Nights. Translated into Urdu, Romanised under the superintendence of J. W. H. Tolbert, and edited by Frederic Pincott. (W. H. Allen and Co.)—Dialogues, Russian and English. Compiled by A. R. Thompson. (Trübner and Co.)—Bemrose's Choir Chant Book. By Charles Edward Stephens. (Bemrose and Sons.)

SPECTACLES V. BLINDNESS.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection generally employed by the mere vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." The Rev. Professor W. A. Hale, M.A. Cantab., 2 Minford Gardens, West Kensington Park, writes:—"The Spectacles are perfect, and a most decided boon. I had occasion on Monday to write to Lord —, and took the opportunity to mention your name, and the wonderful power of your Spectacles." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age (88). I can now read the smallest type, although suffering from cataract on the right eye." Testimonials from Earl and Countess Lindsay; F. D. Dixon Hartland, Esq., M.P.; the Venerable Archdeacon Palmer, Clifton; Rev. Mother Abbess, St. Mary's Abbey, Mill Hill, Hendon; C. J. MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE, LONDON.

"The College adheres to its original principle of freely imparting Theological knowledge, without insisting on the adoption of particular Theological doctrines."

At an Annual Meeting of the Trustees, held in University Hall, London, Thursday, June 23rd, 1883, JOSEPH LUTTON, Esq., in the Chair, it was resolved: "That, as Trustees of a College dedicated to free Theological Teaching, assembled under a sorrowful impression from the recent death of the Right Rev. John William Colenso, D.D., Bishop of Natal, we desire to record our high appreciation of his work as a Biblical scholar during the last twenty-one years; our deep respect for his unswerving love of truth, and his candour, calmness, and patience in controversy; for his faithful labours and humane sympathies as a Missionary of Christ; and our admiration of his repeated and solemn appeals for the removal of Ecclesiastical Tests which enervate the thought and trouble the conscience of the Clergy, cripple the advance of true learning, and intercept the natural union of Christian minds in love for each other and piety to God."

THE COUNCIL OF FIRTH COLLEGE,
Sheffield, INTEND to APPOINT a PRINCIPAL who shall also be Professor in the Faculty of Science.

Applicants are requested to state which of the following Chairs they would desire to occupy, Mathematics, Physics, Mechanical Engineering, Geology and Mining.

It is especially desirable that the Principal should have sympathy with the development of Technical Instruction in its direct bearing upon the industries of the district. The Salary will be £500 per annum, with half the fees of his own classes.

The Council will only make the appointment in event of suitable Candidates presenting themselves.

Candidates are requested to give full particulars concerning age, experience, and any Academic distinction they may have gained, together with any other information likely to affect the decision of the Council. The names of three Gentlemen to whom references may be made should be given, but no Testimonials need be sent unless they are asked for.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

A GRAVE incident occurred in the House of Commons on Wednesday afternoon. Sir Stafford Northcote having inquired, in a guarded and significant way, whether serious news had not been received from Madagascar, Mr. Gladstone replied in the affirmative, stating that, according to telegrams received via Zanzibar, Tamatave, the chief port of Madagascar, was occupied by the French on June 14th. The French Admiral proclaimed a state of siege, arrested the native "secretary" to the Consulate—"interpreter" would be, perhaps, a better description—imprisoned a Missionary, Mr. Shaw, for "communicating with the enemy," and ordered the British Consul, Mr. Pakenham, to quit the place in twenty-four hours. Mr. Pakenham, a man of eighteen stone and very sickly, died seven hours before the expiration of the term. The Admiral invited the officers of H.M.S. 'Dryad' to attend the funeral, but subsequently stopped all communication between that vessel and the shore. Mr. Gladstone, in a very serious tone, proceeded to say that the Government had communicated with that of France on this "grave and painful occurrence," and were "awaiting those explanations which it had been intimated to that Government were anticipated." Lord Granville on Thursday endorsed this statement, adding that he had communicated with the French Chargé d'Affaires within a few minutes of receiving the telegrams, and that M. Challeml-Lacour, though ignorant of the facts, had admitted that the expulsion of the Consul needed extreme circumstances to justify it.

No intelligence whatever of these events appears to have reached Paris, but M. Jules Ferry, the Premier, assures the Correspondent of the Standard that he had received intelligence of Mr. Gladstone's speech with the "greatest surprise." He protested against the faintest idea of any but cordial feelings towards the British Government, which, in "its dealings with France, notably in the matter of the Tunis capitulations, had been so thoroughly fair." He hinted that Consul Pakenham had very strong anti-French feeling, and that the Missionaries were not quite trustworthy reporters, but bade the correspondent tell his readers that the "most sincere wish of the French Government is to live on peaceful and amicable terms with your country." That is satisfactory, and it is, of course, possible that the death of Consul Pakenham produced too deep an impression of the way in which he had been treated; but two facts must be remembered. One is that the German and other Consuls, on hearing of his expulsion, hauled down their flags; and another is that the news received by Government is a summary of despatches, probably, though not certainly, written by the Captain of the 'Dryad,' and forwarded by the 'Dragon' to Zanzibar. The chance of misrepresentation of the facts is, therefore, small.

Mr. Childers on Wednesday described the arrangement made by the British Government with the Suez Canal Company. The Company are to cut a second Canal by the end of 1888, parallel with the first, and of adequate capacity; to appoint an English

Vice-President, to elect an English Director a member of the Executive Committee, to appoint an English Naval officer Inspector of Navigation in both Canals, with, it is understood, very large powers of control on the spot; to engage English pilots; and to reduce dues, so that ¼ fr. per ton shall be taken off for every 3 fr. per cent. of dividend above 21 per cent. In return, the British Government will lend £8,000,000 to the Company at 3½ per cent., for the completion of the second Canal. These terms are objected to as too favourable to the French, which is not altogether the case, as the Khedive's rights remain unimpaired, and will be exercised under English advice; and as benefiting shipping too little, which is, in one way, true. The reduction of dues might have been more rapid, but then this is probably the point on which the Lesseps family, who represent the Company, would not give way. They are fighting, first of all, for the shareholders, and their own fortunes. We have discussed the political aspect of the affair elsewhere.

The arrangement with the Suez Canal Company must, of course, be ratified by Parliament, and it is said that it will be strenuously resisted. The shipowners, who hoped for a competing British Canal, with very low rates, are furious, and it is calculated that with their help and the Irish vote the Conservatives might beat the Government. We do not share these apprehensions. We question if the Conservatives will venture to oppose what their old leader, Lord Beaconsfield, would have approved; and we doubt if the shipowners, who have only to pay what all competitors have to pay, will throw away their seats on such an issue. Moreover, Mr. Gladstone's statement on Thursday, that, in his judgment and that of the Law Officers of the Crown, Ismail Khedive had conceded to M. de Lesseps the monopoly for Canal purposes of the Isthmus of Suez, is very nearly final. Half the utility of a new Canal would be lost, if it could not be worked in combination with the old one; while the expense of cutting through cultivated land within reach of the Nile flood would be enormous. It is, of course, open to the Khedive to expropriate M. de Lesseps' concession, on payment of adequate compensation; but the amount to be awarded for a monopoly of that kind, yielding twenty-one per cent., with indefinite possibilities of increase, would stagger even the Treasury. The Tories will, we suspect, on reflection, confine themselves to praising the foresight of Lord Beaconsfield.

The Corrupt Practices Bill had all but passed through Committee before yesterday's sitting. A few slight changes had been made in the right direction,—such as the Equity clause which will permit an Election Judge to declare that by a trivial case of "treating" or "illegal practice," to which neither the candidate nor his election agent has been in any way privy, the election need not be voided; but the attempt to extend the same Equity clause to bribery on an equally small scale, and equally unknown to the candidate or his election agent, was defeated. We do not see why. Surely, the procuring by bribery of one or two votes which do not turn the scale, and procuring these against the express will and without the least knowledge of the candidate or his election agent, ought not to void an election formally made by the vast majority of the electorate. There seems to us nothing but danger to the cause of purity, in pushing the purism of the new measure beyond practical limits. Why should one or two foolish and unprincipled men, of whom neither the candidate nor his agent knows anything, be empowered to vitiate an election by their perfectly irresponsible lawlessness and folly?

The hiring of public vehicles by a candidate or his agent for the conveyance of electors to the poll is to be strictly forbidden, while it is to be permitted to any number of electors to join together to hire a public vehicle for their joint conveyance to the poll, and private persons may lend their own carriages and carts to convey electors to the poll. This seems to us an altogether impracticable confusion of prohibitions and permissions. How is it to be shown that when a public carriage has been hired by a number of electors to convey them jointly to the poll, each of them has really paid his own fair and equal share? And yet, if this is not the case, there will certainly have been a violation of the prohibition against the hiring of a conveyance by one elector for the behoof of another elector. And how is it to be shown that where private carts and carriages have been freely lent for the conveyance of voters to the poll, the owner has not received and will not receive any equivalent for thus placing his conveyances at the disposal of the candidate? We still hold very strongly that if all paying for conveyance is to be disallowed, the lending or hiring of vehicles for the purpose of carrying electors to the poll should have been wholly disallowed by the Bill. As it stands, the provisions on this head will lead to endless disputes, confusions, disappointments, and recriminations.

Mr. Chaplin obtained a victory over the Government on Tuesday which is much to be regretted, and a victory not only over the Government, but over the Act of 1878 on the importation of cattle, which his resolution virtually requires the House of Commons to repeal. His allegation was that foot-and-mouth disease has not been kept out of England under that Act, as administered by the Government,—that foot-and-mouth disease is of foreign origin, and might be stamped out, if importation from countries which suffer under it were forbidden, and that such importations ought to be forbidden in the interest of the British farmer. His contention is that only four per cent. of the meat supply of England would be excluded by excluding all importations from countries which suffer under the foot-and-mouth disease, and that a considerable portion of that might be regained by the increase of the dead-meat import. Of the mischief done by foot-and-mouth disease in particular districts, Mr. Chaplin adduced plenty of evidence, though, in fact, none was needed, as that mischief is matter of notoriety.

Mr. Mundella's reply was very exhaustive and powerful. He showed that the Act, which had only been five years in operation, had done wonders in the way of stamping out rinderpest and sheep-rot, diminishing in a very great degree pleuropneumonia, and keeping down foot-and-mouth disease to a comparatively minute figure, as compared with its ravages in 1871. He showed that the Duke of Richmond and Mr. Clare Sewell Read had both expressed themselves fully satisfied with the working of the Act, and doubtful whether it would be possible to work it more stringently; and he declared that if the intermediate course of slaughtering suspected cargoes of cattle at the port of arrival was to be dispensed with altogether, and the alternative between free entry and complete prohibition alone left, new legislation would be needed, since the Act of 1878 legalised distinctly that intermediate course; and he insisted at length on the frightful cost to the food of the country of the new policy. His speech was, to our minds, absolutely convincing; but some Liberals deserted to Mr. Chaplin and a good many stayed away, and the Government was defeated by a majority of 8; 200 votes to 192. We are disposed to think that it would be even better to invite the House to rescind its vote, than to act upon it.

The accounts from Egypt are most distressing. The deaths from cholera in Damietta are declining, the daily average having sunk from 120 to 35; but at Mansourah, a town thirty-three miles up the river, with only 17,000 people, the deaths were on Monday 101, on Tuesday 102, and on Thursday 90. In neither town are there any European doctors, and the Egyptian doctors are worse than useless; while the lack of medicine, disinfectants, and organisation is almost total. The Ministers are either afraid of the cholera, which is unlikely, they being Mussulmans, or they are afraid of European pressure on the subject, for they are maintaining the cordon with savage rigour. It is utterly useless, of course, as any one passes who can bribe the soldiers; but the orders are to shoot any citizens who try to break through, and when bribes are not offered, or any one is looking on, the orders are obeyed. According to the latest telegrams, the people, with their wages stopped, all business suspended, and no means of communicating with outsiders, are dying of starvation, and supplies sent by the charitable Europeans of Alexandria are returned, by official order. The Europeans on Thursday engaged three doctors, but hitherto Cherif Pasha has declined assistance, and especially prohibits spirits, though brandy and opium are the only effective remedies.

The French Chamber on Tuesday began and finished another debate on Tonquin, M. Granet, on behalf of the Radicals, pleading that military occupation would not make a valuable colony; and that China, even if she did not intervene openly, might wage a harassing war through hands of pirates under the Black Flag. M. Challemel-Lacour, in reply, repudiated the idea of war with China, from which he expected concessions, though, he said, the Marquis Tseng resorted to undiplomatic methods of communicating with the outer world. He declared the Bourée Treaty inadmissible, as it would establish a double Protectorate of Anam, and "a double Protectorate always embroiled the Protecting Powers,"—a sentence which Lord Granville will probably remember and quote as applicable to Egyptian affairs. He allowed, however, that France must now be considered at war with the King of Anam, but stated that she would "only" occupy the valley of the Songkoi, a cool remark, as that delta separates Anam from China, and gives the entrance to Yunnan, which the Chinese dread. It is, moreover, not true, every French officer on the spot declaring, what every English official in Asia knows to be correct, that no arrangement can be made with Anam until Hué, the fortress capital, has been occupied, and the King reduced to vassalage. Besides, though the vitality of these Indo-Chinese kingdoms is not high, no kingdom, even Anam, can part with a province like Tonquin, which connects it with its natural allies, until it has been conquered.

The Comte de Chambord still lives, and the accounts of his condition are sometimes more favourable. His immediate agent in Paris, however, the Comte de Blacas, publishes ominous bulletins; it is admitted that they have grown worse since he ceased to wish to see them, and the latest telegram from Vienna, where the Count's condition is watched with interest, mentions that the disease begins to be called cancer of the stomach. It appears to be the steady etiquette of Courts never to admit that hope is over with a royal personage until he dies, and the custom has extended to America. The doctors admitted after the death of President Garfield that the injury to his spine from the bullet made recovery hopeless, and that they knew this all through.

A good deal of interest was taken on Thursday in an inquiry by Mr. Croyke into a grant of a pension of £250 a year to Prince Lucien Bonaparte. Mr. Gladstone explained that the Prince had devoted, not only his whole time, but much money, to philological researches of a kind essential to human history, but entirely unremunerative, the public declining to buy the books. He had, for example, printed the Gospel of St. Matthew in twenty-nine different languages, the Parable of the Sower in seventy-two European languages and dialects, and the Song of the Three Children in eleven dialects of Basque. Labours of this kind permanently facilitate philological inquiry, and Mr. Gladstone might, we believe, have added that the Prince translated the Song of Solomon into most of the dialects of English. The only fair ground for comment is that the pension is rather larger than usual, and larger than it would have been had the Prince been either an Englishman or a commoner. It must be remembered, however, that he had expended far more than he will ever receive in distributing the books, as aids to inquiry, among the philologists of the world.

Mr. Hugh Mason's motion for extending the franchise to female as well as to male householders was beaten, on Friday week, by a majority of 16, in a small and rather indifferent House, 114 voting for the motion and 130 against it. The defect of the debate was that those who advocated women's suffrage were not agreed among themselves, some of them advocating it on principles which would destroy the household basis of the franchise altogether, and give the wife of every householder a vote not only if she were a householder, but simply as the political equal of her husband, while the greater number of the advocates of the motion defended it on the ground that on the basis of a property qualification,—which, by the way, would never have been adopted unless, at the time it was adopted, women voters had been out of the question,—there is no good reason why women should not vote for Members of Parliament, which does not in their estimation equally apply against women's voting for Municipal Councils and for School Boards. Sir Henry James pointed out that if this measure were adopted, then, under the Married Women's Property Act any married woman who held a freehold would receive the vote for that freehold, so that not only single women who were householders, but wives would be enfranchised. A very general feeling was expressed, even by the advocates of women's suffrage, against admitting women to Parliament, and indeed nothing could look less like the triumph of women's equality as regards political rights than the general tenor of the debate, even in the mouths of such advocates of women's suffrage as Mr. Hugh Mason, Baron Henry de Worms, Mr. Henry Fowler, and Mr. Courtney.

Mr. Plunket, M.P. for the University of Dublin, made a very bitter speech against the Government, at Retford, on Wednesday, his chief text being the Monaghan election, and the complete rout of the Liberal candidate, Mr. Pringle. This defeat Mr. Plunket looks upon as, in some unexplained way, a great disgrace to the Government; whereas, all it shows is that the Ulster farmers thought they should obtain more by defeating the Government in the sense of a farther-going agrarian movement, than by supporting it. Mr. Plunket quoted Mr. Parnell's claim that he had himself sketched out the Arrears Bill of last year in Kilmainham, as if he were pouring vitriol on Mr. Gladstone by quoting it. But the truth is that Mr. Gladstone never concealed from Parliament that he had taken the notion of such a Bill from the Irish party, and had taken it because, on considering the danger, as explained by that party, that the Land Act would otherwise fail of its best results, he frankly admitted the imminence of the danger. Indeed, the Government Arrears Bill avowedly followed the lines of Mr. Redmond's Bill,—a Bill of which Mr. Gladstone spoke most favourably at the time its second reading was moved, so far at least as his own Bill subsequently followed it. What disgrace there can be in admitting the truth of the claim that the Irish party first suggested the Arrears Bill,—when Mr. Gladstone made his first speech on the subject, on the occasion of discussing Mr. Redmond's Bill,—it is impossible to conceive. It was very natural that the Irish party should be the first to perceive where the Land Act might be wrecked, and it was very right for the Government to profit by that quickness of perception, since they did not desire to see the Land Act wrecked.

Mr. Bradlaugh has been again the subject of a resolution in the House of Commons. On Monday, the Prime Minister read, in answer to a question from Sir Stafford Northcote, a letter which he had received from Mr. Bradlaugh, intimating his purpose to take his seat without regard to the adverse resolution of the House of Commons,—a resolution which Mr. Bradlaugh regards as invalid and illegal. Mr. Gladstone added that as the Government had proposed to deal with the difficulty in its own way, and the House had rejected its proposal, he must leave it to the majority to suggest the action that ought to be taken in view of Mr. Bradlaugh's announced purpose. Thereupon Sir Stafford Northcote proposed that the Serjeant-at-Arms be directed to exclude Mr. Bradlaugh from the House until he engage not further to disturb its proceedings, a motion opposed by Mr. Labouchere, in spite of Mr. Gladstone's remonstrance against a useless waste of time, but carried, on a division, by a majority of 167,—232 votes to 65. Mr. Newdegate's suggestion that this resolution should be turned into a Standing Order was declared by the Speaker to be inconsistent with the rights of the House. Mr. Bradlaugh has since intimated in a letter to the Serjeant-at-Arms that if he will but declare that actual force would be used to prevent Mr. Bradlaugh from taking the oath and his seat, he (Mr. Bradlaugh) would at once apply to the High Court of Justice for an injunction to restrain the Serjeant-at-Arms from committing such a breach of the peace. Mr. Bradlaugh may make what application he pleases to the High Court of Justice, but we do not imagine that he or any one else will persuade the High Court of Justice to impose law on the House of Commons. It might, perhaps, be better for the House of Commons, if it did.

A meeting was held at St. James's Hall on Wednesday, to protest against the sentences passed on Messrs. Foote and Ramsey for blasphemy, and, indeed, altogether against the blasphemy laws as they now stand. We greatly regret that Sir William Harcourt has not advised the Crown to remit a large portion of the very heavy sentences passed upon these offenders. That they deserved some punishment for the scurrilous nature of their attack on Christianity may be admitted, but the sentences actually passed were of a kind to gain them, with the mob, the reputation of martyrs. No more foolish course could have been taken, and we believe that, looking to the kind of persons punished, the sentence was unjust also. Mr. Bradlaugh, who addressed the meeting at St. James's Hall, is understood to have boasted that those who punished Mr. Foote and Mr. Ramsey did not dare touch him. That probably means only that Mr. Bradlaugh's notoriety is turning his head. But what greater folly can be committed, than that of making for such a man so factitious a fame?

It is stated that the Government of India have agreed to allow the Ameer of Afghanistan a lakh of rupees a month, £120,000 a year, so long as he conducts himself on principles approved by the British Government. That is a reversion to the old policy carried out successfully with Dost Mahomed, and is thoroughly wise. The Ameers of Afghanistan can raise troops in considerable numbers by calling on the Sirdars, or feudal nobles; but they cannot keep up a corps d'élite solely dependent on themselves, and ready to attack any noble, without a supply of specie, which they can obtain only from the British. With this donation, they can keep together 5,000 men and some artillery, and so stamp out the embers of sedition before they burst into a flame. They can, moreover, secure the prompt and permanent assistance of one or two Sirdars, with part, and a small part, of the money, the desire for a small specie revenue being extreme. The allowance, in fact, makes Abdurrahman a powerful Prince, as it made Dost Mahomed, and gives the British the control of his external relations at a tenth of the cost which even a small army at Quetta would involve. The Ameer will never do any act which would stop his supply of coin, and it should be carefully noted that the payments are to be made month by month. That is to say, the most essential revenue of the Court of Cabul can be stopped at a month's notice.

We greatly regret to hear of the serious illness of the Bishop of Peterborough, which on Tuesday took the form of peritonitis, accompanied by terrible pain. On Friday he was thought to be much better, though by no means out of danger. The Bishop is by far the greatest orator on the Episcopal Bench, probably the greatest orator in the House of Lords, and has, too, a good deal less of the professionally clerical posture of mind in him than the other Bishops. We heartily hope for his early and complete recovery. Genius of any kind is not too abundant in either Church or State, and the Bishop of Peterborough is not only a man of genius, but a man of genius with that dash of audacity in him which gives to the character of an ecclesiastic a special flavour of its own.

The Bishop of Lincoln, Dr. Wordsworth, who is in his seventy-sixth year, has intimated that if the See of Southwell, which would take in the counties of Nottingham and Derby, as contemplated in the Act of 1878, cannot be speedily founded, owing to deficiency of funds, he shall think it necessary soon to resign his bishopric. £19,000 remains to be raised before the See of Southwell can be constituted, and Dr. Wordsworth hardly thinks the prospect near enough to warrant him, at his age, in continuing to govern so unwieldy a diocese, and one which needs so strenuous an administration. Unless, therefore, some great impulse is given to the foundation of the Southwell See, Dr. Wordsworth will resign. It is a great pity. We have often differed widely from Dr. Wordsworth, but it is hardly possible to exaggerate the value of his example,—his singular simplicity and piety,—as a ruler of the sober but somewhat worldly-minded Church of the nation.

The slight, but persistent, decline in Consols has given rise to a good deal of remark. It is due, we are told, to considerable sales by small holders, and a hesitation on the part of trustees, who have sought the Two and a Half per Cents., a stock greatly in request. Neither small owners nor trustees like Consols over par, and turn aside to any safe stock not likely to be affected by any political accident. Nothing, one would say, could resist the effect of the laws ordering certain investments to be made in Consols, but the difficulty experienced in keeping them above par is very notable.

Bank Rate, 4 per cent.

Consols were on Friday 99½ to 99¾.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

BRITISH RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.

IS the Times really wishing for a rupture with France, for it is that which it is helping to force on? The situation is quite grave enough, without the use of such language as it indulged in on Friday morning. As our readers are aware, the relations between Great Britain and France have for some time past been less cordial than of old. The relics of the Gambettist party, supported by a good deal of upper-class and military opinion, and, we fear, by some strong financial Rings, are determined to press Gambetta's policy of "adding to the fortune of France," and repairing her prestige by acquiring new colonial dependencies,—not colonies proper, but provinces in which sugar can be grown, mines can be opened, and new trades can be developed. Their especial favourite, M. Challe-mel-Lacour, heartily agrees with their views, and pushes their policy in Indo-China, in Madagascar, in Tunis, and in the Pacific, with a very high hand, amusing the Chamber all the while with tales of the ease and cheapness with which his ideas can be carried out. The English Press, however, and it may be the English diplomatists, though they neither intrigue nor oppose him, perpetually worry him by exposures of the facts, which reach the Deputies, alarm them with a sense of the new liabilities they are undertaking, and produce annoying interpellations. The Radicals do not want great colonial wars, and M. Challe-mel-Lacour has to explain away everything, facts included, about once a week. No Foreign Secretary would like that, and M. Challe-mel-Lacour, a man of the literary rather than the political type, with an acrid and over-vehement genius, is irritated by it to fury, and communicates that fury to agents abroad, who, as we see in Tamatave, are disposed already to use violence in asserting French prerogatives. The Press of Paris, inspired in part by the Foreign Office, is boiling over with a suppressed rage, which finds vent on every safe occasion—e.g., the outburst of cholera in Egypt—and but for the steady resolve of the Chamber to avoid complications, M. Grévy's calm sense, and M. Jules Ferry's good-temper, the continuance of relations with France might become impossible.

Under these circumstances, the British Government, which is entirely friendly to France, though determined to be un-hampered in Egypt, is compelled to steer warily, more especially as both Germany and Russia would like to see the two nations quarrel; and it has done so. It has been obliged to awaken the French Government to the complications which a blockade of Chinese ports might create, but it has left them alone in Anam, and has advised the Cabinet of Pekin to exercise patience. It has done nothing in Madagascar, literally nothing, or Admiral Pierre could not have fired a shot. It has facilitated French policy as to the Capitulations in Tunis with a friendliness which M. Jules Ferry cordially and publicly acknowledges, and it has resolved the most dangerous problem of all, the Suez Canal, in a spirit so equitable and generous that the French are delighted, and the English ship-owners and Chauvinists declare that British interests have been unduly neglected. That, however, is not the case. What the Government has done in negotiating with M. de Lesseps is to conciliate France at every point on which British national interests were not involved. It has not done much to secure a great reduction in the Canal dues, which the shipowner, not the general trader, would have pocketed; it has left the Shareholders of the Canal their profits, which it could hardly have taken away without compensation; and it has allowed the Canal to remain in name French, so avoiding what would have been regarded in France as an act of violent high-handedness, to be hereafter avenged. But it has insisted that the Canal shall have a double instead of a single line of water-way,—an immense gain to commerce, because with two water-ways not only is the capacity of the Canal doubled, but a much higher speed of transit can be secured. The vessels in each canal will only steam one way, and there is, therefore, none of that risk of collision which now reduces the steamers often to a mile an hour. The Government has, moreover, insisted that the control of the navigation shall be placed in the hands of an English Admiral, whose powers are to be great, and who will be supported by the Khedive, and by this country and India,—that is, by the masters of both ends and the whole length of the Canal. It has seated an Englishman as Vice-President of the Canal Company, who must know everything the Company does, and who, if needful, will have the courage to oppose M. de Lesseps himself. It has provided that in any new issue of Shares the English shall have fair-play, and it has finally and most astutely avoided creating a farther French financial interest in the Canal, by finding the money itself, at a profitable rate. The Treasury will emit £8,000,000 Consols at 3 per cent.—the form, of course, will be Two and a Half per Cents, but that is immaterial—for which it is to receive 3½ per cent. That this sum will suffice to construct the second line of Canal we do not believe, for the old one cost £15,000,000, and, as all parties alike have forgotten, the new one cannot be built, as the first line was, by unpaid and well-whipped forced labour; but a debt of £12,000,000 at three per cent. would not impair the growing solvency of the Canal. Under the Convention, therefore, which must in outline have been seen and endorsed by the French Ministry, and which delights the French, the British Government retains, through the Khedive, the territorial sovereignty of the doubled Canal; it becomes the grand mortgagor of the Company; it assumes direct and full control of the navigation; and it seats its agent in the Vice-Presidency. What in the world does the Times want? The extinction of M. de Lesseps's claim to monopolise the right of cutting? That claim is, in a national sense, worth nothing at all. It is perfect, as against any other Company or private combination, and to take it away would, as our own Law Officers affirm, be an act of sheer violence; but it cannot be pleaded against the right of the Khedive, as Sovereign, to expropriate any Company whatever within his own dominion, just as the French Chamber may expropriate any Railway or other Company owning a "concession," on paying full compensation. Does the Times desire that England should become mistress of the Canal as it is of the Mersey? Then it is asking the impossible. All Europe would protest, possibly in arms—for the Canal is legally an arm of the sea—and if it did not, the power claimed, even if granted, must be resigned at once. Lord Granville has already proposed that the Canal shall be not neutralised, but declared exactly as open to navigators as the Straits of Dover; and however the legists may discuss details, that must be the ultimate solution, if we are not to surrender an equally important Canal, that of Panama, to the dominion of a single Power. The plain truth of the matter is that the Government has secured all it could, and that is a very great deal, though it has not given the shipowners a great bonus at M. de Lesseps's expense, and has broken the heart of some financiers by lending a loan out of which they would have extracted, in commission, previous interest, and the rise of the market, at least ten per cent., or £800,000.

The effect of all we have said is, of course, greatly increased by the unexpected news from Tamatave. We do not believe that the French Government desires a struggle with England, or that it will back up Admiral Pierre in his extraordinary proceedings towards her Majesty's Consul, Mr. Pakenham, and her Majesty's ship 'Dryad.' But every Government feels pain when compelled to disown officers who in certain situations are, if not supported, useless, and it is well that a request from Great Britain for reparation in Madagascar does not come on the top of irritating conduct in regard to the Suez Canal. Of course, the request for reparation must be made, and if the facts are truly reported, made in earnest. The Shaw affair is not very important, as there may be evidence that the worthy Missionary did commit imprudences, and our distrust of dragomans in the Far East—and the Malagasy secretary of the Consulate was just a dragoman—is considerable; but the order to Mr. Pakenham must be indefensible. International intercourse could not go on, if its agents were liable to peremptory expulsion at the discretion of any person whatever. If Mr. Pakenham erred in any way, his conduct could have been brought to Lord Granville's notice by the French Government without difficulty, and for that order there must be frank apologies. The French Government, however, will see that as readily as the British; and to make those apologies difficult by extravagant language is not sound patriotism, or sound sense either. There will be no war, for neither nation wants one, and what is the use, when redress can be obtained by conciliatory firmness, of leaving an impression that France was haughtily treated in a moment of embarrassment? Be it understood, we are not in the least pleading for any concession, either of principle or dignity. We contended for the rendition of Messrs. Mason and Slidell, at a time when war with the North seemed to us to involve a horrible blow to the progress of the world; and we would fight France willingly, sooner than the British Flag should be treated with deliberate contempt. But we utterly disbelieve in any such intention on the part of the French Government, and would, so far as possible, enable that Government to repair the wrong, without compelling it to quarrel with its own Navy, which is just now sore, anti-British, and owing to the events of 1870, possessed of unprecedented influence in French political affairs. The sailors can be relied on against Paris, and no other force can.

MR. CHAPLIN'S VICTORY AND MR. MUNDELLA'S SPEECH.

MR. CHAPLIN'S victory on Tuesday night illustrates afresh the old remark that a producing interest is always indefinitely stronger in proportion to its numbers than consumers, who have no means of common action, can ever be. Mr. Chaplin's victory,—which was due to the defection of a good many Liberals and the abstention of many more,—was the victory of the graziers over the people of Great Britain. As we understand the issue in debate, it is very simple. The Act of 1878 was intended to give the Privy Council a large discretion as between three courses of action towards foreign cattle,—free admission, slaughter at the port of debarkation, and complete prohibition. They were to be admitted free whenever there was reasonable evidence that the countries from which the cattle are imported are under good sanitary provisions as regards the health and transit of the cattle, and free from disease; they were to be slaughtered at the port of debarkation, whenever the countries whence the cattle come are not free from disease, but where the disease is not of the most dangerous kind, and where, in the opinion of the Privy Council, the mischief arising to the cattle-breeder from the possible importation of disease would not be nearly so serious as the mischief arising to the English people from a serious limitation of their food; and they were to be prohibited altogether, whenever the Privy Council and their advisers believed that the danger of infection,—such as must be involved in any coming of unhealthy cattle, even though slaughtered at the port of arrival,—would involve greater loss and suffering to the English people at large, than the complete exclusion of cattle coming to us from that region. The Privy Council have enforced the Act in this general sense,—that when they knew the origin of the cattle to be a country infected with rinderpest and pleuropneumonia, they prohibited the importation altogether; that when they knew it to be infected only with foot-and-mouth disease, which is a much less serious affair, but still knew it to be infected with foot-and-mouth disease in a virulent form, they prohibited importation for a time till they secured greater care and stricter precautions on the part of the exporting country and in consequence a great limitation of the danger; but that generally they insisted only on the slaughter at the port of arrival of animals arriving from countries where there is a certain amount of foot-and-mouth disease; and that they admitted cattle freely only where they were satisfied that the country from which the importations came was not infected with any disease, and that its sanitary regulations were good. Mr. Chaplin's victory, if it is to be acted on, really means this,—that there is to be no intermediate course at all, that the exercise of discretion by the Privy Council is to cease, and that whenever they are not satisfied that the country from which the cattle are received is absolutely free from disease, they must prohibit importation from that country altogether, and not allow cattle to arrive, even though they be slaughtered at the port of arrival. In other words, the consumer is to be sacrificed to the grazier or breeder, and four-fifths of the foreign meat supply is to be cut off; though, as Mr. Mundella tells us, only six diseased animals have been imported in the last six months out of thirty thousand actually imported. And thus the value of the cattle bred at home is to be artificially raised. And this is to be the course taken in spite of the fact that the cattle bred in England show a very much larger proportion of disease than the cattle recently imported from foreign countries under the careful administration of the Act of 1878. Mr. Mundella believes, and Mr. Chaplin and his friends do not deny, that the effect of the new restriction, if it is to be actually enforced, will raise the price of meat at least 2d. or 3d. a pound in this country,—a rise of price which practically means a discontinuance of a very considerable part of their animal food by very large classes in this country. In short, Mr. Chaplin's resolution means that, when the loss of the British grazier and breeder has to be weighed against the loss of a meat diet by the poorer population of England at large, the infliction of loss on the latter is always to be preferred.

And what is the excuse for this sudden reversal of the policy of 1878? Because, says Mr. Chaplin, the Act of 1878 has failed. Let any one who is taken in by that monstrous statement, study Mr. Mundella's very able speech. Of course, if it is meant that the Act of 1878 as administered has not absolutely excluded all importations of disease, the Act has failed—only nobody ever expected that it would succeed. So far as we can see, there is no reasonable doubt that foot-and-mouth disease was imported into this country in 1880, through the admission of an infected cargo to Deptford. But is that failure? The failure of a measure means, we suppose, not that it does not effect everything that the most sanguine hoped, but that it does not improve matters,—or even, if you please, that it does not effect as much as the reasonable and moderate supporters of the measure anticipated. In this case, judged by either meaning of the phrase, the Act has not only not failed, but has succeeded splendidly. It has in five years' administration extinguished rinderpest and sheep-rot. It has diminished pleuro-pneumonia by 75 per cent. And it has kept foot-and-mouth disease within such moderate limits that there have been fewer cases of it within the last three years than there were in a single month of 1871. If that is failure, what would success mean? We suppose it would mean, in Mr. Chaplin's mouth, the absolute extinction of imported disease of all kinds,—indigenous disease cannot, of course, be extinguished,—at any cost, however enormous, to the population of this country.

We submit that Mr. Mundella amply proved his case that it is infinitely better for this country at large to import 30,000 cattle, of which six should be diseased, if the disease, even though infectious, be disease only of a comparatively mild kind, and if precautions be taken by slaughtering at the port of arrival to prevent any needless risk of contagion, than to exclude the 29,994 healthy animals for the sake of also excluding the six diseased. For what, after all, does the imported disease mean? It means, no doubt, a risk of considerable loss to breeders and farmers. But the exclusion of the 29,994 sound animals means the certainty of very heavy loss indeed to the people, nor is there the least security that under Mr. Chaplin's restrictions the health of English cattle in general would be much better than before. Though a new chance of foreign disease would be shut out, disease originating in this country could not be shut out; and, as every one knows, epidemics very often strike only those who would have been struck down by some other illness, even if they had not been caught by the epidemic. In numberless instances, epidemic outbreaks have appeared to absorb the normal diseases prevalent in the place where the outbreak occurs, so that doctors have assured us that the actual quantity of disease has not been so much increased, as transformed from a variety of different types into the single type of the prevalent epidemic. If this be so, we may very well, by preventing the importation of foot-and-mouth disease, succeed only in altering the particular character of the malady by which our cattle are affected, and not succeed in keeping them healthier, or at least healthier to anything like the extent represented by the number of cases affected by the epidemic. But in any case, the price paid must be the same. We must forego the advantage of all the non-diseased cattle imported, for the sake of excluding the few cases of disease. Is this what the English people wish? We do not believe it. And however much the farmers may protest that they have no desire to return to a Protective system—and we do not doubt that, so far as they know themselves, they speak the truth—there is evidently a fascination to the breeder's mind in the prospect of that advance of the price of meat by 2d. or 3d. a pound, which, do what he may, he cannot prevent from more or less unconsciously influencing his judgment. What we have to consider is whether the people of England at large ought to suffer severely for the benefit of a class. We believe that the Act of 1878 was being administered on behalf of the people at large, but that Mr. Chaplin's resolution is a resolution in the interest of a class; and we should be glad, therefore, to see the Government invite the House to reconsider a decision so disastrous as the hasty vote of Tuesday night.

THE LATEST EGYPTIAN HORROR.

WE wonder at the calm with which these telegrams from Damietta and Mansourah are received in England. They conceal horrors which, if they occurred in the West, would drive English philanthropists frantic with indignation. It is quite evident to those who read them with understanding that in dealing with the outbreak of "cholera" in Egypt—if the disease is cholera, which we doubt—two civilisations have clashed, as they will always clash where a dual government exists in Asia; that both are consequently paralysed, and that as a result, two cities—one of 32,000 and one of 17,000 people—have been turned into pestiferous prisons, secluded charnel-houses, where the wretched prisoners, without medicine, or disinfectants, or doctors, or help, with all business suspended, and incomes unattainable, and food grown insufficient, are dying daily, chiefly of starvation, amid putrefaction of every kind. Damietta first, and Mansourah after, being towns where every sanitary precaution is neglected, but dogs are no longer scavengers, where the introduction of decency without science has produced its inevitable effect, poisonous malaria in all good houses, where the bodies of animals are left unburied for weeks, and the people even fish with the rotten carcasses of dead cows, which are tethered to the banks to attract the pawns, have experienced one of their periodical visitations of malarious disease. It may be cholera, which was originally born in Lord Hastings' camp under just those conditions, but is much more probably choleraic fever, a frightful disease, as deadly sometimes as plague, but one which requires conditions, and does not march, as cholera does, steadily from city to city, and land to land. Whatever it was, had Damietta and Mansourah been really Egyptian, the outbreak would have been treated by the Mussulmans, after their manner, with a profound calm, which has in it alike apathy and nobleness of soul. No Oriental has the Western horror of death, having been wearied to suffocation with life for continuous generations; and the Mussulman Asiatic believes, in addition, that the summons comes direct from the Almighty Will. Who is he, that he should resist God, or complain of him, or seek to turn him aside? He will not even pray to him for deliverance from his visible Message, and, with death poured out around him like water, passes on to his work, nurses his sick as usual, or at the worst announces that it is the will of God that the people retire into the Desert, the single efficacious expedient on which European Army Surgeons rely. Of course, under such circumstances death does its worst; but there is no disturbance of life, no dissolution of society, no pause in daily business, no outbreak of blasphemy, such as has often occurred in French or Italian cities. The women pass and the men disappear, and the children sink, in quiet, but the community goes on, to the eye, almost unharmed. Some faces you knew are away, the sound of the wailing, unchanged since the march of the Israelites, is heard from many houses, instead of few, and bearded men shudder visibly if you ask for their children; but there is no break in the stately calm of life, in the haughty resignation. "Did I will to be born?" asked a Mussulman of the writer, urging on him that a peculiarly fetid ditch ought to be cleaned, for it might kill him; and though the ditch remained, he died when his time came un murmuring. Damietta and Mansourah would, as Mussulman cities, have suffered and recovered, but they are not Mussulman cities. Above them, overshadowing them like a cloud, drifts European opinion, which demands gently that disease be treated scientifically, and imperiously that it be isolated. The Government of Egypt perforce listens to the command and perforce obeys it, and the unhappy towns are ringed-in by cordons of troops, with orders to shoot down all who emerge. So stringent are these orders, that it is said the Europeans of Damietta, maddened with fear and pity, attacked the cordon in arms and were driven back by the bayonet, not without deaths,—a trivial horror, compared with those we shall know when the pest-houses are opened once more. And there, Europe having been obeyed, the Government stops. Why should the Egyptian Ministers do more? They know nothing of hygiene; their own immovable belief is that Destiny is irreversible, that their own orders are futile, that death and life are in the hands of Allah. They will send telegrams, if you worry enough, but they do not want them obeyed. The townspeople, deprived by the cordon of occupation, of help, of wages, of food, are left to perish. They have no hygeists, no doctors, except six wretched natives, who believe all disease is cold or hot, no opium, no disinfectants, no hospitals, no one to order cleanliness, no one to isolate houses, no one to compel burial away from the roadside, no one to organise or order flight into the Desert, which, again, is prohibited by the cordon demanded by Europe. The Europeans of Alexandria declare that medicine is not allowed to enter, and whether that is true or false, hitherto only one European, a scientific chemist named Hooker—be his name not forgotten by Englishmen, as it will not be by God—has entered the fatal towns. The Europeans do not shrink from the disease, but from the long imprisonment in a fetid city, with its food exhausted and its people dying of starvation—this is literally true, according to the Times' telegrams—to which, if they once pass the cordon, the cowardly selfishness of Agnostic Southern Europe, howling with fear of death because there is no other life, condemns them. Indeed, it is doubtful if they would be allowed to enter, for the Ministry are said to prohibit entrance, and certainly disbelieve in effort, replying to Lord Granville's offers of aid with gently immovable refusals. What will Infidel doctors do, any more than Mussulman doctors, against the will of the Supreme? They might as well insult Heaven by insuring their lives, a crime no faithful Mussulman will commit. And so, in the clash of civilisations, the wretched people of Damietta and Mansourah perish twice as miserably as if they were either Asiatic or European. If they were Asiatic they would die as aged Englishmen die under a "cold wave," bowing their heads to fate, but not left alone or unattended; if they were European, they would be treated, disinfected, urged out to safer spots; but they are neither, and they die as prisoners might die kept during a fever in a Morgue.

It is just the same with the complaints sent up from the interior of Egypt. The officials there, say the informants of the Times' Correspondent, are worse than ever, more indolent, more negligent, more corrupt. How should it be otherwise? The European ideas have been introduced without the Europeans to work them, and while the native energy has died away, no European sense of duty has arrived. The European wishes to govern by law, taking pleasure in that, and not in the gratification of his own will, and therefore carries out law. The Asiatic, if not trained out of himself, finds in authority no pleasure, save in the gratification of his own volition, often a very benevolent or upright one; and set to administer rigid law, either does not do it, or takes a bribe to twist it into galling injustice. Make an untrained Mussulman absolute, and he will often secure justice; make him an exponent of a law in which he does not believe, and he seeks his own interest, which is, first, to enjoy unruffled peace, and next, to make some money. The people appeal to the Mudirs, but the Mudirs do not want the laws; and then appeal to the Ministers, and the Ministers, unless worried there and then by Europeans, do not want them either. Trained men may ultimately be secured, if there is money to pay them well; but till then, the endeavour to govern on Western motives with Asiatic instruments only ends in a decay of social energy, and universal hunger for unearned money. There are plenty of good Mussulmans, but they will not take office to be deprived of what is to them their only reward,—their power of making their own ideas, or the ideas of their creed, executive. They will no more take it than Englishmen would take Magistracies under Cetewayo, to carry out his decrees. The two civilisations—the Asiatic and European—can work together when the European says, as a Resident in a Native State virtually does, "Work in your own way, but let me see justice and content as results, or I will remove you;" but they will, under any other system, only clash. And even then the European must not ask that either the justice or the content shall be those he would see in London, but only those that reigned in Jerusalem, when there was peace for the people, and death for Uriah the Hittite.

LORD MONTEAGLE ON IRISH LANDLORDS.

IT is not only the election in Monaghan which shows that the new agrarian question in Ireland may shortly become of high political importance. There are signs abroad that in spite of the deadly bitterness existing between Irish Conservatives and Irish Liberals, between moderate Home-rulers and avowed Extremists, all Ireland may yet be united in demanding a final solution of the Land Question, in the direction of extinguishing landlordism altogether. The Parnellites reckon, the Times says, on carrying eighty-four seats, and if they carry fifty they will be formidable; but, on this one question, they may find unexpected allies. Read carefully, for example, the lecture to the Statistical Society of Ireland, on "The Social Situation in Ireland," which Lord Monteagle has just republished in pamphlet form. Lord Monteagle is one of the most hopeful of the younger Irish Peers, a resident landlord who has devoted himself to local improvement, a convinced Liberal who actually believes it essential that "privilege should cease to be the basis of authority," and one of the few Irish Peers who heartily and intelligently supported the Land Act. Indeed, as he says himself, he was openly in favour of the "Three F's" before they were proposed. He has not lost hope in the future, and is neither anxious nor willing to rescue what he can of his fortune and leave the country. On the contrary, he desires to go on living as an Irish gentleman in an improved Ireland, and believes it possible to effect all that is needed for social reconciliation without destroying the unity of the kingdom. Yet this Peer, owning 9,000 acres, speaking to a cultivated audience and in the most moderate language, gravely affirms his conviction that three alternatives, and three only, are now before British statesmen and Irish proprietors. One is the government of Ireland as a Crown Colony by military force, which he regards as being, in this century and under existing conditions, impossible. The second is Home-rule on the Canadian system, Ireland becoming independent on all questions except foreign politics,—a solution which he thinks would produce "the annihilation of the upper class," and, in the end, a complete "reconstruction of society;" and the third is to commence such a reform that "the Irish gentry shall cease to be landlords." He wishes for other changes, too, especially for improved and popular county administration; but this one he holds to be "vital," if society as it exists—society, that is, with many grades in it—is to endure at all. So long as the gentry are landlords, so long, he maintains, will the Irish people suspect them, and regard them not as their own gentry, but as an English garrison, intent on maintaining the law and supporting the police mainly because they assist in the collection of rent:—"For any good purpose, the landlord and tenant system is practically dead. If it is artificially kept alive, it will, I fear, be not only useless, but mischievous. I have the zeal of a convert on this subject, for I was one of those who earnestly advocated the 'Three F's' before the Government Bill was introduced, and opposed on public grounds what I believed to be the only alternative, namely, the compulsory expropriation of the landlords. . . . I consider it essential to the continuance and usefulness of a class of resident country gentlemen that it should be made clear that the landlords are no longer the English garrison; there is not so much need for legislative change, if once the process of the tenants buying out the landlords were fairly set going. So long as the gentry remain receivers of rent, they will be subject also to the suspicion of being the English garrison, even though they have practically ceased to exercise or even to possess any such power. The institution of the constabulary and of a paid magistracy has enabled the State largely to dispense with the services of the gentry for executive purposes. The Ballot Act has destroyed what remained to them of political influence. Protestant ascendancy is dead. But, so long as one of the principal functions of the police is to enforce the law for the recovery of rent, it will be supposed that, even though the landlords are not themselves the garrison, it is on their account the garrison is maintained—that, in fact, they are part of the system." The landlords, in short, in Lord Monteagle's opinion, must be bought out, if the upper-class in Ireland is not to be extinguished; and though time may be allowed for the operation, it must be effected with a certain rapidity and decision, so as to anticipate dangerous agitation.

The people of Great Britain are, therefore, face to face with this situation. A majority of Conservative owners, whose spokesman is Lord George Hamilton—himself, be it remembered, a representative in the Commons of a great Irish territorial family—are eagerly desirous of being bought out. A section, at least, of the few Liberal gentry represented by Lord Monteagle are equally desirous. A heavy majority of the tenants are on the same side, provided that their annual payments, whether in instalments of purchase-money or in quit-rents, are lower than they are now. The whole Extremist party, with its hold upon the populace in the cities, as well as on a portion of the farmers, vehemently express the same view, make it, in fact, and not the nobler idea of Nationalism, their stalking-horse. Those sections taken together are not quite Ireland, but they form so large a portion of it that at any time they may be able for this single purpose to say that they are Ireland, and to direct, so far as this one purpose is concerned, nearly or quite the whole Representation of the country. This is a formidable Parliamentary force in a country like this, where the chance of either of the great Parties completely crushing each other is so remote, and where a majority in the Commons is so clearly recognised as the final authority to which statesmen must, however unwilling, ultimately bow. The pressure, even if not irresistible, must embarrass any Government, and this all the more because the demand which rises on so many sides is so formless or indefinite. Nothing, in our judgment, makes the new agrarian project so dangerous as its want of outline. Everybody, or at all events men so different as Lord George Hamilton, Mr. W. H. Smith, Mr. Parnell, and Lord Monteagle, all hint at the same thing, yet no one says what the thing is in a way which British constituencies can thoroughly understand. Lord George Hamilton, it is true, produces "a plan" in the House of Commons; but he knows that it is a mere tentative, and does not offer a single trustworthy figure. Mr. Parnell talks of "bonds" as his instrument—that is, a State loan—but carefully avoids specifying amount, or security, or return. Lord Monteagle, though speaking to a Statistical Society, and though full of figures about the reduction of rent, even in special counties, does not offer a suggestion as to his chief proposal,—that "the gentry cease to be landlords." We judge, from a note on p. 12, that he thinks Lord George Hamilton moving in the right direction; but he offers no guess of his own as to the money required, nor any hint as to the method of the expropriation which he demands. Are the tenants to be made freeholders paying instalments, or freeholders paying a quit-rent, or simply tenants of the State, instead of tenants of the landlord, or what? Is the State to risk three hundred millions, or two hundred millions, or one hundred millions, or how much; or is somebody other than the State—the body of tenants, for example—to find the vast sum required? No one gives the slightest clear information on any of these points, and we have, therefore, the spectacle of a strong party rising up to defend a vast social project, the largest, perhaps, ever put forward in British politics, which, nevertheless, its spokesmen do not define, or even adumbrate, in a way that politicians can understand. We have watched agrarian agitation in Ireland for a quarter of a century with ever-increasing closeness, and declare that even now, as regards this project, we do not know what any group or party in its favour actually ask. We can see that the landlords want to get twenty years' rental down from somebody, and can believe that they would take two years' less. We can see that the Parnellites want to get the land for the very lowest price obtainable, and would like to pay for it in bonds,—payable, or non-payable, at tenants' discretion. And we can see that a party much larger than either would like to see uncertainty ended, and a territorial democracy actually commencing the formation of a stable society in Ireland. But we cannot see one single intelligible or arguable proposal of a method for obtaining these ends. It is all vague foreshadowing of results. It is not only that the only men who could carry such projects say nothing—for that was to be expected—but that the men who wish for them say nothing. The visionaries and philanthropists are as vague as the leaders of parties. Read Lord Monteagle's pamphlet, and you will see clearly that not only is the Irish landlord's power of resistance gone, but that his wish to resist is going; that he does not expect to keep his territorial ascendancy, and hardly cares to do it. But what is the use of discerning that? Nobody is a step the nearer, for that perception, to anything but a vague feeling that in Ireland the force behind property is dying away, and that the holders of property who see this do not see any way to its restoration, except the creation of a territorial democracy, towards which they perceive no clear road. We are in danger, in the present condition of Ireland, of the Government being forced to "do something," and something very large, without those who force them clearly knowing what their desire is.

THE APPROACH OF HARVEST.

IN the middle of May, after tracing the progress of the growing crops from their respective seed times, we were able to congratulate the country upon the probability of a fruitful season, although so early in the year it was impossible to speak with confidence as to Harvest prospects. Since then, we rejoice to state, the weather, on the whole, has been of a highly favourable character, so that the golden promise of the Spring bids fair to be realised. From the middle of May to the middle of June there was an almost uninterrupted drought, which told rather severely upon the light soils, and had the effect of keeping the straw of all crops from growing to an average length. In some seasons great mischief would have been done; but spring corn was sown in such a wealth of fine moulds, that it was able to endure drought with uncommon impunity. Still, rain came only just in the nick of time to prevent the destruction of the fairest promises, and on the lightest soils it came scarcely soon enough. But since the middle of June, we have had an alternation of rain and sunshine that has rapidly increased the growth of straw and the maturing of the ears, so that at the present moment the prospects of a good general harvest are better than they were at any earlier period of the year.

The wheat crop, as a whole, is rather thin on the ground, especially that planted in the autumn and winter, which did not come up well, on account of the excessively wet weather of the winter. The plants tillered well during the dry spring and early summer, and seemed to cover the ground fairly; but when they ran up into stem, ugly gaps became once more visible, and the severity of the drought above referred to prevented them from bulking-out to the full extent, though it kept them healthy and stiffened the straw. An unusually large area of spring wheat was sown, to make up partially for the short acreage of the winter sorts, and this has done remarkably well in most districts. Since the showery weather set in, all the wheats have improved in appearance; and if there are few very stout pieces, there are fewer still that are very light, and scarcely any failures. The ears are of good average size, and look like being well filled, so that probably the crop will yield abundantly in proportion to straw. In short, the wheat crop as a rule is what may be termed a fair one, and may come up to an average, if the weather should remain favourable up to and through harvest. It is in hot and rather dry seasons that we get the best crops of wheat, as such weather suits the prevailing heavy soils of this country, on which the bulk of the wheat is grown. Although there will not be an average growth of straw, then, it is not unreasonable to expect an average, or nearly an average, yield of grain, of more than ordinary quality.

Spring corn and pulse have had fewer trials than the wheat crop, and they promise to produce abundantly. Barley and oats almost everywhere look well, except on some of the lightest of soils and poor and wet clays. Beans, though very short before the rain came, blossomed abundantly, and have lately grown with great rapidity; while peas are generally strong and healthy. The root crops, which were seriously endangered by the drought, have now fully recovered, being for the most part thick enough, and full of vigorous growth. Potatoes are luxuriant, the only fear about them being that they will grow too much to top, and get diseased, if we have much more rain. As for hops, the gardens of Kent, Surrey, Sussex, and Worcestershire are a sight to see. They have never looked better, and it is many years since they have presented so splendid an appearance. Hop-growing is the most risky of all the departments of farming, and until the hops are actually matured, it is impossible to feel confident of a good crop. Present appearances, however, point to such a large return as will go far to indemnify growers for their recent heavy losses. As there are scarcely any old hops in the world, prices cannot be low this year.

The early hay crop was a very light one on the pastures, though clovers yielded a fair cut. The frequent rains have rendered haymaking precarious; but there has been so much sunshine between the showers that very little hay has been badly injured. Late pastures now promise to produce an abundant crop. The fruit crops vary greatly. Every one knows that strawberries are abundant, and English cherries rather scarce. Apples will be the great crop of the season, the trees being better covered than they have been for several years. Pears are rather scarce in most orchards, though fairly plentiful in others. Currants are about up to average in produce, while gooseberries have been less abundant than usual. Stone fruit is a failure, as the trees appear not to have recovered from the destructive effects of the wind-frost of last year's spring.

On the Continent of Europe, as a whole, crop prospects are similar to our own, and a fair general Harvest is now fully expected. In the United States, the winter-wheat crop is not up to the mark, although the July official Report denotes a slight improvement. Spring wheat is better, but the acreage of that variety is small in comparison, so that a much smaller wheat production than that of last year is now certain. The area, too, is diminished, the estimate being that there are half-a-million acres less than the area of last year's crop. It seems to have been generally assumed that the acreage devoted to wheat-growing in the United States was a continuously-increasing quantity. That, however, is quite an error, as the June Report of the Washington Department of Agriculture shows. The area under wheat was 35,430,333 acres in 1879, 37,986,717 acres in 1880, 37,709,020 acres in 1881, and 36,067,194 in 1882. This year it is estimated that the area under winter wheat is a million acres short of last year's area, while there is an excess of about half a million acres of spring wheat, the net result being half a million acres short of last year's crop, as above intimated. The reason of this decrease is, no doubt, the low price of wheat which has prevailed during the last few years. In the Eastern and Middle States, farmers find that they cannot compete with the western and north-western farmers in wheat-growing, and it is the same in some of the old-settled districts of Canada. The time has not come for a close estimate of the American wheat surplus; but it will certainly be much smaller than that of last year. There is no reason, however, to fear any inconvenient rise in the price of wheat, as our supplies from India are now very large, while Russia has almost reached her old position as a source of wheat supply for us. For the sake of the farmer, as well as consumer, it is to be hoped that the prices of English wheat will not be depreciated, as they have been during the last two seasons, by means of wet weather at harvest-time. It would, indeed, be a sad disappointment, if anything should occur to spoil one of the brightest prospects of a golden harvest that has been presented to us for many years.

THE VERDICT ON THE CHANNEL TUNNEL.

THE decision of the Channel Tunnel Committee is more satisfactory than it may appear, when the numbers on each side are first looked at. That the scheme should be rejected by only a majority of two votes in a Committee of ten will, of course, be alleged to show that, on the propriety of joining England to France by a Tunnel the opinions of competent authorities are pretty fairly balanced, and in ordinary cases this would certainly be a reason for allowing the experiment to be tried. The commercial victories of England would never have been won, if Englishmen had entered upon no new enterprise until its success had been placed apparently beyond all doubt. But the contention of the opponents of the Channel Tunnel has all along been that this is not an ordinary case. The risks and the gains are not in pari materia; consequently, they cannot properly be weighed against one another. A man may play high, and yet not be willing to stake the home in which his family has lived for centuries; he may have a taste for hazardous speculations, and yet stop short of the point at which failure means the loss of honour, as well as of fortune. The risks of the Channel Tunnel are precisely of this exceptional character. They may be as small as you please, but they are of a kind which ought not to be provoked, no matter what may be the force of the considerations on the other side. Unfortunately, this distinction was not made plain enough in the reference under which the Joint Committee was appointed. They were instructed to investigate the whole subject, and the result was that a great part of their labours dealt with questions which ought to have been treated as beside the mark at that stage of the inquiry. The advocates of the scheme have thus been enabled to obscure the real character of the controversy. They have met objections founded on the loss of military security by arguments drawn from the increase of international trade, and with four members of the Committee this ruse has been successful. By rights, its employment ought to have been made impossible beforehand.

Englishmen do not want a Committee of both Houses to tell them that the nation's life is more precious than the nation's pocket. What they want is to be assured as to the validity of the plea that the opening of a tunnel beneath the Straits of Dover would involve no danger to the nation's life. To our minds, this point had long ago been settled. The evidence of the military experts who had been examined before the Committee which had already gone into the question seemed to us conclusive. Indeed, the matter in dispute was so simple, that it hardly wanted the evidence of a military expert to determine it. It was possible, however, that there might be some to whom the military objection might not seem to settle the matter, unless they knew that it had approved itself to civilians as well as to soldiers; and on this ground we welcomed the appointment of the Joint Committee. But as soon as they began to take evidence, it was plain that the inquiry was going on wrong lines. The Military question ought to have been disposed of before any witnesses were called to speak to the Commercial question. If a majority of the Committee had reported that the military objection was purely imaginary, then would have been the time to consider what the Tunnel would do for Trade. As it was, Englishmen seemed to be asking one another at what price they would consent to sell their skins. They were brought down to the level of the Chinaman who will suffer death in your stead, if you only pay him highly enough. It is under the influence probably of this error, that the minority of the Committee have arrived at their conclusion in favour of the Tunnel. They have weighed the commercial gain against the military loss, and they have decided that while the military loss is uncertain, the commercial gain is assured. For argument's sake, we are quite ready to make them this concession. We will give the go-by to every objection founded on merely material difficulties, and admit that the business value of the Tunnel is in all respects as great as some highly-competent authorities have reckoned it. But when all this has been done, we are as far as ever from an agreement with the minority of the Committee. We come back to the objection with which we started. The risks and the gains are not in pari materia. We are asked to set the certainty of great riches for nine years against the chance of invasion in the tenth, and the answer is that no conceivable increase of wealth, whether it went on for nine years or for ninety-nine, would be worth weighing against even a small diminution of the unique security against invasion which we at present enjoy.

The mischief of too wide an order of reference has been shown in another way. The majority of the Committee—six members out of ten—have agreed that the scheme ought not to be proceeded with. But they have agreed in nothing else. When they came to assign reasons for their belief, they found that they had to make separate reports, because not one of them could entirely accept the reasonings which had brought the others to the same conclusion. It is the intrusion, no doubt, of the commercial element into the controversy that has had this effect. All the six reports, when they are presented, will be found, we imagine, to recognise the force of the military objection, but some of them will be disposed to lay most stress on the commercial objection. It is always tempting to fight an enemy on his own ground, and a member of the Committee who felt sure that he could demolish the financial calculations of the promoters, and prove that the project was lacking in the first element of commercial promise, would naturally be inclined to lay most stress on this view of the case. He would be wrong in so doing, because he would be exchanging a position which is impregnable for a position which at best is only a strong one. But we understand the force of the temptation, and so regret all the more that it should ever have been offered. It now rests with Ministers to put the crooked straight, by taking up next Session an attitude of unmistakeable hostility to the Tunnel. They have got the leverage they wanted as against the French Government, in the Report of a Committee of both Houses condemning the project, and they have only to use this leverage properly, to put an end to the plan for good and all. Even if only a minority of the Joint Committee had reported against the Tunnel, we should have said that in a matter which on one theory involves so serious a blow to the national security, and by consequence so serious a diminution in our tranquillity at home and our credit abroad, no further steps should be taken, unless public opinion was virtually unanimous in rejecting that theory as unfounded. Fortunately, however, the majority is the other way, and it only wants a little plainness of speech on the part of the Government to dismiss the Channel Tunnel to the oblivion which must always be its portion among rational Englishmen.

DR. MAUDSLEY ON PERSONAL AND SOCIAL DEGENERATION.

THE Materialists are very confident that they base themselves on facts, while they charge the believers in spirit in basing themselves on mere dreams. We are far from denying that they base themselves on facts; on the contrary, we cordially admit that they do so, and on facts which it is often most wholesome for those who hold with us to be forced to take to heart, and not allow themselves to forget. But what we maintain, on the other hand, is, first, that they select their principal facts most arbitrarily; and then, that they often invent other facts in harmony with them, which are pure fancies, even when they are not positive fictions. Thus in the able and dogmatic book on "Body and Will" which Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co. have just published for Dr. Maudsley, that vigorous physician, after arguing that life results from the evolution of solar heat, and that that source of life must eventually dwindle, draws a most powerful and hideous picture of the mode in which the gradual dwindling of vitality will show itself in the race,—a picture which gathers all its force from his minute and elaborate study of the phenomena of mental disease. He knows all about the process. "Once the dissolution of things has got full start and way, it will be vastly quicker than the evolution has been; for the degenerate products of social disintegration will not fail, like morbid elements in the physiological organism, or like the poisonous products of its own putrefaction, to act as powerful disintegrants, and to hasten by their anti-social energies the downward course. Not that humanity will retrograde quickly through the exact stages of its former slow and tedious progress, as every child now grows quickly forward through them; it will not, in fact, reproduce savages with the simple mental qualities of children, but new and degenerate varieties, with special repulsive characters,—savages of a decomposing civilisation, as we might call them,—who will be ten times more vicious and noxious, and infinitely less capable of improvement, than the savages of a primitive barbarism; social disintegrants of the worst kind, because bred of the corruption of the best organic developments, with natures and properties virulently anti-social." And Dr. Maudsley goes on to illustrate this by descending on the modern evidence of the degeneration of sound sentiment into what he calls egoistic hyperæsthesia,— "howling displays of self-consciousness that are shown now-a-days with respect to the event and the circumstances of death." This "modern incontinence of emotion" Dr. Maudsley contrasts with "the calm, chaste, and manly simplicity of Homer, as we observe it, for example, in his description of the death of Achilles." As we had never heard that Homer had described the death of Achilles, though he gives us a picture of the dissatisfaction of Achilles with the world of Shades, we turned to Dr. Maudsley's quotation with interest, and found in it one of a series of very beautiful modern poems by the Rev. O. Ogle, one indeed which appeared in these columns nearly two years ago, the only fault of which, if it has a fault, is that, like other poems of the same series, it puts modern states of feeling into the mouth of an antique hero. In truth, Homer, when he deals with such subjects, actually does describe an "incontinence of emotion," as Dr. Maudsley would call it, far in advance of the modern sentiment which Dr. Maudsley condemns. Hector himself entreats Achilles to spare his corpse the last indignities in language which a modern warrior would not deign to use; while the wailing which is raised for Hector is wailing such as Dr. Maudsley would denounce, in the most elaborate medical terms, as the hyperæsthesia of sentimentality. Dr. Maudsley has fallen into a very curious pit of his own digging, in his eagerness to show that the disintegration of what he regards as the purely composite personality of man has already commenced in modern society, and that we may even now see the beginning of the end. He has paid a very high compliment to Mr. Ogle, by gravely mistaking him for Homer; and has imagined for himself in the early world a calm which is much commoner now, while he has attributed to the modern world transports of grief more characteristic of the childhood of society than of the present day.

This blunder of Dr. Maudsley's is, of course, only a blunder in the selection of an illustration. But it is, we think, itself an illustration of the fixed prepossessions and prejudices under which he writes. It is not easy to turn a page of his vigorous book without finding an assumption of the most questionable and absolutely unverifiable kind treated with respect, if it happens to be in keeping with his own materialistic convictions; while all assumptions resting on the opposite view, though there may be really a good deal more to be said for them, are treated with profound contempt. For example, in one place we find Dr. Maudsley suggesting that the sudden change sometimes observable from profound depression to cheerfulness in patients with unhealthy brains, may, perhaps, be due to the sudden removal of some "polar displacement" in the "cerebral molecules." He tells us honestly enough that this supposition is wholly "fanciful," but he goes on to argue for it all the same, as "according with the singularly sudden and complete way in which the whole trouble" [of a melancholic patient] "vanishes sometimes,"

—which is only another way of saying that as you have a sudden effect you ought to discover a sudden cause, and that the sudden removal of a polar displacement might be such a cause. Yes, and so might the sudden removal of a malign spiritual influence. Dr. Maudsley is extremely contemptuous in speaking of such a hypothetical cause as that, and no one will say that it is a scientific one. But is it not just as scientific as the suggestion of a polar displacement of which we know nothing, by causes of which we know nothing, and affecting cerebral molecules of which we know nothing? We do know what a malign spiritual influence means, most of us having had experience of it. But of the polar displacement of cerebral molecules we have had no experience, and if we had, that would be no true cause of the phenomenon, unless we could find out what caused the "polar displacement," and what caused its cessation.

It is the same with the whole theory of social degeneration. Even granting Dr. Maudsley his solar hypothesis as to the true fountain of vitality, he assumes that the necessary result of diminishing vitality will be such a morbid degeneration of the human will, as he has been accustomed to observe in the case of mental disease. But since we have in the case of every aged person the unquestionable phenomena proper to a dwindling stock of physical vitality, if Dr. Maudsley's theory were true that "in the will is contained character,—not character of mind only, as commonly understood, but the character of every organ of the body the consentient functions of which enter into the full expression of individuality,"—we ought to find the signs of degenerating will in every aged person, no less than in a society fed by insufficient solar heat; and we ought to find these phenomena abundant in exact proportion to the decay of these physical powers. And as we understand him, Dr. Maudsley asserts that that is so, for we find him dilating thus on old age:—

"Among these effects [the effects of old age] are the extinction of the ideal in a contracted egoism; an almost entire absorption in the present and its pursuits, or at any rate, a very small regard to the future, especially that great future which is so near at hand; a life in sensations and habits; obtuse or cynical indifference to the opinion of contemporaries or of posterity, if the natural vanity of a vain character has not grown to excess in the decaying soil of senility; oftentimes an intensely persistent grasp of what was possessed, and an obstinate desire to be what he has been, attesting the self-conservative struggle of failing vitality to hold that which threatens to slip from it; decay of all enthusiasms and of the finer moral sensibilities; incapacity to feel real sympathy with the joys and sorrows of others, or, indeed, to feel deeply any sorrow; overmuch deliberation in endless repetitions, without executive energy to resolve and accomplish; no expansive desire or hope to propagate an esteemed name amongst living kind or through the ages, the desire, if any, being a joyless habit."

We can only say that if that is Dr. Maudsley's general estimate of old age—old age studied, not in lunatic asylums, but in the quiet homes of those whose working lives have been noble and pure—Dr. Maudsley has not eyes to see, and cannot be taken seriously as a psychologist at all, so full is he of the psychological prepossessions which he has derived from the study of mental disease. Nor, indeed, is he in this sketch of old age quite consistent with himself, for how can he reconcile the "intensely persistent grasp" of what was possessed which he attributes to old age,—and rightly enough to the old age of selfishness, most absurdly to the old age of generosity,—with the absence of all "executive energy to resolve and accomplish" which he also attributes to it? A "persistent grasp" implies a strong resolve to retain, so that resolution in some shape is here attributed to old age and denied to it almost in the same breath.

But Dr. Maudsley's main drift in all this bitter criticism of old age, is to prove that in relation to the social degeneration which he predicts, "the disintegrating process may be expected to take effect first on the highest products of evolution," and we understand this picture to be an attempt to show that in individuals at least the disintegrating process does begin in the highest functions of the mind. We maintain, on the contrary, that just the reverse is true,—that where once the conscience and disinterested affections are enthroned and steadily served through life, the law is that they continue in command to the very last—long after the sensations and even the mere sensibilities are decayed—and attest the falsehood of the theory that the personality is a mere compound of the various functions of the body and brain. We do not complain of Dr. Maudsley for holding this, though we do not know what it means, or how any amount of composition of different parts could ever give rise to an ego at all. But we do complain of him for ignoring so many of the facts which go against his theory, and for giving us this strange travesty of old age as the prelude to his speculation that a similar degeneration may be expected in man himself, so soon as the stock of vitality poured down upon the earth shall run low. What old age, in its normal form, appears to us to prove is that while sensibility dwindles, the guiding aims of life—whether these be high or low—deepen, and discriminate the true self in clearer and clearer lines. It is simply not true that the disintegrating process begins in the higher centres of life; and the assertion that it is so, is justified only by the phenomena of disease, not by the phenomena of normal decay. It is as little true, indeed, as it is that the modern poet who has painted for us the calm of Achilles in death, was justified in doing so by any historical evidence that Homer's generation lamented less over such tragedies than our own. So far as we can judge, even if the physical degeneration of the earth under the loss of solar heat be as sure as some astronomers regard it, and as Dr. Maudsley seems to believe, the last and austere portion of man's career on the planet would probably elicit at once the highest order of virtues and the most odious vices, and present greater characters, contending with their fullest strength against a worse class of antagonists, than any previous epoch. The degeneration would not begin at the highest point, but leave the highest point visible to the last.

THE DIFFICULTIES OF INVISIBILITY.

TWO years ago, when writing of the murder of Mr. Gold, the retired baker, by Lefroy, we discussed some of the difficulties of suddenly becoming invisible. They are very great when the person accused is seriously sought by the police, and when he is accused of an offence, such as a murder dangerous to society, or a great forgery, which foreign States are heartily willing to assist in punishing. We suggested then that the only place where a man like Lefroy, without much money, and aware that the police were in earnest, would attempt to hide himself, was a quiet neighbourhood in London, say Stratford, where no one is watched, where all houses and people seem alike, and where the majority of the population is much too hard-worked to be inquisitive. This suggestion turned out to be almost exactly correct, Lefroy having walked to Stepney, taken lodgings at the house of a decent widow, professed himself an engraver, and become as lost to the police as if he had descended into the earth. They had not an idea of his whereabouts. But that he needed money, and wrote to a friend for it, he would never have been captured, and in a month or two might have gone away quietly to the United States or an Australian colony, where he would never have been recognised. The "difficulties of invisibility" in the way of James Carey, the Irish informer, are much greater, and seem for a time fairly to have perplexed the authorities in Dublin, who, however, aware as they are of the feeling in Ireland itself and of the strength of the Secret Societies, may possibly exaggerate them. The regular course with such a man, to employ him in the prisons, seems not to have been open, probably from some reluctance on the part of Carey himself; while the pursuit would, for some time at least, be keener than that for almost any criminal. It is not, of course, true that Carey is in danger from any Irishman he meets, for the number of Irishmen who would attack him merely out of hatred for his conduct, and so bring themselves within the grasp of the criminal law, is probably small. But there can be little doubt that the Irish Secret Societies would make a great effort to secure vengeance on Carey, that foreign Secret Societies would sympathise with and help them, and that vast numbers of Irishmen, probably a large majority, would very willingly make known his whereabouts to his enemies. The man is not exactly hunted by a race, but he is so disliked by a race that they would rather the dogs found him than not; and that is a serious position. The Government were not, of course, bound to protect him all his life; but they were bound to give him a fair start, and the difficulty was to find a place where he would not instantly be attacked. We rather think, in spite of a wide-spread belief in Dublin to the contrary, that the conditions of the problem precluded the choice of London as a refuge. London, at first sight, seems able to swallow up anybody; it is not a distinctively Irish city; and the police, of course, would baffle rather than assist any inquirers. Still, London would be a dangerous place for Carey, in spite of his immovable nerve. His face is as well known as the Queen's, and is a most difficult one to disguise; his tongue would at once proclaim him Irish; the Irish are about everywhere, though not as numerous as in Liverpool or Glasgow; and there is no class of the population which, if suspicion were once aroused, would endure him quietly in their midst. The anti-informer feeling is not strong here, but Carey's evidence showed him a person who would be avoided, watched, and talked of in a way which would point him out; and once pointed out, he would be an immediate mark for his pursuers, who in London would be both numerous and deadly. He could not be safe even in Stepney, more especially if his family were with him. A man, once convinced of danger, can keep up a disguise very sedulously, and his wife may be more secret than himself; but the children do not feel the necessity equally, and the fact of altered name is certain to ooze out. London, for such a man, would hardly be safer than an English country town, where the curiosity about strangers and the desire for any relief from the monotony of daily life make concealment nearly impossible. It would be necessary for a man so acutely disliked by a whole people, and that a people completely intermixed with the English, to leave England, and the problem would be to find the place where the hatred of Irishmen and of the Revolutionary Societies would be least to be dreaded.

No foreign city would do. The Englishman or Irishman wanting to disappear usually makes a mistake in going on the Continent. He is always visible, always separate, always an object of curiosity to his neighbours and the police. He is soon discovered to be a man who thinks himself hunted, and though if he assigns politics as a reason he may find friends, he will also find himself an object of special attention to the police, who in a case like Carey's have very little motive for secrecy. Once known or strongly suspected, he would be in as much danger in any European capital as in London, for the Invincibles would reach him just as easily, and the police would give him no special protection at all, except, perhaps, by "inviting" him to leave. Paris or Vienna would hide any native, but foreigners who seek those cities for refuge are generally detected, and though the police are not "after" Carey, the Revolutionists, who contrive to know a great deal, are. They would not, of course, easily find accomplices in assassinating, but they would find a good many ready to watch and to denounce him. Very desperate efforts to hide have been made in those cities by men who know them far better than Carey does, and have almost invariably failed. The Italian conspirators say their "traitors" never escape, if they stay in Europe; and though that is an exaggeration, there must be truth behind it, or the fear of breaking the bonds of Secret Societies would not be so intense as it notoriously is. There are not many Irish, it is true, in Stockholm or Copenhagen; but then also no Irishman could be lost in those capitals, and every stranger is a subject of observation. Carey, moreover, would want to live where men spoke English; and the Government, though it has been by no means lenient to him, giving him nothing save his pardon and insisting on obedience, would, we presume, pay some attention to his wishes as to a destination.

Where, then, would he be safe? America is clearly out of the question. Almost any one, however hunted, whom the people did not care about, might, we imagine, disappear in America into an impenetrable mist; but there are exceptions to that rule. The American police do find criminals when they choose, and we suspect that an Irishman "wanted" by the Irish community, who are everywhere within the Union, who all know each other, and who instantly recognise an Irishman, would find disappearance most difficult. He might succeed in hiding himself, but he might not; and if he did not, nothing could save him. The American Irish are more bitter than the English Irish against informers, they have larger resources, and they are accustomed to desperate methods of action against all whom they hate, and who are not protected by American feeling, which assuredly James Carey would not arouse. New York would be as unhealthy for Carey as Dublin, and San Francisco as Cork. So would be the Australian Colonies. They are full of Irish, who have paid keen attention to recent trials, who know Carey's face from photographs, and who, as in America, would recognise his tongue, and wonder why he did not seek their society. If any accident revealed his identity, he would be hunted, and would find as little sympathy or protection as in America. The safest place for Carey, in fact, is one where there is no mob ready or willing to act, where the Irish, if they exist, are of the better class, where the police is irresistibly strong, and where, therefore, if discovered, his only penalty would be avoidance. All these conditions exist in their completeness in the Indian cities, in Ceylon, and in the Mauritius, and exist there only. A European in Calcutta, or Bombay, or Colombo, not wanted by the police, and either willing to work or possessed, as Carey is supposed to be, of private means, could hardly be in personal danger from any one. The police would protect him, on application. Even if he were known to be living there, a pursuer would have the greatest difficulty in finding him, would have no sympathy from the population, and would be conscious that his own escape, if he attempted assassination, would be an enterprise of exceeding difficulty. No places are so difficult for Europeans to fly from as these cities. They are too visible in them, too much surrounded by native eyes, too much bound by a network of customary ways, any departure from which excites instant remark and suspicion. The total absence of a criminal class of Europeans hampers the fugitive, who, again, can be followed by the telegraph with the utmost ease and certainty, and can be arrested by the police at the port of arrival. In the Eastern cities, Carey would be as safe as the deadly hatred he has aroused will allow, and might betake himself easily enough to his proper trade, as a small builder and contractor. No one would watch him, unless he broke the local law, the community being entirely incurious; and for mob attacks, even if he were discovered, there are absolutely no materials. The natives would not care one straw what he had done, or why, and a collection of Europeans to hoot or assail him would only lead to a demonstration of the police, and, in fact, could hardly occur; while the Secret Societies would in six months lose all trace of him. They have agents in a good many places, but hardly in the Indian seaports, where Irishmen rarely live, and where Revolutionists are stifled by the apathetic atmosphere.

AN ANTI-CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

AMONG the minor events that have recently come to pass on the Continent, none, perhaps, is more significant than the election, a few Sundays ago, of a new Consistory of the Protestant Church of Geneva. Two sets of candidates were in the field, the Conservative, or mildly orthodox, and the Liberal-Radical, or wildly heterodox. The election was by universal suffrage,—every Swiss citizen who chooses to inscribe himself as a Protestant, though he may never have entered a church in his life, having the right to vote,—and it resulted in the return of every one of the so-called Liberal candidates, to whom was accorded all the support that the Government were able to command. But the Genevan Consistory, the successors of the Venerable Company of Pastors who in olden times were almost supreme in Church and State, is now little more than an ornamental body; and the importance of the election consists in the fact that it marks another stage in the decadence of Swiss Protestantism, and confirms the conclusion, which has long been patent to local observers, that the Protestant Rome has become the most Free-thinking of European cities, and the Church founded by Calvin the least Christian of Churches.

Since 1874, three consistories have been chosen; in the first, as in the last, the Free-thinkers were successful; and, having regard to the drift of public opinion, it is probable that their triumph is final. During the late struggle, the Orthodox party stigmatised their opponents as Materialists, and the Génévois, the semi-official organ of the Council of State, in an article published on the eve of the election, frankly accepted the imputation. "Most people," it said, "happily (fort heureusement) trouble themselves very little with what the Church calls the salvation of souls. The first thought of every man of well-balanced mind is to make the best of this world. Aspirations after the infinite are confined to delicate natures and exceptional organisations. The mass of ordinary mortals know nothing of these. Among the multitude, religious belief is fast disappearing. Faith has had its time."

The Génévois is the mouthpiece of M. Carteret, President of the Council of State, Member of the National Assembly, the apostle of authoritative Radicalism, and one of the most remarkable of contemporary Swiss statesmen. He led the Kulturkampf against the Church of Rome, established the Liberal Catholic Church in its stead, and abolished tests and creeds in the Church of Geneva. In the contest with Rome, M. Carteret has failed as signally as his great exemplar, Bismarck, with whom he is fond of comparing himself. The Catholic Church was persecuted more ruthlessly in Republican Geneva than in Monarchic Prussia. Priests were turned out of their presbyteries, congregations out of their churches, by main force; members of religious Orders, even Sisterhoods who devoted themselves exclusively to the solace of the sick, were expelled from the Canton, their houses closed, and their property confiscated. But there were 30,000 Catholic laymen, whom it was impossible either to extirpate or expel. Their own zeal, as well as the sympathy of their co-religionists over the border, was kindled by the injustice to which they were exposed; money poured in on them from every side, new churches were built, and the Catholics of Geneva are now more numerous and powerful than at any time since the Reformation. To complete their triumph, Monseigneur Mermillod, who was expelled from the Confederation for refusal to conform to the laws of the Canton, has been allowed to return, and for the first time since the people rose against their prelate-princes, and made Calvin their master, there is a Bishop of Geneva. Wherever he goes, crowds flock to hear him; and a few Sundays ago, at Lausanne, he attracted a greater audience than Sarah Bernhardt herself. As for the Liberal Catholic, now called the Christian Catholic Church, no failure could be more complete. The intolerant proceedings of the Government in its behalf alienated Catholics, without propitiating Protestants; any little vitality it once possessed departed with Père Hyacinthe; the churches are empty, the priests preach Sunday after Sunday to bare walls and vacant benches, and the Christian Catholic Church of Geneva could not survive for a day the withdrawal of subsidies of the State.

M. Carteret's reorganisation of the Protestant Establishment has borne more fruit than his disendowment of the Catholic Church. By a law adopted in 1874, creeds, tests, and the rite of ordination were abolished, and the sole qualification required for the office of pastor was declared to be the possession of a degree granted by the University of Geneva, or recognised by that body. The Consistory was deprived of all disciplinary functions, and the ordering of the services left to the discretion of the pastors, each of whom, in the words of the law, "is responsible for his preaching and teaching to himself alone." When the enactment containing those provisions was discussed in the Great Council, M. Carteret and his colleagues avowed that their object was the suppression of orthodoxy and the triumph of free thought, and as the law was subsequently sanctioned by the popular vote, there is no reason to suppose that they misrepresented the views of their fellow-citizens.

As pointed out at the time by James Fazy, both in the Fédéraliste Suisse and the Great Council, the reorganisation of the Church, though approved by the people, was in no sense a democratic measure. The pastors, it is true, are appointed by the suffrages of their flocks; but once appointed, they are amenable for their opinions to no authority whatever, and for their conduct to the State alone. While they hold their benefices theoretically for life, they may be deprived, without appeal, for any offence which it may please the Government to qualify as nonconformity to the law. As a matter of fact, there has been only one case of dismissal since the passing of the law, but the power exists, and is likely to prove as fatal to independence of character as other provisions of the enactment are proving to be the interests of religion; for the result of throwing open the pastorate to all comers has been everything that James Fazy predicted, and probably more than M. Carteret expected. The older ministers still preserve some remnants of orthodoxy, but nearly every minister elected since 1874 is either an avowed agnostic or a declared opponent of Christianity. The Church is a chaos of doctrines; there are as many opinions as parishes; the old and the new pastors have nothing in common, not even a belief in God. The presence of a few orthodox ministers, instead of leavening the mass, serves only to intensify the evil. The city churches are supplied by a succession of ministers, some of whom preach a diluted Gospel, while others denounce all religion as superstition. That which one man builds up, another pulls down. The consequence is, that people are sinking into a condition of cynical indifferentism. They not only believe that there is no truth in religion; they doubt if there be truth in anything; look upon belief as the mark of an inferior understanding, and regard "religious manifestations" with as much horror as that with which their Puritan ancestors regarded the sacrifice of the Mass. A short time ago, a few enthusiasts, who ventured to tell them, in bad French, that they had souls to be saved, were expelled by the Government, after being stoned by the mob. Geneva prides itself on being a maker of ideas and the "head-piece" of the Confederation, and if we may judge by the gradual transformation of Swiss Protestantism into pure Rationalism (the Church of Basel has abolished baptism), and the recent displays of irreligious intolerance in various parts of Switzerland, the claim is not unfounded.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

"MR. FREEMAN ON THE AMERICAN."

SIR,—It is the custom in most quarters that an author should not review his reviewers. And in most quarters, it is a good custom. But in the columns of the Spectator the custom is different, and that is, doubtless, a good custom also. I, therefore, take advantage of local usage to say something about the review in your last number of my little book called "Some Impressions of the United States."

Your critic says that "his disagreement with me is no mere formal one, it results from a difference of stand-point." That sounds a little hard to a plain man. I will therefore not enlarge on any points which can be looked on as matters of opinion; nor will I stop to point out at length that the critic has made no attempt to give any account of the general contents of the book. I will keep myself wholly to those parts of his notice where he makes me say things which I certainly have not said, and where he makes me leave unsaid things which I certainly have said. First of all, the critic says:—

"Mr. Freeman remarks that the Americans now speak of 'Englishmen,' where they formerly spoke of 'Britisher,' and he seems to draw hope from the disuse of the contemptuous epithet that the Americans may yet come to call themselves Englishmen. This is one instance of how Mr. Freeman reads facts which must, we think, be differently interpreted."

What I really say (p. 27) is:—

"It is yet more to be noticed that throughout the contemporary records of the War of Independence, not only, as far as I have seen, is the word 'English' never contrasted with 'American,' but the name 'English' is never applied to the enemies against whom Washington and his fellows were striving. The word which is commonly used—which, as far as I have seen, is invariably used—is 'British.' This is just as it should be; the distinction between 'American' and 'British' marks the political and geographical severance between the English in Britain and the English in America, without shutting out either from their common right to the English name. . . . The American no longer familiarly uses the word 'British' to denote the English of Britain. As long as he did so, his language was at least patient of the interpretation that he still looked on himself as an Englishman. He now habitually uses the words 'English,' 'Englishman,' in every possible relation, to denote the English of Britain, as distinguished from himself. That is, he gives up the English name as no longer belonging to him. Even if the change was made out of friendliness, I cannot look on it as a change for the better."

Here is nothing about "Britisher." I go on to say (p. 29):—

"It was acutely remarked to me by an American friend that it would be easy to use the adjective 'British,' according to the older usage, which I have said that I wished to see restored, but that a substantive was lacking. This is perfectly true. The only available substantive, 'Briton,' will not do. . . . Yet the only alternative would seem to be the grotesque and rather ugly form, 'Britisher.' And I always told my American friends that I had rather be called a Britisher than an Englishman, if by calling me an Englishman they meant to imply that they were not Englishmen themselves."

It seems to me that I have here said the exact opposite to what the reviewer makes me say. If so, it is useless to discuss his elaborate comment on what he imagines me to have said. Only, at one point of the comment, he stops to make a very strange remark:—

"With the triumph of the North, the American may be said to have reached manhood; that is, just at the time when he first began to use the word 'national,' instead of 'Federal,' which usage Mr. Freeman is content to condemn as 'often inexact,' without trying to explain its origin."

In the pages in which I treat of this change of language (113-114), I cannot see the words "often inexact," which the reviewer puts into my mouth, and I certainly do attempt in those two pages, and in a good deal that goes before, to explain the origin of the change. A little way on the reviewer says:—

"Mr. Freeman remarks that 'the American "Justice of the Peace" holds a position very inferior to the position of his English brother,' and adds, 'so does the American sheriff.' This he explains by the fact that 'the one is a paid and the other an unpaid functionary.' Now, this fact, brought forward as an explanation, is a mere consequence of the form of society, and in itself explains nothing."

The word "functionary," though put in inverted commas, is not in my book, and any one who turns to p. 99 of my book will see that I by no means speak of the difference between paid and unpaid as the only difference. The next thing is the oddest of all:—

"Had Mr. Freeman remembered that America was a democracy, he would not have been surprised, as he was, on finding that the murder of President Garfield was treated not as the murder of a President, but as the murder 'simply of one James Abram Garfield.' The italics are ours."

Now I must confess that I am filled with yearning to set eyes on the man who thinks that I am likely to forget that the United States or any other democracy is a democracy. But will the reviewer be surprised to hear that I express no surprise as to the language of the indictment? I simply say (p. 96):—

"The indictment, it may be remarked, did not specify the murder of a President as differing at all from the murder of another man. The slain man was simply 'one James Abram Garfield, being in the peace of God and of the United States.'"

The fact is surely worth marking. I should be a little surprised if I lighted on Ἀπαρτίς τις, in an Achaian inscription, and I cannot help fancying that a Landammann of Uri might be spoken of a little differently.

The reviewer, again, in one place at least, treats as my own sayings, and comments on elaborately in that character, sayings which I distinctly say that I heard from other people:—

"The hire of hackney-carriages is in America very costly, for similar reasons. But no such considerations occur to Mr. Freeman, and his explanation of this latter fact is so characteristic as to be amusing. Inasmuch as in the Eastern States Irishmen are generally the drivers, he couples Paddy with the 'unreasonable cost,' and asks, with some heat,—'Why should transplanted Englishmen, or transplanted Dutchmen either, bow down their necks to this Irish bondage?' Now, one might hint that in the Western States the drivers are Americans, and the cost of hiring still more unreasonable, but nothing would lessen Mr. Freeman's dislike of all things Irish."

My real saying (p. 228) is,—

"At New York, I was told that the Irish were at the bottom of this also, as of most other things which either natives or strangers complain of. But why should transplanted Englishmen, or transplanted Dutchmen either, bow down their necks to this Irish bondage?"

It is quite possible that this explanation may have been "characteristic" of the New York gentleman who gave it to me; but the reviewer's amusement over it as characteristic of me is quite out of place. Moreover, I cannot find in my book that "dislike of all things Irish" which, it seems, is to be seen from the reviewer's stand-point. Surely, Home-rule comes among "things Irish," and in pp. 138-139 I speak out pretty plainly for that. But it is an undoubted fact that I was told, whether truly or falsely, that no attempt was made to make the New York cab-fares more reasonable, because the drivers were Irish, and because to meddle with the Irish vote would be dangerous.

It must, again, be this rather awkward stand-point of his from which the reviewer sees in my book, what I cannot see, a general "contempt for American scholarship." I certainly have marked the absence of scholarship in some quarters where I might have looked for it; but I surely do full justice to it where it is found. I must beg the reviewer to read pp. 183, 186, 194-198. As for "limitless expanse," "fabled springs," and the like, those are not matters of fact. There are some things which one does not "presume to understand."—I am, Sir, &c., EDWARD A. FREEMAN.

[The reviewer of Mr. Freeman's book accepts the corrections which Mr. Freeman makes as regards the two first passages, and regrets that he misconceived Mr. Freeman's meaning. The enclosing of the word functionary in inverted commas was a lapsus calami. As regards the fourth passage, he is not surprised that Mr. Freeman, no doubt unwittingly, concedes the point at issue. In the fifth excerpt from his criticism the question to which attention is drawn was, the critic still believes, asked by Mr. Freeman himself. As to Mr. Freeman's "dislike of all things Irish," the critic begs to refer Mr. Freeman to pp. 137-141, inclusively, where such expressions occur as "the Irish element is, in the English lands on both sides of the ocean, a mischievous element." . . . "It is the worst, and perhaps the strongest, of the causes which help to give a bad name to American politics," "the baleful nature of Irish influence," &c. Further, the critic maintains that as no attempt is made in any one of a hundred American cities which might be named to make cab-fares reasonable, it cannot reasonably be alleged that the reason why no such attempt is made in New York, is that the drivers are generally Irish. As regards Mr. Freeman's "contempt for American scholarship," the critic bases his statement on what is said on pp. 182, 184, 185; but, it must be remembered, that in his criticism he says that he does "not altogether disagree with his [Mr. Freeman's] estimate of American scholars."—Ed. Spectator.]

INDIAN AGRICULTURE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The writer of the notice (in your last issue) of Lieutenant Pogson's "Agriculture for India" may not be aware that there are one or more institutions in India for teaching agriculture, and that measures are being devised for extending the knowledge to the peasants. For ten years or more there has been a Government Model Farm in Madras, with a European staff, presided over by Mr. Robertson, a graduate, I believe, of the Agricultural College at Cirencester; an agricultural school has been more recently added to this farm, and students from other parts of India, as well as the Madras Presidency, avail themselves of it. These students will probably find employment under Zemindars, and teach, practically, the peasants working under them. In the beginning of last year I witnessed at the farm a trial, open to the public, of European, American, and Indian ploughs, which the Governor encouraged with his presence; many of the ploughs were handled by the students. I think it was intended to start institutions similar to the Madras one in Bombay and Bengal. I know that Mr. Robertson and his assistant, Mr. Benson, were deputed to several districts in Southern India, to go over the country, inspect the modes of cultivation, and suggest what appeared to be required, and that they have made most useful reports. I think that there has been an awakening of interest in some Zemindars. The Indian Government have thus made what appears a good beginning in improving the agriculture of the country, which will, it is hoped, be extended, as they see their way further.—I am, Sir, &c.,

BOOKS.

THE GOLDEN CHERSONESE.*

"THE Golden Chersonese" is Miltonic for the Malay Peninsula, a region of whose interior we practically know not much more than was known when it received that poetical name, for more than half of its extent is unexplored. The very appellation we know it by is not an accurate indication of its condition, for though the area of the mainland is conjectured to be the same as that of Britain, the extent occupied by the Malays is about only half the size of Java. So enterprising a traveller as Miss Bird—if Mrs. Bishop will pardon us for still calling her so—with so marked a talent for description, could not fail to make a book of travel in this gorgeous tropical country instructive and interesting; but her letters on the Golden Chersonese do not form her best, or even her second-best book. We miss the spontaneousness of her works on the Rocky Mountains and Japan, and there is occasionally something exacting, fussy, and not quite good-humoured, in her tone in the present instance, suggestive of her being a little "spoilt," and taking the attentions of everybody all round, with the command of the utmost resources of "Government House" everywhere, too much for granted. These are the blemishes of the book, which abounds in merits, and is, after the author arrives at the Stadthaus, Malacca, then the residence of the late Lieutenant-Governor, Captain Shaw, very novel and interesting. With the letters which deal with Hong Kong, Canton, Saigon, and Singapore, the reader could readily dispense; there is nothing in them—not even the horrid description of the prisons and the execution-ground in Canton—that he has not read many times. M. de Beauvoir's travels in the same region are far more vivid and picturesque; indeed, Miss Bird fails this time to convey the stir and the strangeness of the scenes through which she passed. At Malacca she recovers her former ease and freshness, and her description of the delicious climate and the dreamy life there is fascinating:—

"Trees, trailers, fruits, smother the houses, and blossom and fruit all the year round; old leaves, young leaves, bud, blossom, and fruit all appearing at once. The mercury rarely falls below 79°, or rises above 84°. The softest and least perceptible of land and sea breezes blow alternately at stated hours. The nights are very still. The days are a tepid dream. Since I arrived, not a leaf has stirred, not a bird has sung, the tides ebb and flow in listless and soundless ripples. Far off, on the shallow sea, phantom ships hover and are gone, and on an indefinite horizon a blurred ocean blends with a blurred sky. On Mount Ophir, heavy cloud-masses lie always motionless. The still, heavy, fragrant nights pass with no other sounds than the aggressive hum of mosquitoes, and the challenge of the sentries. Nature is always busy in producing a rapidity and profusion of growth which would turn Malacca into a jungle, were it not for axe and billhook, but her work does not jar upon the general silence."

* The Golden Chersonese, and the Way Thither. By Isabella L. Bird (Mrs. Bishop). London: John Murray.

The author was deeply impressed by the indefiniteness, dreaminess, featurelessness, indolence, and silence of Malacca, and much surprised to find that it is to most intents and purposes a Chinese city. The Dutch have scarcely left a trace there, the Portuguese are a stagnant population hardly to be taken into account; the English, except so far as relates to the administration of government, are nowhere; the Yellow Man has absorbed the trade of the colony; there is not a resident British merchant in Malacca. The Chinese settle there; they do not merely make fortunes and return to the Flowery Land. They love Malacca, and take a pride in beautifying the place. They have fashioned their dwellings upon the model of those in Canton, but they do not conceal their wealth, as the rich Chinaman does at home; they glory in displaying it, under the security of British rule. They have fabulous riches in diamonds, pearls, sapphires, rubies, and emeralds. They have introduced gambling and opium-smoking into Malacca, and, notwithstanding that slavery is prohibited, and slaves from the neighbouring States fly to the shelter of the British flag, Miss Bird asserts that "there is reason to suppose that the numerous women in the households of the Chinese merchants are persons who have been purchased in China, and are actually held in bondage." The description of the forest drives, through miles of gigantic palms and pine-apple trees, and worlds of ferns and orchids, is fairly tantalising. It is almost pleasant, when the reader is roused to irresistible envy, to learn that "the mosquitoes are awful." It seems to be very easy to overlook the Malays in their own peninsula; they are so much fewer, poorer, and less important than the Chinese. The Malays shun the town, and prefer a free life in the jungles, or on the mysterious rivers among the mangrove swamps. These kampongs, or small raised villages in the forest, are in perpetual twilight; the houses stand on a platform, and have a "gridiron" floor, which is doubly convenient, as it ensures ventilation, and all debris can be thrown through it, to be consumed in the nightly fire by which the mosquitoes are smoked away. An odd member of the Malay domestic circle is a baboon, trained to climb the cocoa palms and throw down the nuts. The Malays in Malacca are remarkable for the taste and richness of their dress, and the profusion of jewels which they wear. They are, according to Captain Shaw—who liked them, and whom they liked—chaste, gentle, honest, hospitable people, but given to telling falsehoods, and of "honour" so sensitive that blood alone can wipe out some insults to it. They are firm, even fanatical Mohammedans, and the pilgrimage to Mecca is the great object of their ambition. The Malacca chapters are charming, with their wild-beast and thunderstorm stories, with their descriptions, which are like bits out of the Arabian Nights, of jewel-laden visitors to the Government Bungalow, gorgeous flower and colour glimpses, and pictorial history of the marriage of a Princess who might be Balroulboudoor herself; but Miss Bird does not linger long. She wants to get on to Sungei Ujong, a little State she (and we) had never previously heard of, and she starts, in a little steam launch, accompanied by Captain Shaw's daughters, under the protection of Mr. Hayward, the Superintendent of Police. A "runner" is sent on to prepare the Resident (the late Captain Murray), for such an unusual incursion into his territories, and Malacca is much exercised about the Lieutenant-Governor's trusting his girls in a region, unknown indeed, but credited with a population of tigers, crocodiles, rogue elephants, and savages. The charge of the young ladies seems to have been rather too much for Miss Bird's temper and patience; she is very cross with one of them for being ill, and with both of them for being tired, and the recollection of the hospitality of the Stadthaus and Government Bungalow is powerless to hinder her from describing the girls as an encumbrance to which she was not accustomed. Her kind and courteous host was spared receiving such a rebuke for his error in print, for Captain Shaw died almost suddenly a few weeks after Miss Bird—whose notions of reciprocity might be a little better balanced—had left Malacca, and was in full possession of the house of Mr. Low, the English Resident at Perak. Her description of "the wilds"—the voyage on the Linggi River, the forest, the orchids, the animals (Miss Bird is given to the exaltation of monkeys and the depreciation of elephants), the palms, the people, the glorious confusion, the colour, and the sunshine—is admirable indeed, most admirable because the author does not admire it herself. "It is wonderful," she says; "no words could describe it, far less mine. Mr. Darwin says so truly that a visit to the tropics (and such tropics!) is like a visit to a new planet. This new wonder-world, so enchanting, tantalising, intoxicating, makes me despair, for I cannot make you see what I am seeing." The river journey is one of the gems of the book, with the description of the solemn, courteous, splendid Rajahs. A propos of the latter and their grand politeness, Miss Bird says:—

"That we are regarded as 'Infidel dogs,' together with all other unbelievers, always makes me feel shy with Mohammedans. Some time ago, when Captain Shaw pressed on the Malays the impropriety of shooting Chinamen, as they were then in the habit of doing, the reply of one of them was,—'Why not shoot Chinamen, they have no religion?' and I have not the least doubt that the same is their profound conviction concerning ourselves."

There is a charming letter written from the British Residency at Klang, Selangor, whither the author sailed from Malacca, and where she must have been happy, for she could say to the person whom she addressed, "You will not know where Klang is, and I think you won't find it in any atlas or encyclopædia." This remote capital of an unknown State is not a very pleasant place. All the enterprise in the interior is in the hands of Chinamen; the Malays and the Chinese are not on the best terms, and the Government is of a fussy, rather oppressive kind. The pleasantest picture in this part of the book (in which the author dwells upon the impassiveness of the Chinese) is the following one of a handsome, black monkey, a portion of the family circle at the Residency, whom Miss Bird believes to be the "agile gibbon," a creature so delicate that it has never yet survived a voyage to England:—

"It is a beautiful creature. It walks on its hind legs, with a curious, human walk, hanging its long arms down by its sides. It will walk quietly by your side, like another person. It has nice dark eyes, with well-formed lids like ours, a good nose, a human mouth with very white teeth, and a pleasant, cheery look when it smiles; but when the face is at rest, its expression is sad and wistful. It has very pretty fingers and finger-nails. It can climb anywhere and take long leaps. This morning, it went into a house where a cluster of bananas is hanging, leapt up to the roof, and in no time had peeled two, which it ate very neatly. It has not even a rudimentary tail. When it sits with its arms folded, it looks like a gentlemanly person in a close-fitting, fur suit."

Miss Bird's "real good time" at Klang was somewhat tempered by rumours of "rogues," and the actual sight of cobras. The police have an awful collection of snakes, dead and alive, and "they usually got three a day at the fort." Some good tiger stories enliven this part of the narrative, which flags a good deal about Pinang, but picks up satisfactorily at the "protected" State of Perak, the richest and most important, as well as one of the largest of the States of the peninsula. Miss Bird plunged deeply into the interior en route, by the aid of the elephant—the only animal for whom she has but few good words—and again we have a charming description of forest scenery and jungle life. Mr. Low was absent when Miss Bird arrived at the Residency, to find everything in perfect order for her reception, and the table set for three—clerks, she presumed—who would make their appearance in evening dress; but she soon found that her destined companions were a large and a small ape, the prime favourites of Mr. Low, who lives in a paradise of pets. In the society of the apes, Eblis and Mahmoud, of whose civilised ways she gives an astonishing account, the traveller passed several happy days, during which she made delightful expeditions into the jungle, mounted on the Royal elephant, ten feet high, that had been formerly the property of the deposed Sultan of Perak. When Mr. Low returned, his visitor could hardly see or hear him for the frantic joy with which the apes and the retriever welcomed their master. Of the Resident, his habits, his steady, hard work, pursued for fourteen hours out of the twenty-four, with Eblis, "looking like his familiar spirit," at his side, and his guest, working at her separate table at the other end of the verandah, we have a very interesting and amusing picture. Our Resident at Perak is evidently the right man in the right place, as the following extract, the only one for which we have space, will show:—

"I think that work is his passion, and a change of work his sole recreation. He devotes himself to the promotion of the interests of the State, and his evident desire is to train the native Rajahs to rule the people equitably. He seems to grudge every dollar spent superfluently on the English establishment, and contents himself with this small and old-fashioned bungalow. In this once disaffected region he goes about unarmed, and in the daytime the sentries only carry canes. His manner is as quiet and unpretending as can possibly be, and he speaks to Malays as respectfully as to Europeans, neither lowering thereby his own dignity, nor theirs. Apparently, they have free access to him during all hours of daylight, and as I sit writing or reading a Malay shadow constantly falls across my paper, and a Malay glides up the steps and appears unannounced in the verandah, on which Mr. Low lays aside whatever he is doing, and quietly gives himself to the business in hand. The reigning prince, the Rajah Muda Yusuf, and Rajah Dris, are daily visitors; the former brings a troop of followers with him, and they remain outside, their red sarongs and picturesque attitudes as they lounge in the shade giving to the place that 'native' air which everywhere I love, at least where 'natives' are treated as I think they ought to be."

All that the author has to tell of Perak, its wild men, its wild beasts, its beautiful scenery, its Malay customs, is most interesting, and though the picture has its dark shades, it is a very hopeful one, especially as Mr. Low's scheme for the emancipation of all persons held in bondage, which will lead to the extinction of the curse of debt-slavery, is now under consideration.

BUT YET A WOMAN.*

THIS is a very taking book. The author, of whom we have only heard that he is a young American mathematician, has at least produced a story which tests his imaginative insight into the genius of a country very different from his own, and satisfies us that that insight is genuine. Several of the French characters are sketched in with a firm and delicate hand, and though the plot is hardly on a level with the dialogue, and seems to be rather mechanically pinned on to the group of characters sketched, than developed out of their relations to each other, the book is one which seems to promise a future to the man who has written it. It is, too, animated by a thoroughly pure taste, and shows a wide knowledge of that higher side of French character which has recently been too little represented in the literature concerned with French life and character. Whether the writer is or is not a Roman Catholic, we can hardly gather from the book. If not, he treats the Roman Catholic religion with a sympathy and respect which are rare in a Protestant writer, and which show that he identifies it with what there is that is noblest in France. In this we entirely concur. There is, no doubt, a limited amount of French Protestantism,—that, for instance represented by M. de Pressensé,—which is doing noble service in France. But, speaking generally, the best elements of French genius are still identified with devout Catholicism, and the ignoblest with the French scepticism and materialism. Mr. Sherburne Hardy, whatever his own convictions may be, perceives this, and has given us a most beautiful sketch of two or three genuine Catholics, and a very skilful though bitter sketch of one Romanising journalist, who, himself belonging by birth to the Legitimist party, is supposed to have done for that party all the good or all the evil service,—whichever you may call it,—that the late editor of the Univers did for the Ultramontane party in the Church. The mordant sketch of M. de Marzac is a set-off, as it were, against the admirable sketch of the good priest, Father Le Blanc, which is the best in the book. Take the following, as an illustration of the skill with which the priest's character is drawn. We should premise that he is not by any means a priest only,—hardly, perhaps, principally a priest, though he is a genuine priest, and full of the faith which he preaches, and loves to preach. Still, the artist and critic in him is usually more predominant than the priest. In the following conversation the priest sketches and criticises the character of Mr. Sherburne Hardy's heroine, Madame Milevski. He is in a railway-carriage with a young doctor, and they are on their way together to spend a week with M. Michel (Madame Milevski's brother), at Beauvais:—

"'Ah! there is a lake? Yes, we shall enjoy ourselves,' said Father Le Blanc, with evident satisfaction.—'We have a charming party.'—'You are an old friend of M. Michel's.'—'Yes, since he first came to Paris. That is saying much and little; much, because he is the most agreeable of friends; little, because he makes friends of every one.'—'That is an art few possess.'—'True. Only with M. Michel it is not an art at all. That art by which one never disputes the qualities which those about us pretend to possess, and, on the other hand, never asserts any for one's self, like other arts, requires calculation; and M. Michel has none. He fulfils its conditions without suspecting it.'—'Perhaps it is a family trait. I should think M. Michel's sister possessed the art also.'—'Madame Stéphanie? Oh, she is quite another person.'—'Yet she appears to make friends easily.'—'Yes, but in a different way. And, against what odds!'" said Father Le Blanc, lifting up his eyes with an expressive gesture of his hands. 'For woman the art of pleasing is a kingdom for which all her sex are pretenders; and as for ours, with such a woman as Stéphanie Milevski, one is not content with friendship.'—'You have arraigned the whole world against her,' said Roger, laughing.—'Yet I take the world only as I find it. Women make friends like princes, by gaining thrones and dispensing favours. Only, more generous than princes, finally they surrender their thrones also.'—'And M. Milevski? I do not hear of him.'—'M. Milevski is dead. M. Michel's father married, late in life, a second time, in Russia. Of this marriage Stéphanie was the only child, and to M. Michel she has been much like a daughter. She was educated here in Paris under his supervision, after which she returned to Russia, to live with her mother on her estates near Kief.'—'And her mother is dead?'—'Also. But, before dying, she married Stéphanie to a Russian nobleman of the new school, who, shortly after, became compromised with the Emperor, and was exiled to Siberia.'—'Then madame has a title?'—'She had one, but it was forfeited on her husband's exile. It is said that the estates were also confiscated, and that madame was forbidden to reside in Russia. On receiving the Czar's orders, she drove alone, in the dead of winter, from Kief to St. Petersburg, with a single servant. Notwithstanding this defiance, she obtained an audience, and kept her estates. There is a story that the Czar gave her a cross set with diamonds, as a token of his good-will, and that she asked permission to have the cross changed to a dagger, "lest your majesty's clemency make me forget my husband," she said. The Count Milevski was already dead; he died on the journey to Siberia. But then, we cannot believe all that is said. Still,' added M. Le Blanc reflectively, 'I would believe many things of her. She puzzles me; and, for an old man, that is saying a good deal. The young look into women's eyes to see their own reflections; the old, to see the woman.'—'You make a very agreeable definition of age,' said Roger. 'Most men, in that classification, die young.'—Father Le Blanc laughed, which he did with his shoulders and trunk. As a laugh it was not infectious, but conveyed a sense of satisfaction. As Rénée said, 'When Father Le Blanc laughs, I feel happy myself.'—'Yes, she puzzles me,' he resumed. 'Now, with Mademoiselle Rénée it is different. She is like the brook at its source; one sees the bottom. But Stéphanie! and he shook his head,—'it is the river; one sees the reflection of everything, but of what is beneath the surface, nothing—except that there is something.' Roger was not averse to giving M. Le Blanc the reins of the conversation; partly because he was interested, and partly because he was curious. 'She is certainly very beautiful.'—'Ah!' said the priest, holding up his hands, 'and what beauty! I am a bit of an artist, M. Lande; indeed, I was an artist before I was a priest. I will tell you why she is beautiful. Do you know?'—'I have not studied her,' said Roger.—'Well, do so. It will repay you. Her beauty is not faultless; that is, it is not absolutely regular,—not the style magnifique, as the Greeks have it. They knew what they were about, those Greeks, and gave such to the gods alone, and to certain of them only. Such beauty pleases the judgment; it is too correct for the heart. But of Madame Milevski, my friend, the judgment must beware. She does not please it; she destroys it,' he said, with a little shrug, 'for in her beauty is that factor of weakness and incompleteness which touches the heart.'—'She does not appear to know all this. At least, no one would suspect her of it.'—'Nonsense,' exclaimed Father Le Blanc. 'There is a spirit which whispers in the ear of every beautiful woman as she leaves Paradise. But, as you say, she does not appear to. Now, I will prove the contrary. Have you noticed her dress?'—'Hardly; except, possibly, that it was simple.'—'Exactly, but designedly so. It fulfils the condition of a perfect dress, which is only an accessory, having little value in itself, covering what it does not conceal, and calling attention to that which it embellishes. But, without beauty, such a style would be frightful! What are all the eccentricities of fashion but the devices to conceal and supplement nature? Madame Stéphanie flies in the face of all these follies; first, because she knows she can dare to; and second, because, like a king who has the air of one, she has the good-taste to dispense with her decorations.' At this instant the train emerged from the forest, disclosing the valley of the Seine. 'Ah! la belle France!' cried Father Le Blanc."

That is a skilful passage, as it manages to give us a pretty clear glimpse of four of the principal characters of the story,—M. Michel, his niece Rénée, Madame Milevski, and Father Le Blanc,—and a hint or two as to a fifth, the young doctor, who is Father Le Blanc's companion. Nor do any of them,—except, perhaps, the heroine,—fail to satisfy the reader as their characters are more fully developed by events. In the sketch of M. Michel, the kindly and absent-minded student and scholar, who is so amiable to everybody that he has no room left for any special or personal attachment to anybody, Mr. Sherburne Hardy has painted a very pleasant picture of a somewhat pallid, though genial character. Father Le Blanc, the humorous old priest, who has so much of the artist left in him still, and who betrays, nevertheless, the kindly coarseness of a confessor to whom the evil and the good of the world have become so familiar that he has lost a good deal of the delicacy of his naturally fine insight, is a more powerful study still. The picture of the simpler heroine, Rénée, with her eager desire for something of the infinite in her life, and her subdued impatience of the calm affection of her uncle, is a very engaging one, and, on the whole, more successful, we think, though it aims at less, than the picture of the heroine for whom the title of the book is meant, Madame Milevski, who, interesting as she is made, is not made very clear to us, and has, indeed, too much of complexity, restlessness, and ambition in her for the small space of canvas which Mr. Sherburne Hardy has devoted to her. To the hero, again, the young doctor, Mr. Sherburne Hardy has given hardly any care. We rather agree with M. Michel, when he passes judgment at the close, that Rénée was much too good for him. In truth, however, we hardly learn enough of him to find out whether she was too good for him, or not.

The remaining interest in the book is in the very severe but very profound analysis of the character of the self-seeking Legitimist journalist, M. de Marzac. We have not read a keener analysis of the self-deceptions of a thoroughly selfish character for many years back. How subtle, for instance, is the following!—

"The ceremonies terminated with a ball, at which M. de Marzac was, of course, present. As he drives away from the fête in his carriage, a conscience long since subdued, the very clank of whose fetters has become applause, sets his mind at peace with all the world. Once thoroughly mastered, there is no better slave; for none knows better the rough places that need smoothing and the sore spots that need balm. It was a pleasure in which he often indulged, to go on the witness-stand before this conscience, to play the criminal in order to be acquitted; and, on his way home, he amused himself with this game of solitaire. . . . In the subjugation of conscience, M. de Marzac wore gloves and avoided brutality. His was the instinct of perversion, not of murder. Instead of slaying that inward monitor outright, he confronted it with expediency, and taught it to doubt its own dictates. He thus managed to preserve the fountain of fine emotions and noble sentiments, although the waters were soon contaminated and polluted."

"A conscience long since subdued, the very clank of whose fetters has become applause," is as fine an epigram as any this age has produced, and moreover, not one after the manner of this age. And wherever we meet with M. de Marzac, we meet with some little additional touch which increases the effect of this sketch. On the other hand, the story of which M. de Marzac is the hero is so entirely supplementary to the chief interest of this tale, and it is so difficult to make out the reason why Madame Milevski, who never felt the smallest regard for him, should have asked him to wait a year before she finally refused his suit, that we can hardly help smiling at the very inartificial connecting-link between the little bit of melodrama with which Mr. Sherburne Hardy embellishes his tale, and the characters with whom chiefly we are concerned.

What we have in this book is a series of delicate vignettes, clumsily bound together in a single novel, of which the chief plot passes outside the sphere of most of these characters, though it touches one or two of them here and there. What we really care about is the love of Roger and Rénée, the self-devotion of Stéphanie, and the intellectual malignity of M. de Marzac, the mild benignity of M. Michel, and the moral humour of Father Le Blanc. Yet the story turns on the early life of M. de Marzac, when he was nearly as self-confessed a villain as he is throughout the story a reputable villain. His assassination at the close cuts no knot, and forwards no interest. It is simply the retribution of a secret sin of his youth, and makes no difference to the fate of any one of the persons of the story except his own. Mr. Sherburne Hardy, however, is a writer of much promise, and we shall hope that his next story will be one as good in its plot as this is in its dialogue, and also not less excellent than this in dialogue.

THE CHURCH AND THE ORNAMENTS RUBRIC.*

THE theory of this little volume is of the nature of an argumentum ad hominem against those who object to the Ridsdale judgment on the ground that it contradicts the previous and existing law of the Church, as expressed in the Ornaments Rubric. The author takes the bull boldly by the horns, and declares (1), that the Ornaments Rubric has ever been and still remains a purely Erastian document, imposed originally on a reluctant Church by the mere will of the Sovereign; (2), that the resistance of the Church to it was completely successful from the first; (3), that the voice of the Church finally prevailed in the Advertisements, which superseded and abolished once for all the requirements of the Ornaments Rubric. But we had better let Mr. Balme speak for himself:—

"The Ornaments Rubric was an attempt at legislation, circa sacra, by authority purely secular, steadfastly resisted by the Church. In it Queen Elizabeth, Tudor-like, tried to impose on the Church her own personal taste in matters of Ritual. Her subservient Parliament obeyed her behest, and passed the Statute of Uniformity, from which the Ornaments Rubric was a modification of one clause. But every Bishop who was present in the House of Lords voted against the Bill. That was the only opportunity which the authorities of the Church had of giving official judgment upon it. The Queen took care that the Prayer-book in which she had the Rubric inserted was never submitted to Convocation. But the mind of the Church was unmistakably expressed in act, or rather in passive resistance. So far as evidence has been produced, not one parish priest ever conformed to it then, or for three hundred years afterwards."

The italics are Mr. Balme's; and he goes on to argue that the Advertisements expressed the mind of Church and State, making the surplice and cope the only legal vestments,—the former in parish churches, the latter in collegiate churches and cathedrals. Even if we granted all this, for the sake of argument—and we believe Mr. Balme to be totally mistaken—what about the last revision of the Prayer-book, in 1661, in which the Ornaments Rubric is re-enacted? Mr. Balme is not easily staggered, and he is ready with an answer to this objection. The revision of 1661, he tells us, rests on secular, not on ecclesiastical authority. Certainly we have hitherto believed that Convocation had both a voice and a hand in that revision, at least. But this is quite a mistake, according to Mr. Balme. The Southern Convocation had a hand in it, he admits, and he also admits that the Convocation of Canterbury was aided by a number of Bishops from the Northern Province, as well as by some proxies from the Lower House of the Northern Convocation. But these proxies, he argues, were not selected with all the proper formalities; and therefore the Ornaments Rubric of 1662 has no ecclesiastical authority: it is merely State law. Yet Mr. Balme professes to write as a strong opponent of Erastianism. "Since the time of the Gorham judgment," he says, "I have been intensely anxious about encroachment by the State on the spiritual jurisdiction of the Church, to which I attach great importance." He is anxious accordingly to destroy the authority of the Ornaments Rubric, on the ground that it rests on a merely secular sanction, and to substitute for it the Advertisements, which, as he believes, can claim Church and State authority. He maintains that Mr. Green endured imprisonment, though he knew it not, in defence of the principle of Erastianism, and that the English Church Union is guilty of the same paradox by its support of Mr. Green and its vindication of the Ornaments Rubric.

We shall show presently that Mr. Balme has grievously misread and misunderstood his authorities. But the strange thing is that he does not see that if his theory were true, it would prove a great deal too much. If the Ornaments Rubric has no claim to ecclesiastical authority because the Lower House of the Convocation of York was not properly represented in the revision of 1661, the objection is equally fatal to the whole of the Prayer-book. Moreover, there is no pretence for claiming any Synodical authority for the Advertisements during the reign of Elizabeth. They were drawn up by Commissioners, appointed by authority of an Act of Parliament. So that if the Ornaments Rubric lacks Church authority, much more do the Advertisements,—at least, throughout the reign of Elizabeth. Nor can the subsequent references to them in various Canons invalidate this initial defect, any more than the reference to Jewell's "Apology," in the Thirtieth Canon, can invest that book with legal authority. Mr. Balme has, in fact, acted the part of the woodman who carelessly cut down the branch on which he was sitting.

But let us look at the principal arguments on which Mr. Balme builds his extraordinary theory. And let us begin with the revision of 1661. There is no question that the Convocations both of Canterbury and York received the royal licence, and were invited to revise the Prayer-book. There is no question that both Houses of the Convocation of Canterbury did revise the Prayer-book; nor does Mr. Balme deny that the Bishops of the Northern Province delegated some of their number, including the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Durham, and the Bishop of Carlisle, to sit in London with the Southern Convocation, in order to save time. Nevertheless Mr. Balme denies that the Ornaments Rubric possesses ecclesiastical authority, because it was passed, in his belief, without having been submitted to the judgment of the Lower House of the Convocation of York. As we have said, the objection, if valid, would be equally fatal to the whole Prayer-book. It is not valid, however, for more reasons than one. The truth is that the rule of Christendom has been that canons and constitutions should be made in Synods consisting of the Archbishops of the Province and his Comprovincials. The co-ordinate power of the Presbyteriate in the two English Convocations is an innovation on ancient custom, and grew out of the right of the Lower Houses of Convocation to vote in the granting of subsidies, when the Clergy taxed themselves apart from Parliament. So that if it were true that the Lower House of the Northern Convocation had no opportunity of passing judgment on the Revised Prayer-book, this would not prove that it lacked Church authority, inasmuch as the Archbishop and his suffragans undoubtedly took part in the revision, and approved the result. But it is not true. The Lower House, to save time, appointed proxies (most of whom belonged to the Southern Province, and were already in London) to act for them; and they pledged themselves, under forfeiture of their goods, to abide by the votes of those proxies. When the revision was completed, the Upper and Lower Houses of the Southern Province subscribed the book separately; as did also the proxies of the Upper and Lower Houses of the Convocation of York. Here is the form of subscription signed by the proxies of the Lower House:—

"Nos etiam, universus Clerus inferioris Domus ejusdem Provinciae Ebor., synodice congregati, per nostros respective Procuratores, sufficienter et legitime constituti dicto Libro Publicarum Precum, Administrationis Sacramentorum et Rituum, una cum Forma et Modo ordinandi et consecrandi Episcopos, Presbyteros, et Diaconos, unanimiter consensimus et subscripsimus, die et anno predictis [i.e., December 20th, 1661]."

Yet Mr. Balme tells us that the Lower House of the Northern Convocation had no voice in the revision of the Prayer-book! Either from want of familiarity with his subject, or from carelessness, he has misunderstood his authorities. Nor is it by any means a solitary example, as we shall see presently. Meanwhile, let us say emphatically that no document was ever more amply ratified by ecclesiastical and civil sanction than the Prayer-book of 1661, including the Ornaments Rubric. Mr. Balme draws on his imagination when he asserts that the Canterbury Convocation of 1661 "retained the Rubric" in the sense expounded in the Ridsdale judgment. We have seen how absurd is his exclusion of the York Convocation from any responsibility for the revision. Equally absurd is the view that the Revisionists retained the Rubric while mentally reading into it a meaning directly contrary to its plain grammatical sense. Would it not have been more simple, as well as more honest, to substitute for the old Rubric one which should say plainly what the Revisionists are supposed by Mr. Balme to have meant? Assuming the honesty of the Revisionists, their retention of the Rubric in its present form can only be explained on the supposition of its expressing what they intended. But even if it were otherwise, it would not matter in the least. For it is a recognised rule of legal interpretation that the plain meaning of a statute—and the Ornaments Rubric is statute as well as ecclesiastical law—overrides any interpretation which is contrary to its plain meaning. That consideration alone is fatal to Mr. Balme's theory. But fallacies are hard to kill; so we had better expose one or two more of Mr. Balme's blunders.

"The Queen's own Rubric," he tells us, "was contradictory to the Queen's own Injunctions issued the same year, 1559. The thirtieth injunction, on apparel of ministers, 'both in the Church and without,' commands that they shall use and wear such seemly habits, garments, and such square caps as were most commonly and orderly received in the latter yere of the reign of King Edward the Sixth." Mr. Balme thinks that he has here made a great discovery, which he accentuates by the aid of italics and old-English characters. It is in fact the corner-stone of his theory. And what is the discovery? This, namely, that the injunction commanded the use of the vestments ordered by the Ornaments Rubric of Edward's Second Prayer-book, and thereby abrogated the Ornaments Rubric of 1559! In other words, Mr. Balme asks us to believe that, simultaneously with a rubric which ordered the use of all the vestments of Edward's First Prayer-book, Elizabeth issued an injunction forbidding them all except the surplice! So preposterous a conclusion requires strong evidence, and all the evidence which Mr. Balme can find is the expression, "both in the Church and without," and similitude in the latter yere of the reign of King Edward the Sixth. Mr. Balme prints in old-English characters. The passage that Mr. Balme has again misunderstood the formation, and the author of the clergy, not to their official costume of the laity, difficulty in keeping them to the use of clerical dress. The Advertisements go into the question minutely. This, and this alone, is the meaning of Elizabeth's injunction. "Her Majesty," it says, "being desirous to have the prelacy and clergy of this realm to be had as well in outward reverence as otherwise regarded for the worthiness of their ministries, and thinking it necessary to have them known to the people in all places and assemblies, both in the Church and without, and thereby to receive the honour and estimation due to the special messengers and ministers of Almighty God," therefore she prescribes the use of the dress "commonly ordered and received in the latter year of the reign of King Edward VI.," and therefore not reasonably obnoxious to the charge of being Popish. And she wishes this dress to be worn "in all places and assemblies," in order that the clergy may be distinguished from the laity. Does Mr. Balme suppose that the Queen ordered the surplice to be worn "in all places and assemblies"? And does he think that "the prelacy and clergy" were more likely to be mistaken for laymen in copes or chasubles than in plain surplices? Mr. Balme's interpretation makes ludicrous nonsense of the injunction.

One more example of Mr. Balme's method of reasoning must suffice. He quotes an injunction of Archbishop Grindal's, which ordered in the year 1571 the destruction, among other Church ornaments, of all vestments, albes, tunicles, stoles, crosses, candlesticks. This is a clear proof to Mr. Balme's mind "that the vestments were unlawful in kind" after the issue of the Advertisements. But crosses and candlesticks are also mentioned. Does Mr. Balme believe that they, too, were made unlawful by the Advertisements? If he does, both law and usage are against him. If he does not, what is the value of his argument? Elsewhere he quotes Episcopal Injunctions, which doom chasubles, copes, crosses, candlesticks, and altar vestments to the same ruin. Yet altar vestments are unquestionably legal. This fast-and-loose method of reasoning is inadmissible, and it shows either a very illogical state of mind or a very superficial acquaintance with the subject under discussion. On the whole, we do not think that upholders of the Ridsdale judgment are to be congratulated on their latest champion.

IN THE LAND OF THE LION AND THE SUN.*

THOUGH Persia is as yet but little visited by the modern tourist, it has been better described than probably any other land of the East, and this by both natives and foreigners who have made the country and the people the object of their study. Since the dawn of history, it is a land that has never ceased to be a centre of Eastern civilisation. Herodotus compiled the history of its kings, and Ctesias gave his experiences of Court life as physician to Artaxerxes Mnemon; a thousand years later, the Arab geographers, from Mukaddesi down to Yakut, minutely described the country and its products; and after the lapse of another thousand years, we have Tavernier and the copious tomes of Chardin, to be followed in our own century by Sir R. K. Porter and the author of the inimitable Hadjji Baba. And those who have known the modern Persians and modern Persia, and have read some of the countless works which describe its condition in times of old, are astonished at the smallness of the change which Iran has suffered since the days when the Father of History penned his account of the halls of Darius and Xerxes. For the traveller of to-day, who camps on the platform at Persepolis, will be struck by the notable similarity in facial type between the peasant who brings him milk and the sculptured figure of the attendant on the Great King; and, bearing in mind the twenty-two centuries that have elapsed, this persistence will perhaps strike him more here than in Egypt, or Greece, or Rome, where the modern and the ancient are also seen thus standing side by side.

Dr. Wills' qualifications for writing a book about Persia are that he sojourned for fifteen years in the country, and studied the home-life of the people as only a physician can do in the closely-veiled East; acquiring, at the same time, an intimate knowledge of the colloquial dialects, which, though (unfortunately for philological science) unsupplemented by a study of the literary language, has enabled him to gain information at first hand from men of every rank and profession. Since the visit of the Shah to Europe many changes have taken place in Teheran, and, especially in the precincts of the Court, many of the characteristics of old Persian life and manners have been improved off the face of the earth; but happily for his readers,

* In the Land of the Lion and the Sun; or, Modern Persia. By O. J. Wills, M.D., &c. London: Macmillan and Co. 1883.

Dr. Wills was not the senior "medical officer of H.M.'s Telegraph Department in Persia," and hence it fell to his lot to spend most of his time either at the old capital of Ispahan, or at Hamadan in the west, or Shiraz in the south, where the life of the provinces is unaffected by Feringhee innovations, and where "as Persia was in Morier's time, so it is now; and though one sees plenty of decay, there is very little change."

Dr. Wills was fortunate in going out to Teheran with Colonel G——, his official chief, for a travelling companion, and he thus profited by the Colonel's knowledge of the road, being saved many of the hardships and much of the dearly-bought experience which are the lot of one ignorant of the language and the customs of the East. The account of the voyage out, viâ Constantinople, Tiflis, and Tebrez, will give many useful hints to any one who may project a tour in the further East, while to those who sit at home we may recommend the excellent receipt for coffee "alla Turca" which the reader will find detailed in the account of Stamboul. At this period, Dr. Wills' stay in Teheran was but short, and after a few weeks of rest he was ordered off to Hamadan, the head station of the telegraphic line connecting Bagdad and the Persian capital, which line was at that time in the hands of our Department. On reaching Hamadan, Dr. Wills proceeded to set up a modest establishment, bought horses, engaged servants, and learnt the true import of the Persian word modakel ("income"), an euphemistic expression for "pickings and stealings." Here the life was pleasant enough, sport—for Persia—was abundant, and we have a most interesting description of an antelope-hunt (with a Persian Prince for chief huntsman); and the delights of pigeon-flying are detailed, a pastime greatly in vogue among the Persians, who are bird-fanciers of no mean proficiency. In Hamadan, Dr. Wills first came into contact with the Armenians, among whom, subsequently, he was to live, at Julfa; and it is worthy of note that, unlike their countrymen at Teheran and Ispahan, "they have mostly adopted the Persian dress and language, Armenian being in disuse as a language among those living in Hamadan, and there being no distinctive mark by which one can tell them in either indoor or outdoor dress." Before leaving Hamadan, Dr. Wills, of course, visited the tomb of Esther and Mordecai, and on the road to Ispahan he describes the inscriptions and sculptures of Darius at Besitun; but, though interesting, there is little new in these matters, and we therefore pass on to our author's account of Ispahan, the capital of Persia when Teheran was still a village, and the Shah's ancestors but wandering tribesmen.

At Ispahan the European community do not live in the Moslem or old town, but in the Armenian quarter of Julfa, on the southern side of the Zendarud River, peopled entirely by Christians, whose drunken frolics are in odious contrast to the sobriety of their Mahomedan neighbours. In Julfa, the squabbles of the monks and the Missionaries, together with the brawls arising from the effects of strong liquors in a hot climate, prevent the place from becoming dull. All men drink, and a specimen story is that of Dr. Wills' cook, an aged Armenian, who had learnt some English; on a Sunday night this worthy was wont to say to his master,—"Dinner finished, Sir; if you no orders, I go get drunk with my priest." Needless to add that they both did get drunk, and that it was at the cook's expense. The educational work done in the school maintained here by the Church Missionary Society is certainly excellent; some hundred and twenty Armenian boys are educated, and the Church of England has in Julfa over two hundred communicants, but as many of these latter benefit directly or indirectly, or are merely temporary Protestants to annoy their relatives and to obtain protection, the result of the whole thing cannot be considered a success as yet, for in eleven years not a single Mahomedan convert has been obtained.

Dr. Wills' account of life in Persia is certainly most interesting, and those who may read his book in order to profit by his experiences will learn how (like Robinson Crusoe) he built himself a house in Ispahan, and how he and a descendant of the Prophet (the latter sub rosa) made excellent wine in Shiraz. But his charming house in Ispahan he was unable to enjoy for very long, on account of ill-health, and this brought him home viâ the Caspian Sea and Russia. On his journey out he chose a new route, coming post from Trebizond, viâ Erzeroom to Teheran; the voyage was as uneventful as travelling in the East often is, and the only detail that need be noted is that at Erzeroom he heard, on the authority of "Mr. B——, the Chancellor," "that the Erzeroomis are so sharp, that there are no Jews" in the place.

On arriving at Teheran, Dr. Wills was immediately sent down country to Shiraz, the city of Hafiz and Saadi, which, lying embowered in meadows and gardens of cypresses, presents a strong contrast to most other Persian towns. Here,—

"One soon finds out that one has reached another country. Instead of the thrift of the Ispahani, and his mortified look—his dress made purely for comfort and economy, and his donkey or ambling pony—the Shirazi smiling, joking, singing, clad, if he can by any means attain it, in gayest-coloured silk, the turban frequently discarded, even among the aged, for the jaunty hat of finest cloth or lamb-skin, the well-dyed and kept moustaches, and the long love-locks, with the hat of the smallest size and latest mode cocked with a knowing air among the beaux; the universal pistols at the holsters, the well-appointed and gay horse trappings, and the well-bred, well-fed, well-groomed horses, all with some breed in them, like their riders. These men are a different race from the more Northern Persian,—there is little fanaticism, and some religion."

For a description of Shiraz and its lovely gardens, of our author's visit to Fussa, where he shut up a Khan in a coal-cupboard, for an account of how before his very eyes a scorpion voluntarily stung itself to death when surrounded by a ring of live coals, for a description of the Persian famine and its dire effects, for the story how when on a professional visit the Doctor was captured by brigands, and the ultimate fate of these poor wretches, for these and innumerable other details of Persian life, manners, and customs, we must refer our readers to the book itself, and not, as our Shirazi friends would say, "skim the cream from the pot of expectation." But since it may be prophesied that this book will become a standard work for those about to visit Persia, we must here point out some few errors into which Dr. Wills has inadvertently fallen. Would that he had studied a little more book-Persian during his long leisure afternoons in the hot summer weather, and he might have written an account of Iran as complete as that of The Modern Egyptians, by Edward Lane.

Of Persian words, it should be said that a glossary is added, "having the transliteration of the Oriental scholar Johnson affixed in parentheses;" so far so good, but why does Dr. Wills very properly on p. 217 write, "Yezd-i-khast or Yzed-khast," and then on the very next page call the town "Yezdicast or Yzedcast"? The heir-apparent in Persia is the Vali-ahd, and not (as given on pp. 193, 366), the Valliat,—this word, too, it may be noted, is omitted in the glossary. The celebrated garden near Shiraz is named Jehan-numa, "the world-displayer," on account of the fine view gained from its terraces, and Dr. Wills is therefore in error in writing (pp. 218, 276), "Jahn-i-ma, the garden of my soul." Page 388, tobeh means simply repentance, which is not of necessity "a vow of abstinence from some particular sin." Page 312, backgammon (not chess) called Takht i Nadir is the Board (meaning the game) of Nadir Shah, and not "the camp." Lastly (p. 290), Mashallah means neither "God is great," nor "praise God," but, as correctly given in the glossary, "what God pleases." Of clerical errors, we should say that on p. 353, line 22, for "horses" read "houses," and on p. 260, line 5, for "Julfa" read "Shiraz," but these are but slight blemishes, and we only note them in case a second edition should be called for.

At the end of Dr. Wills' book are some most useful appendixes. We have the table of post stages, where, by the way, p. 412, in "the shortest possible time from Ispahan to London," the 200 and odd miles from Teheran to Enzelli are omitted. Appendix C, on "Travelling in Persia," is the result of many long journeys, and "Russian Goods versus English" might prove interesting reading to some of our enlightened M.P.'s. After all we have said, it is hardly needful to add that Dr. Wills' interesting volume is a vade-mecum to any diplomat, telegraph-chee, or traveller who may be projecting a sojourn in "the Land of the Lion and the Sun." We have pointed out some few errors into which he has fallen through not being a bookworm, but even to professed philologists his book will prove instructive, giving as it does the modern Persian pronunciation; it shows, for example, the change of r into l in such words as khiyar, "cucumber," which Dr. Wills writes "keal," after the manner in which that word is pronounced over all the south of Persia.

THE EXPOSITOR.*

THE Expositor, far from declining in interest and ability, steadily increases in both, nor have we often come across any volume dealing chiefly with the exposition of Scripture so rich in interest as the volume for the first half of this year. As the July number, that has just appeared, concludes the series of articles by the editor on the prophet Balaam, we may choose that series for the special illustration of the value of the periodical, though there have been other subjects continuously treated during the half-year of perhaps equal interest;—the Dean of Wells, for instance, having contributed studies of the character of the prophet Isaiah, as derived from his writings, which seem to us full of ingenuity, as well as marked by care and learning. The series on Balaam is interesting first for its exhaustiveness. Dr. Cox is a scholar who always takes care to collect fully the data for every problem with which he deals, before he attempts to grapple with it. And it is this which gives to the papers on Balaam a great part of their value. Dr. Cox gives us all the separate fragments concerning Balaam, and discusses carefully the value of each,—first, the great passage in the Book of Numbers (xxii., 2—xxiv., 25), which he thinks it probable was the account furnished by Balaam himself when he was taken in battle by the Israelites (Numbers, xxxi., 8), and tried by a sort of court-martial. Then he deals also with the other references to the history of Balaam in Deuteronomy, Joshua, and Nehemiah, and with the severe references to him in the New Testament. And finally, he gives the noble fragment in the Book of Micah, in which Balak offers Balaam even to give up his first-born as a sacrifice to appease Jehovah; and Balaam replies in the lofty rebuke that anticipates the very spirit of Christianity itself,—“What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justice, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?” With all these materials Dr. Cox deals comprehensively, and indeed we should say, if we are to criticise at all, with a little too much desire to make the best of Balaam, seeing that he is obliged subsequently to retract something of that which he at first gives in his favour. But the whole account of Balaam—a prophet of Mesopotamia, wholly unconnected with Israel, who adopted all the usual auguries for divination, while relying more on his moods of inward inspiration than on these—is so unique, that we care comparatively little what the view taken of him may be, so long as we have every opportunity given us of seeing him as he is. And this opportunity Dr. Cox certainly affords us. He picks up every hint which may throw any light on the position and character of Balaam, and some of those hints are very striking.

In the next place, Dr. Cox's moral criticism is strong and clear. He sees in Balaam the strong passions which are so often combined with the highest spiritual vision, and paints the struggle in him between the former and the latter in very powerful colours:—

“Now when a man's whole soul is darkened and confused by this conflict between interest and conscience, between duty and desire, mere words, however prohibitory and threatening, are of little avail. What can be said to him which has not been said to him already, and has not already quickened echoes of assent within his own conscience and heart? As a rule, and if he is to be saved from his sin and taught that God's will does not make right, but is right, and cannot therefore vary with his varying moods, he must be allowed, he is allowed, to go out after the desire of his heart, to indulge his craving, and to see what comes of it. ‘When the spirit of a man thus contradicts itself, God becomes a contradiction to him, and He who had said “go not,” now says “go.”’ With the froward God shows Himself froward, as with the upright He shows Himself upright; and that not in the Bible alone, but in the broad fields of daily human experience.”

That is fine, but perhaps the finest and newest part of Dr. Cox's study is his comment on a portion of the second oracle of Balaam,—that oracle in which Balaam depreciates the mere power of prediction, and speaks of Israel's gift for waiting upon God without anticipating the future, as a far higher thing than prevision itself. This is the part of the oracle to which we refer:—

“For there is no augury in Jacob,
Nor any divination in Israel;
But in due time it is told to Jacob,
And to Israel, what God doeth.”

And here is Dr. Cox's striking comment on Balaam's praise:—

“Nay, more, even in respect of that skill of his craft, or gift of his vision, which he still claims to possess, the power to divine the future, he humbly acknowledges that this is but a poor gift at the best, far from being so precious as it was accounted, and not to be compared with the grace vouchsafed to every child of Israel, in his position, however limited his range. The Hebrews say, God loves them and dwells with them, because they are Jacob, nor any divination in Israel; but in due time God doeth. That must have been a wonderful gift of God with men which led a diviner to confess that to wait with childlike confidence on God doeth. He reveals his will in a far greater and more precious gift than to force or surprise the secrets of the future and to pass in spirit through the times to be. God ‘met’ Balaam to purpose when He taught him a truth which men, and even Christian men, have not yet learned,—that a little trust is better than much foresight, and that to walk with God in patient and loving dependence is better than to know the things to come.”

In his final review of Balaam's character, Dr. Cox quotes a remarkable passage from Mr. Morison's essay on Macaulay, in which Mr. Morison suggests that a natural “disposition to the cardinal virtues” is by no means “the best outfit for the prophet,” and Dr. Cox compares Balaam's covetousness, and the partially successful but shameful bit of statecraft by which he is said to have counselled the Midianites to tempt the Israelites into breaking God's law, with somewhat similar qualities as displayed by Jacob and Solomon. Nevertheless, sensuality itself, bad as it is, is, we think, hardly as bad as trading deliberately on the sensuality of others, which was Balaam's statecraft. The following passage will give briefly Dr. Cox's view of Balaam:—

“I am not unaware that we rarely find so many anomalies, so many ‘jarring contrasts of incompatible qualities’ in a single character as we have discovered in that of Balaam; nor do I wish to forget that we have had to look in many quarters to discover cases parallel with his. It is no part of my duty, or of my aim, either to make light of his transgressions, or to contend that there is no problem to solve before we can frame any reasonable estimate of the man. That a man so great in virtues and gifts should fall into vices so vulgar and glaring must always, I hope, remain in some measure a mystery to us. But I submit that in thus comparing him with Jacob and Solomon, with Saul and Jonah, we do, to a large extent, discover the class to which he belongs, and reduce our problem to more practicable dimensions. For these, too, were men of rare and eminent gifts, gifts which, as Browning says, ‘a man may waste, desecrate, yet never quite lose;’ they were men chosen by God for distinguished and honourable service, men who were moved, taught, and chastened by his wise and holy Spirit; and yet, among them, they display the very vices and disgrace themselves by the very transgressions which we recognise and deplore in him. And taking him for all in all, remembering and making due allowance for his age, his blood, his breeding, his temptations, I for one should hesitate to pronounce him a worse man on the whole than Saul, or Solomon, or Jonah. They had advantages denied to him. He had disadvantages—defects of will and taints of blood, a bias of hereditary habit, a license of custom, a force of temptation unknown to them. If God could use and inspire them, why should he not call and inspire him?”

That seems to us a sound view, and though we rather regret that Dr. Cox should go on beyond this into speculation as to Balaam's possible regeneration in the spiritual world,—a matter wholly beyond us, and depending, perhaps, to no small extent, on the bent of Balaam's own free-will in that world,—we cannot too heartily recommend this series of learned and thoughtful papers to our readers. The present writer is bound to say that he never knew, till he read Dr. Cox's paper, that in the prophet Micah was to be found a fragment purporting to convey a traditional conversation between Balak and Balaam, though he quite assents to the force of the arguments urged by Dr. Cox, and accepted, it seems, by many great Hebrew scholars, in favour of that view of the case.

We have laid special stress on the papers on Balaam only because they are concluded in the July number of the Expositor just published. But there are other papers in the half-yearly volume of very great interest,—by Dr. Dale, Dr. Matheson, and Mr. J. J. Murphy, as well as the papers on Isaiah by the Dean of Wells.

THREE VOLUMES OF VERSE.*

We do not group these three volumes together because of any similarity they bear to each other—nothing could indeed be more sharply contrasted than Mr. Smith's sturdy grasp of the actual and Mrs. King's imaginative apprehension of a world of dreams, or more unlike either than Mr. Barlow's lawless fluency of artificial rhetoric—but because, in virtue of their very differences, they fairly represent some of the prominent characteristics of contemporary verse. Of the three poets, we should say that Mrs. King is the most distinctly individual, and that Mr. Barlow is the only one who is distinctly imitative; but in all the volumes we discern a something in the vision or the record, the theme or the handling, which suggests—sometimes strongly, sometimes so faintly that we hardly know whether it be a suggestion or not—the work of the more distinguished singers of the century, and of the Zeit-geist which speaks through them.

Concerning Mr. Smith's volume, we will make at starting two obvious remarks, which indicate the nature both of the writer's powers and limitations. The first remark is that Mr. Smith is perhaps the most uniformly equal of living poets. He has a certain level of conception and craftsmanship—a good level, doubtless, but a level, nevertheless—below which he seldom falls, and above which he hardly ever rises. This is true, both of single volumes and of the total mass of his work. Obrig Grange perhaps made a greater impression than any of its successors, but only because it came first, and had therefore the momentum of novelty, for all its distinctive qualities appear in Borland Hall, in Hilda, in Raban, and in the shorter poetical sketches of which the present volume is composed. Mr. Smith has command of variety in his subjects, and, to a less extent, in his treatment also; but not of those happy surprises, those revelations of unsuspected power or insight, with which a really fertile genius is wont to delight us. He quickly taught his readers what to expect from him, and what they expect they always get; but it cannot be said that they ever get more. The second remark is that Mr. Smith's poems, though genuinely poetical—to a certain point—are likely to find, and probably have already found, many warm admirers among persons for whom poetry, as such, has no special charm; and in saying this we do not mean either to pay a compliment or to launch a condemnation, but simply to note the general character of his work. Mr. Smith has more of observation and shrewd reflection than of the highest imaginative power.

"The Village Philosopher" is a study in the manner of Crabbe, but with something of Præd's handling; it has a certain grace and daintiness which Crabbe never achieved, and probably would never have cared to achieve. "Provost Chivas," on the other hand, is not a mere sketch of externals; it is an attempt at that rendering of a psychological situation with which Mr. Browning has made us familiar. The Provost, rich, respectable, honoured, finds himself in the power of a poor neighbour who began life with him, but who has been outstripped in the race, and made to feel that a civic dignitary could hardly afford to keep a good memory. The Provost affects an unwonted bonhomie; tries in turn cajolery, promises, and threats; fails to accomplish his purpose, and is left to contemplate his coming exposure. The poem is clever, but it is merely clever; we catch the character of the situation more quickly than we do in reading such a study as "Bishop Blonogram's Apology," but we lose interest equally quickly; we are not, as in Mr. Browning's work, taken into the "abysmal depths of personality," and consequently, the poem once read, there is little to return to with any gusto. The same verdict may be passed upon such a sketch as "Dr. Linkletter's Scholar," though it is a tender and touching poem; and it may be said generally that Mr. Smith is most successful when he attempts least, that is, when he confines himself to portraiture of a simple kind, and follows Crabbe rather than Mr. Browning. It is seldom fair to dwell upon weak points and ignore strong ones, but Mr. Smith's strong points are so numerous that they cannot well be missed. He has gained, and deservedly gained, hearty praise, and is not in the position of a puny poet who can be put out of existence by a few words of discriminating criticism. Still, we should be unjust both to Mr. Smith and ourselves, if we did not say that North-Country Folk is an enjoyable volume, and that one poem, "Deacon Dorat's Story," is a powerful piece.

Mrs. King's previous volumes, Aspromonte and The Disciples, were full of such true poetry, that we could not but hope for much from A Book of Dreams; and our hopes have not been altogether disappointed. A Book of Dreams is full of the sort of beauty which belongs to the best pictorial work of the "impressionists," such beauty as can be achieved when line and colour are suggested, rather than adequately rendered. An artist either in words or pigments who adopts this method of presentation may achieve great successes, but he runs the risk of equally great failures, and much as we have enjoyed many, indeed, most of Mrs. King's poems, we should not be surprised to hear that even a sympathetic reader had found them falling short of that minimum of grip and definiteness which the most imaginative work demands, in order that it may leave a sufficiently sharp impression upon the mind. Mrs. King sings of things which cannot be carved, or painted, or spoken, but only sung; of the moods which annihilate time, and make us feel, in visiting some scene we have known long ago, that it must still be a background for a vanished face, instinct with the passion of a dead hour; or which charge the present moment with a mystery of a prelude to some unknown but dimly apprehended symphony. This will sound vague; but the vagueness which fails to represent is preferable to the clearness which misrepresents; and almost any prose description of Mrs. King's work that was clearly realisable would certainly do it an injustice, because it would be a translation into an alien language of what can only be adequately expressed in the mother-tongue of poetry. There is nothing really obscure in this Book of Dreams, nothing that is hard to grasp, but it has much—perhaps too much—of the character of music, and we have to apprehend its meaning in the same way as we apprehend the meaning of the Lieder ohne Worte. Mr. Smith pins us down to the actual; Mrs. King emancipates us from it, and yet leaves us with the consciousness that we are only separated from it by a frail screen, which may at any moment be broken down. There is not a poem in the book which has not in greater or less measure both suggestiveness and beauty, and one entitled "A Starry Sign" has power as well. It is a story of "A city of old days

Beside a river,—all who dwelt therein
Feared God, and served him and obeyed his voice,
And listened for it, and abode in peace."

Night by night the inhabitants of the city read the stars, for they had no other book, and read them with solemn expectation, for sometimes,—

"Amid the white, familiar host
Would suddenly break forth some unknown star,
Or sometimes many stars, of splendour strange,
And mystic message from the lords of life.
At even, or at midnight, or towards dawn
The vision came, and in the depths of heaven
The new stars shone; and this was in their power,—
One only could behold them, and that one
Who saw them, him they called and drew away,
So that he might but follow, east or west,
As the sky held them; and he passed the gate
With his eye fixed upon them, following
Their glory, else invisible to all.
But none of all who passed returned again,
Nor could they speak aright the semblances
Of what they saw, nor that whereby their star
Differed from other stars; but most the light
On their own faces told us of some joy
Hidden from us, and incommunicate."

We do not quote these lines because we think them a specially meritorious specimen of Mrs. King's verse, but simply to indicate the story of the poem, which goes on to tell how at last the starry sign came to the singer, and how she, too, was led forth on the mysterious journey to some unknown glory. The conception is a daring one, for as interest heightens and expectation grows keener it seems more and more impossible that an anti-climax should be avoided; but Mrs. King's imagination has a steady, unfaltering flight, and we are left with that feeling of emotional satisfaction which is the best evidence of success. The motive of this poem is repeated more than once, but there is no wearisomeness in the monotony. In "Summer Lost,"—

"The merles were singing
As evening fell
Of something coming Too sweet to tell;"

in the dream-journey through "A Palace" we read,—

"Yet, head to foot with the approaching capture,
Panting and shuddering, mingles therewithal
An unexplained and unaccounted rapture
As of some mighty marvel to befall;"

and everywhere we are brought to the brink of some revelation of beauty or wonder which is only just beyond. The dreams have their own charm, but they have always a hint of an awakening; and in the last poem, "Awake," we recognise the voice of the enthusiasm of humanity which spoke in The Disciples :—

"Rise up, rise up, O dreamer!
The eastern sky is red;
The trumpet's note is calling,
The storm is overhead."

Down in the trodden highway
Goes to and fro the crowd;
About the market-places
The tumult waxes loud.

And all around are pressing,
Darkness behind, before,
Souls low and heavy-laden
In struggle sad and sore.

These are thine own, thy nearest,
For this brief human space;—
Break not thy bonds before-time,
Nor spurn the earth-bound place.

For over-sweet is slumber
So near the dawn of day;
Could ye not watch with me one hour?
The signals seem to say.

O Christ! whose hour of coming
The stars of morning keep,
Let me be found to meet thee,
Waking, and not asleep."

From Mr. Smith's healthy realism and Mrs. King's rapture it is depressing to enter the atmosphere of sickly sentiment, and occasionally of something even more repellent, in which Mr. George Barlow seems to live his poetic life. Mr. Barlow is very fond of asking questions, and this is the kind of question he likes best to ask:—

"When passion fails us and when Woman fails,—
When we are weary of the roses' scent,
And not one song can bring our souls content,
Yea, when the very flush on Love's cheek pales,—
What help is left us then,—what hope avails?"

The whole volume reeks with this rubbish of milk-and-water maundering about women and roses and kisses, strengthened occasionally with a dash of the eau de vie of commonplace profanity. As we write for people of normally healthy tastes, we will not illustrate our criticism by quotation; but those who wish to verify it by search may find the milk-and-water on almost every page, and the eau de vie in such sonnets as "Christ and England," "Christ and Woman," or the unspeakably offensive "Which is the Greater?" On one page the poet asks, "Am I a pagan?" and as the question is of no earthly interest to any one save to Mr. Barlow himself, we must leave him to answer it; but we can hardly imagine any respectable pagan—Socrates or Seneca, Lucretius or Virgil—being at all anxious to claim him. The one poem in his book which is most conveniently quotable is that which provides a title, for happily it seems to be characterised by nothing worse than absurdity. Mr. Barlow's strength, such as it is, lies in jingle, and when he deprives himself of his rhymes he is as impotent as Samson was when he allowed himself to be deprived of his hair. Here are some lines of what we suppose is intended for blank verse:—

"If you take up your genius-girls
And set them on the stage, and treat them like Mere bloodless, heartless puppets, soulless dolls,
And make them act for several hundred nights
Not like live women, but like dead machines,
Why, the result is certain: either you
Subtract the genius by this constant strain,
Or else, the genius being left, the girl
Herself succumbs, and 'ill have no more of it.
There's not a nervous system that will stand
Acting eight times in six successive days
(As the great Paris actress just has done)
Without deterioration, falling-off,
Ruin of tissue, lessening of its force,
And tender, sweet, suggestive subtlety."

What the "sweet, suggestive subtlety" of tissue may be we do not know; but we do know, or at any rate, firmly believe, that this is the most execrable verse ever written by mortal man. It may be urged that such stuff is not worth attention, and there is much justice in the remark; but this and other volumes by Mr. Barlow are noteworthy, as showing the kind of growth which the seed of our modern pseudo-aestheticism tends to produce, when it falls upon the ordinary mind. Mr. Barlow's mind is very ordinary indeed; but he serves all the better as a warning to rhyming young men who think that fame is to be won by weak imitations of Mr. Swinburne, and inarticulate echoes of Théophile Gautier.

Some critics talk about the poetry of the Victorian age as if it were a homogeneous product. We think that the criticism of the future will not accept this verdict, but will recognise in it at least three differing aims and tendencies,—a healthy realism, a healthy play of the emancipated imagination, and an unhealthy compound of base realism and of insolent imagination, freed not only from fetter, but from sweet and healthy law. Mr. Smith supplies the first, Mrs. King the second, and Mr. Barlow the third.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Molly Maguires of Pennsylvania; or, Ireland in America. Told by Ernest W. Lucy, edited by "C. E." (Bell and Sons.)—We are now familiar with the outlines of the Molly Maguire story; here we have it told in considerable detail. "C. E.'s" American correspondent, who seems to have a special acquaintance with the locality which was the scene of the conspiracy, has furnished various particulars; others have been taken from two works published in America, one of them in German, and the other from the pen of Major Pinkerton, who was head of the Detective Agency in Chicago. Many pages are devoted to a detailed report of James M'Parlan's evidence (M'Parlan, it will be remembered, was the detective who made his way into the confidence of the association, discovered its secrets, and ultimately brought about its dissolution and the punishment of some of its most guilty members). A stranger story never was told. The temper of mind which led to this wonderful development of lawlessness is pitifully expressed in a story which Mr. Lucy tells:—"An Irish emigrant, on landing in New York, is said to have asked if there was a government in his new country. Being told there was, 'Then I'm agen it!' he cried." English wrong-doing may have contributed to the formation of this temper, but something is innate in the blood.

Our Tour in Southern India. By Mrs. J. C. Murray-Aynsley. (F. V. White.)—We must begin by thanking the writer for the unusual brevity of her introduction. She does not begin with a description of Southampton Water, or of the horrors of the Channel passage. On the contrary, we get as far as Venice on the first page, make a very short sojourn at Suez and Djeddah, and actually reach Bombay on page 7. Arrived in India, we have, it is true, a good many digressions, but they are not digressions of which there is any good reason to complain. At Vellore, for instance, we have an interesting account by one of the chief sufferers—an account now published for the first time—of the mutiny of the Sepoys in 1806. Then we hear much about Hyder Ali and Tippoo Sahib. There are not many readers, we fancy, who will be any the worse for having their memories of these personages and their doings refreshed. From Mysore the travellers paid a visit to Coorg, of which there is a particularly interesting account. Bangalore, Cochin, Travancore, Madras, Trichinopoly, are successively visited. Here, of course, the history of the past efforts to Christianise the population, and the account of the present religious condition of the people, supply an important subject, on which Mrs. Murray-Aynsley has carefully informed herself, and about which she writes in a moderate and sensible way. The fifteenth and sixteenth chapters of the book are devoted to Ceylon, and in the last the author returns to Calcutta. There is nothing brilliant or remarkable in any way about the volume; but it is free from bad taste, does not torment its readers with the forced fun which is so inexpressibly tiresome, and is generally sensible and well written.

Unconscious Testimony. By the Rev. Charles F. Hutton. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—Mr. Hutton's plan has been carefully to examine the Hebrew original of the Old Testament, in connection with the Septuagint, and to bring out points which have been obscured by the errors of the translators, and which, when once clearly seen, illustrate the genuineness of the narrative. Keeping this in view, he has produced a number of interesting and instructive notes on various passages in the historical book. In Judges, i., 19, the Greek version reads, "And the Lord was with Judah, and he drove out the inhabitants of the mountain; but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron." This reads like a very strange limitation of the Divine power. The Septuagint reads, however, "because Rechab charged them,"—i.e., not to do so. The Hebrew of the two is not unlike, dissimilar as is the meaning. Mr. Hutton conjectures that the reading crept in from Joshua, xvii., 16. In the story of the death of Absalom, most people will have wondered why, after Joab had thrust three darts through the heart of Absalom, it should still be necessary for his armour-bearers to surround and slay him. Mr. Hutton tells us that the darts were not weapons pointed with iron, a sense in which the Hebrew word is never used, but stakes. Joab, in his haste, seizes the first weapon that comes to his hand, fearing, possibly, that a rescue might be attempted by persons anxious to win the King's favour by saving his son; that the armour-bearers—who were carrying, not his armour, properly so called, but his store of weapons—came up, and finished the deed which he had not been able to accomplish. These are specimens of an interesting little book.

The Renaissance of Art in Italy. By Leader Scott. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Mr. Leader Scott modestly calls this handsome volume, a quarto of between three and four hundred pages, an "illustrated sketch," and attributes any merit that it may possess to the illustrations rather than to the letterpress. The illustrations are certainly both good and abundant, but the description and the criticism are also deserving of much praise. If there is a fault, it is that the pages are too much crowded with names. We know how difficult it is for an author, in the fullness of his knowledge of the subject about which he writes, deliberately to omit; but omission is better than confusion, and confusion is not unlikely to overtake the reader, at least the reader who happens to be a novice in these matters. After an introductory chapter, in which early Italian and Byzantine art, especially architecture (the root of the arts, Mr. Scott thinks) is discussed, we proceed to the main subject. This is treated of in four books, dealing respectively with the rise, the development, the culmination, and the decline of Italian Art. In each of the first three, literature, painting, sculpture, architecture, and the decorative arts are successively discussed.

My Connaught Cousins, by Harriett Jay (White), is not an improvement upon "The Queen of Connaught," or even "The Priest's Blessing." Miss Jay seems to have made a mistake in writing not a single story, but a collection of tales connected by a very slender thread of narrative. Of these, the story of Rose Merton is the most powerful, and the most decidedly Irish. The character, however, of the offending landlord, who, of course, comes to a violent end, seems to us to be unnecessarily repulsive. Rose Merton herself is well drawn, and the "Connaught cousins" are such pleasant girls, and their father is such a good Irish type, that one wishes Miss Jay had paid more attention to them, and less to Irish miseries and grievances. Stedman, who visits them, and into whose arms Oona, the dreamer and story-teller of the number, falls rather too readily at the end of the third volume, is a very conventional London barrister; and Miss Jay's humour is rather farcical, and too redolent of whisky even for Ireland. The Connaught Cousins would have been all the better without a heavy-shotted "Prefatory Note," by Mr. Robert Buchanan, which savours too much of the art of the puffiste littéraire.

A Short History of the English Parliament. By Andrew Bisset. (Williams and Norgate.)—How Mr. Bisset should have supposed that he was presenting the public with a history of the English Parliament, or, for that matter, with the history of anything, when he issued this book, is a mystery. It is simply a hotch-potch of personal anecdotes, ultra-Radical and ultra-bitter pamphleteering against feudalism and other bêtes noires of the author's, and of quotations from dramas, speeches, historical works, and what not, on almost everything and everybody political under the sun. Mr. Bisset means well, and with many of his political views we sympathise; but he has probably fewer of the qualities of the historian than any man who has ever attempted that difficult character. As for the style in which it is written, here is a specimen:—"I suppose the Devil is as old, perhaps a little older, than Domesday Book. The Devil, too, was not only alive, but kicking, when the author of Domesday Book reduced the northern counties of England to a desert." There are so many quotations in Mr. Bisset's book, some of them, too, of considerable value, that if he had supplied it with an index, it might, as a reference-book, have given amusement, and possibly even a little edification.

Loys, Lord Berresford; and other Tales. By the Author of "Phyllis," "Molly Bawn," "Mrs. Geoffrey," &c. (Smith, Elder, and Co.)—We distinctly and strongly disapprove of the growing custom of labelling volumes of short tales so as to represent them as an ordinary three-volume novel. It is grossly unfair to the public,—both to that portion of it which wishes for a comfortably long story, and to that which loves short tales, and looks in vain for them on the circulating-library shelves or counters. The work before us—printed on poor, soft paper—is labelled on the back, "Loys, Lord Berresford, Volumes I., II., and III.," but when we got to the middle of the first volume, we were pulled up short,—the story was at an end. "Loys, Lord Berresford, 3 vols.," is nothing of the sort; it is a collection of short tales, averaging six tales to a volume. Short tales are delightful, when they are all gems, each complete, unique, and a perfect picture in itself; but such short tales are very rare. Of course they are often good and clever, and even when they are not so, if honestly labelled as "Tales," they have every right to take their place in the struggle for public favour; often, however, these collected short stories are poor, ephemeral things, that, if they serve their day, can do no more, and ought not to crowd the shelves of the future, especially with something like a fib upon their covers. The seventeen short tales before us—principally written in the present tense, like descriptions of tableaux—are harmless, spirited little love-stories; some pretty, and even a little touching; some absurdly farcical,—witness "The Dilemma," and the one in which Snooks, at the suggestion of a friend, proposes to four sisters at the same ball, to help him out of the scrape in which his first thoughtless proposal has involved him; but all deal with exceedingly pretty girls and handsome fellows with handles to their names; and everything happens in beautiful summer, and all comes delightfully right in the end, not always with sufficient poetical justice. By all the rules, not only of honour, but of the very commonest morality, Loys, Lord Berresford, should have met with condign punishment; he deliberately sets himself to win a girl who, he is distinctly told, before he is even introduced, is engaged; he wins her, and, because he is rich, and titled, and attractive, he is forgiven all round, though his antecedents are known to have been abominable, and his treachery to the accepted suitor fully recognised. We cannot admire the evident pliability and complacency with which the author regards this fascinating nobleman's conduct. The slightness of the tales will be indicated, when we say that "Lydia," for example, is a brief account of how Lord Fenton, or Lord Charles Fenton—for he is thus indifferently styled—begs Lydia not to cultivate the acquaintance of a certain gentleman; how Lydia indignantly refuses to grant his request, and does so in offensive language; and how, after a few days of misery, they fall into each other's arms. "Krin," again, merely narrates how Corinna Crofton got locked up in a ruin with Lord Rowden, and came home as the future Lady Rowden, which appeased mamma's displeasure for the fright which her prolonged absence had given her. "What a Mad World It Is, my Masters," is—like the letter in "The Dilemma"—an unconscious plagiarism, an almost exactly similar tale having appeared in London Society four years ago. But any of the tales may wile away a wearisome quarter of an hour pleasantly enough.

Constantia Carew, by Emma Marshall (Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday), is an autobiography in one volume, which deserves a word of commendation, as being much superior to ordinary religious fiction. It is a simple, every-day story of lay life, tinged with clericality; reality and activity are its notes. Mrs. Marshall's sensibility has a tendency to degenerate into "gush," but the fault is feminine, and not incurable. Constantia Carew and her lover, Cathbert, are rather common-place, though Mrs. Marshall intends them to be the reverse; but Hinchcliffe, a vigorous old rebel against the conventional proprieties, recalls, though ever so slightly, the manner of Charlotte Brontë.

Songs in Sunshine. By the Rev. Frederick Langbridge. (Eyre and Spottiswoode.)—Mr. Langbridge modestly commends his verses to the public, as being easy to read and made to sing. We accept both pleas. We may add that they are not only easy, but pleasant reading, and may well be—but here we cannot speak of positive knowledge—effective when sung. Many, most, indeed, of the pieces have already been received with favour, as they have appeared in the pages of various magazines, and their reappearance in this collected form is fully justified. Here is one, which has nothing remarkable about it, except it be that indefinable something, "go," to use a popular phrase, which some very clever writers of verse never seem able to attain:—

"WAITING FOR A LETTER.
The postman's hour draws near,
And into the quiet street
Through gossamer curtains peer
Two wistful eyes and sweet.
For many a weary morn
She has kept her station there,
That brave little heart forlorn,
That never will quite despair.
Slowly she turns away,
The crushed heart murmuring still,
'It has not come to-day—
To-morrow I know it will.'
The postman knows her tale,
And it makes his old heart bleed;
Those blush-rose cheeks grown pale
Are pages a child might read.
Ah! letters enough he brings—
Great circulars blue and grim,
Slight feminine scented things—
But never a line from him.
Slowly she turns away,
The crushed heart murmuring still,
'It has not come to-day—
To-morrow I know it will.'
Bat-tat! to the door she flies—
O rapture keen and dumb!
O eloquent cheeks and eyes!
Her letter has come—has come!
O postman pocket the gold—
Full well hast thou earned the fee—
And treasure the thanks untold,
That are better than gold to thee!
Flow, happy fountains, flow,
Sweet founts that have long been dry!
Sorrow may tears forego,
But rapture must weep or die."

Shakespeare's Historical Plays. By Charles Wordsworth, D.C.L., Bishop of St. Andrews. Vols. II. and III. (Blackwood and Sons.)—Bishop Wordsworth has completed in these volumes the task of editing, with a certain amount of revision, excision, and abbreviation, Shakespeare's historical plays. It is, we take it, generally allowed that he has performed a task of extreme difficulty with remarkably good-taste and judgment. If he has erred, it has been, we should be inclined to say, on the side of timidity rather than of boldness. Even if we could be sure that all that we find in the plays is Shakespeare's own, this would be no valid ground for sacrificing what all would allow to be intrinsically worthless, for the sake of convenience and decency. As it is, we have good reason for knowing that there is no little "gag" in the text as we have it. Shakespeare, with that curious indifference which is one of the most puzzling things about him, seems to have let it stand. But it is not sacred because it is found in the First Folio. Of course the task of removing it requires a skilful and reverent hand. Such Bishop Wordsworth, one of the ablest and most enthusiastic of Shakespearian scholars, has proved himself to possess, and we congratulate him on the success with which he has performed his task.

Jack-by-the-Hedge. By Selina Gaye. (Seeley and Co.)—This, we are told, is a true story, and a very good story, too. Jack is a "waif," whom a kind-hearted lawyer, who knows better than most men who is his "neighbour," befriends. He becomes gardener's boy, page, then office clerk. Then comes the great catastrophe, which bids fair to ruin his career, but which ends by promoting it. The story is told with simplicity and good-taste, and with a religious feeling which is evident, without being obtrusive.—The Countess Violet, by Minnie Douglas (David Bogue), is a tale of a very different kind. It starts in magnificent fashion with a Countess in her own right, a girl yet in her teens, for heroine. The Countess develops an admirable disposition, and initiates the most judicious and useful schemes of charity. She has two guardians, who present the usual contrasts,—the elderly man of the world who is all coldness and caution, and the young man who catches the contagion of her enthusiasm, and with it another ailment not unlikely to be produced under the circumstances. The story is wholesome, and not unreadable, but it does not commend itself by any impression of reality.

The Midnight Cry, by E. M'Hardie (S. W. Partridge and Co.), presents the voucher of Lord Shaftesbury for its value. It is a work on prophecy, and is described as "an inquiry into the evidence (chronological, historical, and phenomenal, &c.), of the near approach of the Second Advent."—The Book of Enoch the Prophet, translated by the late Archbishop of Cashel (Lawrence), with an introduction by "the Evolution of Christianity" (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.), a work which opens up many curious questions in New Testament criticism. The editor contends that the New Testament Scriptures contain numerous references to this book. He has put these together in parallel columns; and they are certainly worth examining.—Sermons on the Lord's Prayer, by Augustus W. Hare, (Smith, Elder, and Co.)

Physics in Pictures, with Explanatory Text, prepared by Theodore Eckhardt and translated by A. H. Keane (Stanford), belongs to "Stanford's Series of Instructive Picture-books." The "principal natural phenomena and appliances" are pictorially represented. The scope of the work is almost too large. "A Locomotive," "A Section of a Full-rigged Screw Corvette," "A Morse Writing Telegraph," "A Microscope," "A Spectroscope," are among the subjects of the thirty coloured plates. Then, again, in quite another direction we get "A Watch," "A Water-wheel," and, again, in a third, "An Aurora Borealis." But the usefulness of the book is beyond all question.

Two pamphlets on important points of domestic economy deserve a brief notice. Babies: How to Rear Them, by F. A. Fawkes (W. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.), is full of sensible suggestions. We shall quote one paragraph, derived from the author's own experience:—"In one family, the children, almost from birth, were given just what the parents had, meat, vegetables, puddings, &c. In another family, two beautiful, healthy little girls were fed from birth on boiled corn-flour and milk, one died at nine months, the other at twelve months of age, both from convulsions. Another infant was fed from birth on biscuit-powder and milk, with an occasional raw egg. Another had raw eggs beaten up in tea. Several had sponge cakes (a cooked compound of eggs, sugar, and flour), soaked in milk. One mother confessed to having given an infant "nips of gin, whenever she had it" (about six or seven times a day). "The poor little thing died of delirium tremens at nine months!" Meat and pudding will seem unreasonable to most people, but there are thousands of intelligent mothers who give their babies spoon-food at a very early age. To do so before they are at least eight months old is as bad as poisoning them. They may not die—poisons do not always kill—but they are to suffer. The other pamphlet (which has reached a third edition), is Our Domestic Poisons; or, the Poisonous Effects of Certain Dyes and Colours Used in Domestic Fabrics. By Henry Carr. (Ridgway.)

We have received:—Italian Rambles, by J. Jackson Jarves (Putnam's Sons, New York).—A third and enlarged edition of E. Wallace's Outlines of the Philosophy of Aristotle (Clay and Son).—A third edition of The Alps, and How to See Them, by J. E. Maddock, (Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.).—Aristotle's Ethics Explained by Question and Answer, by K. D. Cotes, M.A.—Companion to Algebra, by L. Marshall, M.A. (Rivingtons).—A new and revised edition of W. K. Wygram's Twelve Wonderful Tales (Bentley and Son).—Middle England (Plantonets—Tudors), edited by J. G. Hefford, B.A., being No. III. of the "History Readers" published by Marcus Ward and Co.—Macaulay's Warren Hastings, edited, with introduction and notes, for use in elementary schools, by S. Hales, (Longmans, Green, and Co.).—Standard VI. Reader, an addition to the excellent educational series published by Messrs. Griffith and Farran. It is furnished with an appendix of explanatory notes, a glossary, and short biographical notes of the authors quoted from.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection generally employed by the "eye-vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT writes—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." The Rev. Professor W. A. Hale, M.A. Cantab., 2 Minford Gardens, West Kensington Park, writes—"The Spectacles are perfect, and a most decided boon. I had occasion on Monday to write to Lord and took the opportunity to mention your name, and the wonderful power of your Spectacles." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age (82). I can now read the smallest type, although suffering from cataract on the right eye." Testimonials from Earl and Countess Lindsay; F. D. Dixon Hartland, Esq., M.P.; the Venerable Archdeacon Palmer, Clifton; Rev. Mother Abbess, St. Mary's Abbey, Mill Hill, Hendon; G. J. Alford, Esq., Gas Light and Coke Company, Horseferry Road, Westminster, &c. Mr. HENRY LAURANCE, F.R.S., Oculist Optician, 39 OLD BOND STREET, W. The popularity Pepsine has acquired as almost a specific for chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, &c., is due to the fact that it is the nearest possible production of the active principle of the gastric juice of the stomach. Unfortunately, like all other inventions of a like nature, Pepsine has been not slightly discredited by the spurious manufactures that have been issued from time to time; it is therefore necessary as a guarantee of its efficacy to see that each bottle bears the maker's name.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THERE is no farther news of the unpleasant affair in Madagascar, but there seems no danger at all that it is likely to cause any disagreement between France and England. M. Challemlacour's statement in the Chamber of Deputies on Monday was a most satisfactory and temperate one. Admiral Pierre had been specially ordered to respect English susceptibilities in his operations on the coast of Madagascar, and M. Challemlacour could hardly believe that he had failed to do so; but, he added, "If, which we cannot suppose, any serious mistake or misunderstanding has occurred, in which passion played a part, we should not hesitate to fulfil the obligations imposed on us by the spirit of justice and the interests of the country." M. Challemlacour further paid a tribute to the moderation and courtesy of Mr. Gladstone's and Lord Granville's tone, in their communications to Parliament on the subject. Lord Lyons is leaving Paris for a holiday, so little does he seem to apprehend any difficulty in the matter; and all accounts agree that the confidence between France and England is heartier just now than it has been for some years back.

The negotiation concerning the Suez Canal has been the great subject of the week; and we may say of the agitation against it, that the week which came in like a lion has gone out like a lamb. The fury and resentment expressed yesterday week and on Saturday were almost ludicrous, one of the speakers at the Lloyd's meeting of ship-owners, for instance, asserting, amidst loud laughter, that residence in Egypt had "emasculated the brains" of Sir Rivers Wilson and Sir John Stokes, and speaking of the treaty which they had signed as "disgraceful." Even a Liberal paper, the Daily News, wrote so as to convey the impression that the fall of the Government that concluded this agreement would be satisfactory to its editor, while the Times thundered against the Government with something of its old passion, if not of its old power. However, as the conditions of the case came to be better understood, this tone moderated rapidly. In Liverpool, on Tuesday, the Council of the Incorporated Chamber of Commerce carried, by only 11 votes to 7, a very mild resolution, asking the Government not to ratify the agreement while there was a chance of better terms, the minority of seven having supported a motion of delay, with the avowed object of waiting for a more reasonable temper in relation to an agreement which the minority substantially approved; while the Directors of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce on Monday, though passing a resolution that the concessions obtained were inadequate, spoke with the strongest condemnation of the violence of the disappointed shipowners.

Mr. Childers received a deputation on the subject yesterday week, from the Associated Chambers of Commerce, and replied with great ability and firmness. He pointed out that the Company presided over by M. de Lesseps had, in the belief of her Majesty's Government, obtained an exclusive right to pierce the Isthmus of Suez with a commercial canal; that they had obtained this exclusive right at a time when most people ridiculed the enterprise as chimerical, and when they had to embark on a very difficult and costly undertaking with very uncertain hopes of a return; that M. de Lesseps was willing to enlarge his works, and even to give the commerce of the world a separate up and down line on his Canal, under his present concession, and on his own terms; and that though the new line which he must construct under his present concession is not by any means the best, it is still good enough to give the company a complete command of the situation so far as making terms with us goes. The concessions which the Government had obtained from M. de Lesseps were very substantial concessions, both as to remission of dues, and as to better and more English management, and in Mr. Childers's belief they were the best which M. de Lesseps and his Company would grant. It was almost a question between leaving everything to the Company's own enlightened self-interest with its present resources, and accepting the very substantial advantages offered under the agreement.

The Report of the British Directors of the Suez Canal, Sir J. Stokes and Sir C. Rivers Wilson, was published on Monday, and it would have been well, we think, if it had been ready for publication, and had been laid on the table of both Houses on the day when Mr. Childers made his first statement. The directors point out that the separate up-and-down line of canal secured under the agreement—a much better one than any which M. de Lesseps could construct without a new concession of land—would remove those obstacles to the traffic which now create so much complaint; that so soon as the dividend reaches thirty per cent., the amount of profit surrendered under this agreement to the mercantile world would reach £1,175,000; and that the appointment of an English "inspector of navigation" and the engagement of English pilots would remove almost all the small inconveniences appertaining to the foreign origin of the Company; and finally, that the advance of English capital is solely desirable to the French Company on account of the saving in the rate of interest,—which saving the agreement provides that the mercantile community shall receive in the shape of diminished dues. Indeed, we ourselves have no doubt that the French Company would have been only too glad, for every other reason, to raise their new capital in France, and so enlist against the English influence the disastrous power of the French stock-jobbers.

A remarkable little discussion took place on the Suez-Canal agreement in the House of Lords on Tuesday, Lord Granville remarking that the opposition of Lord Palmerston to the Suez-Canal scheme had given a great stimulus to the raising of the capital in France, and that it would now be most unbecoming and dishonourable in us to use our position in Egypt to diminish the fair returns of an enterprise which our Government had opposed and run down, when it was a doubtful adventure. Even if we had conquered Egypt, it would have been impossible so to abuse our position as to interfere forcibly with the rights of M. de Lesseps and his Company,—as impossible as for an English nobleman who had granted to one hotel proprietor the sole right of building an hotel on his estate, to offer like terms to a competitor without the former's consent.

Upon this speech of Lord Granville's, Lord Salisbury made a most extraordinary comment. He deplored the fact that her Majesty's Government had countenanced M. de Lesseps in a view of his monopoly which made it a standing obstacle to the commerce of the world, and which enabled him or his successors for more than one hundred years "to bar all other industry and enterprise in the junction of the two seas." "I doubt very much the competence of the Sultan or the Khedive to make an agreement that would debar nations from the natural right of passage across the Isthmus of Suez for the commerce of the world. Supposing there had been some improvement in the Dardanelles or the Cattegut, would it have been within the competence of the Sultan's Government or the Danish Government to place an artificial limit on the passage of the commerce of the world? Well might Lord Selborne reply that Lord Salisbury seemed to speak "as if the Isthmus of Suez, before the Canal was made, had been a natural maritime highway and channel for the commerce of the world, as if it had not been any part of the Egyptian territory, as if no territorial concession had been required for it." Why, if Lord Salisbury's line of argument has any force in it, France and Germany would have the right to make a second line of the Clyde and Forth Canal, against the will of the British Government, and without reference to the rights of the owners of the present Canal.

The London Chamber of Commerce met on Wednesday at the Cannon-Street Hotel, under the presidency of Mr. Herbert Tritton, the Chairman of the Council, who made a very temperate speech on the subject of the Government proposal for the Suez Canal, in which, while doing full justice to the rights of M. de Lesseps and the present Company, he insisted on the intention of the Khedive in the original concession to form a "universal Company," directed by a "Council, composed of the principal nationalities interested in the enterprise." No doubt that was a part of the original design, but it was a part of it deliberately foiled by Lord Palmerston, who was advised that the whole concern was a swindle, and who would not hear of any English representative element in the Council. Even Mr. Disraeli in the Tory Government of 1866-68,—not of course in that of 1874-1880,—took the same line, and did all he could to render the representative character of the scheme impossible; so that it is hardly feasible now for us to try and revive, as a matter of abstract right, a principle of national representation in the Council which we were the first to ignore and defeat when the Company was founded. Alderman Cotton's speech was in a very different tone from Mr. Tritton's,—in the true spirit of the commercial Jingo. "They ought to see," the Standard reports him to have said, "that the second Suez Canal was made in English interests, and English interests only. Ostensibly it is not, but really, and in his own mind, he considered Egypt was England's property." This is the kind of view which gets for commercial England so mean a repute in the public opinion of the world. The rest of the discussion was in a better tone, and the resolution carried was in favour of a commission of inquiry,—a futile recommendation, as there is nothing uncertain which a commission of inquiry could find out.

The Daily News resents the criticism very naturally made on its attitude towards the Government on the Suez Canal question. But our contemporary has quite mistaken the point. Even a loyal supporter of the Government may find himself at times constrained to oppose some proposal of the Ministry, or to censure their management of a measure of which he may chance to approve. We have occasionally been in that predicament ourselves. The complaint against the Daily News is that it passes judgment on the immoral system of condemning first and inquiring afterwards. Last Saturday, when the Daily News opened its battery upon the Government, it had no fair presumption against the prudence of such a Government as this, and did not even know the facts on which the Government had founded its judgment. Surely, the duty of a loyal Liberal journal under such circumstances was to counsel moderation and patience. What the Daily News did was to prejudge the case against the Government, and make a bitter attack upon it. Nor is this the only occasion on which the Daily News has exhibited an impatient eagerness to damage the cause which it professes to support. We all remember the astounding series of articles in which, outstripping even the zeal of the Jingo, it advocated a precipitate declaration of war against Afghanistan, on the repulse of Sir Neville Chamberlain's mission at Ali Masjid. It is a humiliating fact for Liberals that in a grave crisis like the present, the Standard is the only paper in the morning Press of London in which they can look for a statesmanlike and dispassionate discussion of the questions in debate.

The opinion of the French physician, Dr. Vulpian, who saw the Count de Chambord last Sunday, and stayed some days at Frohsdorf, is said to be more favourable than that of his Austrian medical advisers, and there seems to have been some little rally. No one, however, appears to look for any real recovery. It is stated that the Count de Paris, during his stay at Frohsdorf, was given, at the express desire of the Count de Chambord, what is there called "the King's place" at table. Nor is there any reasonable doubt that the Count de Chambord regards the Count de Paris as the rightful inheritor of any Royal tradition of claim to the French Throne which he himself can transmit. The Count de Paris is much too shrewd to attach substantial value to this inheritance.

Lord Dufferin made not only an amusing, but a very hopeful speech concerning Egypt, at the dinner of the Worshipful Company of Grocers on Wednesday, where he declared that he should have been very glad to enlarge on such subjects as Egyptian politics and the Suez Canal,—subjects especially calculated by their uncontroversial character for after-dinner speeches,—if he did not indulge a wholesome fear of Lord Granville's taking him to task at breakfast on the following morning, and also a just fear of the effect of the questions of the Fourth Party as to the prudence of his speech. Nevertheless, he would say that "seldom have the people of England had greater reason to be contented with the achievements of their Naval and Military forces than in connection with the late Egyptian campaign. I am not alluding to the destruction of the forts of Alexandria, to the capture of Tel-el-Kebir, and of Cairo. What I am referring to are the gratifying results which, I trust, are destined to follow from these remarkable events. The only justification for war is that the peace which it is undertaken to insure should be prolific in benefits infinitely exceeding the risk and sacrifices it causes, and the amount of human misery it never fails to entail. That the Egyptian campaign will triumphantly stand this test, I unhesitatingly assert. The struggle was short and decisive, but it opened up to Egypt such prospects of peace and the dawn of such a day as was never dreamed of by themselves or their predecessors for centuries." We earnestly hope that Lord Dufferin is not too sanguine. If he is right, the English Parliament must desist from its fatal attempt to manage Egypt from Westminster, and the British Resident in Cairo must imitate the British Residents in India, and interfere with the Native Administration only when that Administration is doing substantial injustice, not when it is simply ignoring European methods of justice.

The House went into Committee on Tuesday afternoon on the Agricultural Holdings Bill, and the great question of "the sitting tenant's" claim for improvements was raised pretty early by Mr. Borlase. The complaint is that a tenant who is not willing to leave his holding rather than have his rent raised, is liable to have that rent raised (so far as it may be raised without driving him to the expense of removal) on his own improvements, a condition of things for which Mr. Borlase desires to find a remedy, but for which, as we argue elsewhere, and as was indeed admitted in the House by some of the best friends of "the sitting tenant," there is hardly any conceivable remedy short of a Court to fix a fair rent, such as has been established in Ireland,—for which in England nobody wishes. Even though a remaining tenant were allowed on the raising of his rent to claim a sum down as compensation for his improvements, the landlord could, of course, always raise the rent so far as not only to cover the interest on that compensation, but something more as well, representing the intensity of the tenant's reluctance to leave. The House saw this, and the amendment was negatived by 196 to 45.

A very unfortunate amendment was carried by Mr. Balfour, who proposed that in respect of improvements for which the consent of the landlord need not be asked, the compensation shall never exceed the amount of the outlay. The objection to this is that it discourages good agriculture. The tenant knows for certain that if his intended improvements do not turn out to be real improvements, that is, do not add to the value of the holding, he must lose the whole outlay. His compensation, then, ought not to be so closely limited as this amendment will limit it in relation to those improvements which are successful, and which add more than the amount of the outlay to the value of the holding, otherwise he will be liable to indefinite loss on unsuccessful improvements, and if turned out will secure only an unprofitable compensation even for his most successful improvements. Mr. Balfour's amendment was, nevertheless, carried by 141 votes to 133, to the great annoyance of the Government, who speaking by Mr. Dodson, described the amendment on Wednesday as one gravely diminishing the value of the Bill. Probably the Government will invite the House on the Report to reconsider this amendment.

The Corrupt Practices Bill passed through Committee yesterday week. In the sitting of that day a new clause was added to the Bill, making it a corrupt practice to promise the withdrawal of a candidate in consideration of any payment or promise of payment; and in the evening sitting the Attorney-General explained the general effect of those clauses limiting the maximum of election expense, from which there is, we think, the best hope of a wholesome and reasonable effect. He hoped, he said, by these clauses, to reduce the expense of a general election from £2,500,000, which was its cost in 1880, to £800,000. The county elections alone, without counting returning officers' expenses and a few others, had cost £615,800; and the borough elections had cost £595,424, excluding the same kind of expenses. Under the proposed Bill, he hoped to reduce the same class of county expenses to £200,000, and of borough expenses to £209,000, or to reduce them to less than one-third of the old sum in the case of the counties, and to nearly one-third in the case of the boroughs. In cases of a joint candidature, he proposed to subtract one-fourth from the allowable expenses of two such candidates on account of their occupying a joint Committee-room, so that if £500 were the sum allowed under the Bill for a single candidate, the sum admissible for a joint candidature in the same constituency would be £1,000 less by £250, or £750,—a proposal which elicited some very angry objections. And a new discussion on the permissible maximum seems likely to be raised on the report.

Mr. Mundella made an interesting speech on the religious effect of the Education Bill, this day week, at the Crystal Palace, when distributing the prizes for Scriptural knowledge to the children of the London Board Schools. In all the London Board Schools the Bible is read, with such explanations and religious instruction as are suited to the capacity of the children, and but one complaint has been made by parents on that head since Mr. Mundella became Vice-President, in 1880, a complaint by a father, which, owing to the mother's remonstrance, was not persisted in; and yet these London Board Schools deal with 300,000 children. On the passing of the Education Act in 1870, only 2,000,000 children were under education in England and Scotland; now there are 4,700,000, and almost all,—Mr. Mundella said "practically all,"—these children receive religious instruction in the Board Schools or Denominational schools in which they are educated. A better test still of the effect of education on religious teaching is the increase, so far as it can be tested, in attendance on Sunday-schools. There are now more than 4,000,000 children under Sunday-school teaching, and as the infants do not attend Sunday-schools, that is a larger attendance of children above the age of infants in Sunday schools than there is in the day-schools. In other words, the increase of secular education, instead of displacing, has largely increased, religious education.

The University of London must certainly be given credit for complete impartiality. In its new matriculation list, containing 554 names—the number of candidates was no less than 932—two girls come second and third upon the list, and were only prevented from beating all the boys by a Roman Catholic lad, between sixteen and seventeen years of age, educated in the excellent school at Beaumont College, Old Windsor. This boy received the first exhibition, and a pupil of the same school took the fourth place, with a prize of £10; while three more among the first eight are Catholic students also. No one can say that the University of London shows partiality either of sex or religion, and as regards religion, it has succeeded marvellously, as the Roman Catholics themselves admit, in stimulating the education of a class of schools which entertained at one time a strong prejudice against its system. Indeed, neither the sex nor the religion of the candidates is known to the Examiners when they examine the papers, so that it would be hard for them to show partiality.

The O'Connor Don had the courage to attempt a contest at Wexford,—the borough for which Mr. Healy sat before his election for Monaghan,—but was beaten on Tuesday by a majority of 181, 307 voting for Mr. W. H. K. Redmond, and only 126 for the O'Connor Don. At the general election, however, the Liberal was beaten by a still greater majority, the Home-rule candidate having obtained a majority of 197. The crowd on the day of election was a very angry one, and the police had to fix their bayonets; whereupon the crowd charged them, in spite of their fixed bayonets, and as many as thirty persons in the crowd are said to have received bayonet wounds. That is a nasty and very significant gauge of the violence of Irish feeling against the present Government. The O'Connor Don is an Irishman of the highest standing and character, a Catholic and a Celt, and as Liberal as any sincere adherent of the Union can be; yet the mob were so infuriated with his candidature as to invite bayonet wounds, the last thing an ordinary mob will risk.

The Bishop of Peterborough's state is, we deeply regret to say, one to cause the gravest anxiety. Indeed, if we may interpret the bulletins by the usual canons, very little hope is entertained of his recovery.

Mr. Bright made an interesting speech on Wednesday at the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind, Upper Norwood, pointing out the great advantages which the College confers on its students;—indeed, it enables four-fifths of them, in spite of their blindness, to win their bread by their own exertions, and to become far more independent than less educated people in full enjoyment of their sight. He remarked especially on the bodily exercises of the blind students, congratulating himself that he could not be compelled to attempt the feats which they so easily performed; and he insisted that in opening a career to the blind, i.e., giving them courage and hope and self-confidence, the College at Norwood does more for the blind than a great many schools do for those who are not blind. As the College does often admit poor students, so far as the public generosity enables it to do so, Mr. Bright's speech may do something to open its advantages to those blind children or youths who could not otherwise command them, if it brings new subscriptions to this admirable institution.

The Rev. John Henry Timins, Vicar of West Malling, the clergyman who was found to have poisoned Sarah Ann Wright, by administering to her a teaspoonful of bitter almonds by mistake for sweet oil of almonds, was acquitted of all criminal liability on Wednesday by the jury at Maidstone. Mr. Justice Day, who tried the case, seems to have summed up with great impartiality, pointing out that the chemist had warned Mr. Timins of the dangerous nature of the drug, and that it was for the jury to say whether his negligence in administering it had been criminal. The jury decided, after five minutes' consideration, in the negative, and every one will rejoice that Mr. Timins, who has long held a high character in a parish where he has been vicar for nearly a generation, was so leniently dealt with. Nevertheless, negligence of that kind is hardly excusable, especially in one who, like Mr. Timins, had studied medicine in his youth, and must have known the terrible danger of confusing a very poisonous with a somewhat similar, though perfectly harmless drug. Reckless doctoring is about the most dangerous form of reckless painstaking. If you take pains to interfere in the struggle between life and death, but interfere on the side of death after all, the recklessness had better have come a stage earlier, and prevented the interference.

The Irish medical men are greatly offended that a mere knighthood has been offered to—and accepted by—Dr. Porter, of Merrion Square, one of their most distinguished physicians. This is, they say, derogatory to Irish medicine, as Irish, no less than English, physicians of equal merit have till now been offered a baronetcy, and not a mere knighthood. Moreover, the Irish surgeons and physicians say that offers of honours of this kind have for some time back been conspicuous chiefly "by their absence" in Ireland, and that after so long an interval to offer only a knighthood is rather an indication of an intention to put Ireland on a lower level, than of a repentant mind. Nevertheless, Dr. Porter has accepted the knighthood. Would it not have been better for the profession to memorialise Dr. Porter to refuse it, than to go to the Lord-Lieutenant and complain that he did not honour them as they deserved? Dignity should, we think, under the circumstances, have silenced the voice of their injured sensibilities.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE SUEZ CANAL.

THE English people in one of its periodical frets and fumes is one of the most amusing spectacles on earth, to those who can look on calmly from outside. These frets and fumes usually arise from its having possessed itself, without the least evidence to go upon, with the notion that it had some absolute and exclusive prerogative to dictate to others, which it finds, to its great dismay, suddenly disputed or ignored. When Russia interfered with the Government of Turkey before the Crimean War, when France proposed to annex Savoy and Nice as the compensation for her Italian war, when the United States put an embargo on the cotton exports of the South, and when Russia again presumed to have a policy in Afghanistan, we had instances of this curious effervescence of indignant incredulity at the gross presumption of Powers which dared to interfere with English wishes and prepossessions. It has been the same now, on the discovery that M. de Lesseps has an "exclusive right," dating for ninety-nine years from the completion of the first Canal, to pierce the Isthmus of Suez; and that Egypt, far from being, in Alderman Cotton's language, "the property of England," had long ago granted away to the Company of M. de Lesseps a privilege with which, except by mere violence and fraud, it is impossible for us to interfere. The inarticulate dismay, and noisy, though far from lucid, indignation, at this discovery were so great, that the Government for some days had to bear all the discredit of having opened the people's eyes to this unpleasant fact; and even now, though the public mind is growing cooler, there is a good deal of that disposition to swear at your advisers for telling you the truth which we so often see in choleric men who have mistakenly persuaded themselves that their wishes are the law of the Universe. As to the facts, however, there is no doubt; nor do we believe that the late Government ever had the smallest doubt about the facts themselves, in spite of their frantic efforts to find doors of escape from the cruel stubbornness of those facts. In the first place, the Khedive's concession of 1854 gave M. de Lesseps and his Company the "exclusive" right of Canal traffic over the Isthmus of Suez for ninety-nine years from the completion of their enterprise. In the next place, the further concession of 1856 recited and confirmed the concession of 1854, except as to certain expressly-mentioned stipulations, amongst which, of course, the "exclusive right" conferred is not one. In the third place, Lord Salisbury's attempt to break through this concession by questioning the Sultan's confirmation of it,—even if we could in any case have honourably availed ourselves of such a trick, when we have paid the Sultan's authority in Egypt the compliment of doing all we can to undermine it,—is perfectly baseless. The Firman of 1866 confirms expressly the agreement of February 22nd, 1866; and the agreement of February 22nd, 1866, expressly recites the list given in the contract of March 18th, 1863, in which the concessions of 1854 and 1856 are carefully enumerated. There is absolutely no escape from the exclusiveness of M. de Lesseps' claim, unless it can be shown either that his exclusive right was not exclusive, because not meant to exclude other Companies from doing what he alone was authorised to do; or, as Lord Salisbury proposes to maintain, that it is a breach of the international right of other countries for any national Government to confer an exclusive right of making a new canal through its territory. As neither of these doctrines is likely to command much favour, even from Englishmen in a fume, we may assume that the Government is in a perfectly impregnable position so far as they have acted on the principle that if they want M. de Lesseps to remit any privilege to which his monopoly entitles him, they must make it worth his while to meet their views.

Of course, it is a very different question whether the agreements which the Government have extracted from M. de Lesseps are worth the terms which they have offered him for them. But the truth is that the irritation with which the various mercantile authorities in this country have discovered that we could not honourably force M. de Lesseps' hand, has hardly left them the necessary tranquillity for comparing accurately what the Government have got with what the Government have given for that which they have got. The way to look at it is to put yourself in the place of the French Company with dividends already touching 20 per cent., a very confident belief that they will within a very few years reach 30 per cent., and no visible reason why, if they can but enlarge the facilities for traffic, they should not be able to earn a very much larger dividend still, long before the ninety-nine years are expired. Now, can they greatly enlarge the facilities for traffic, without a new concession? Undoubtedly they can. We believe that there is no reasonable doubt that they may make something like a double canal with the land already at their disposal, to say nothing of the deepening, widening, and cutting sidings, to which Mr. Dillwyn's proposed inquiry refers. It would, we believe, take a new concession to give the canal a separate entrance for the up and down traffic; and beyond this, there would be one or two points at which the double canal would have to be narrowed into a single canal, if made under the conditions of the present concession. But though these limitations would be inconvenient, and greatly increase the danger of collisions and obstructions at one or two points, they would not be so inconvenient as to prevent a very great enlargement of the facilities of traffic, and, therefore, a very great enlargement of the possibilities of profit to the present Company, acting under its already conceded rights. The doubt which has been suggested whether M. de Lesseps has the right to use the remainder of the territory conceded to him for a second Canal is, we believe, without foundation. But even if it has anything in it,—which is far from probable,—there can be no question of the power of the Company to widen, deepen, and construct sidings, and so to apply the electric light that the canal might be used by night as well as day,—which would provide a very large increase of its carrying power. M. de Lesseps, then, has no occasion to procure a new concession, in order to secure a very large expansion of the already great profits of his Company; and in offering him the influence of the British Government to procure a new concession, we do not offer him in any sense what is essential to the brilliant results of his undertaking. We only offer him what certainly is essential to the safest and most convenient organisation of the Canal, and therefore to the interests of our own shipowners and merchants. But without any such concession, he can go on for the remainder of his grant, and also provide the means by which an enormously larger traffic than the present can pass through the Canal,—and a very much larger profit can be realised by its proprietors.

Now, what have we to give him, which is likely to induce him to meet the wishes of the British commercial classes? Nothing, if these wishes are, as they have lately seemed to be, not simply the wishes of business-men, but the wishes of commercial Jingoism, who pride themselves in lording it, through their agents, over the avenues of commerce, as well as in multiplying the achievements of that commerce. But we have a good deal to offer, if our commercial men are looking to their commercial interests only, and nothing more; for we can, by our influence with the Egyptian Government, obtain for M. de Lesseps the means of supplying the best double line of canal of which the conditions permit, with a separate entrance and a separate egress; and this, too, at a comparatively small cost if we lend the money for the new work on the low interest on which England can afford to lend it,—indeed, at so low a rate that M. de Lesseps can afford to abolish the pilotage dues almost immediately, and rapidly to reduce the shipping tolls, as well as to supply our traders with every facility for passing up and down the Canal with the minimum of risk and difficulty. In short, what the commerce of England has to gain is the most convenient double line of traffic, with double ingress and egress, and very much diminished dues. What England has to give for these equivalents is a loan of eight millions at 3½ per cent., which will be sufficient to provide a sinking fund to pay it off, and her influence with the Khedive to get the concession extended for twenty years beyond the original time of its expiration, as well as the additional land necessary. A great deal has been made of the extension of the concession for twenty years beyond the original time, by persons who are not aware that in the original contract, hopes were held out to the Company of a new concession for not twenty, but ninety-nine years after the original concession had expired, the increased proportion of profit payable to the Khedive in the event of such a renewal being in that case specified. And it does not seem to us a very unreasonable concession to a Company binding itself to complete so great an enterprise by the most convenient double line of canal, that it should obtain a somewhat longer lease of the privileges which it has, up to the present time, used so well. The truth is, that when you reduce the agreement to its real meaning, it is a bargain in which both sides gain, as both sides ought to gain by every commercial bargain, but not one in which, to our thinking, the Company of M. de Lesseps gains so much as English commerce; for undoubtedly it gives up high tolls which, so far as we can see, our ships and merchandise are able to pay, and are willing to pay so long as they cannot get them lowered. Nor does the Company gain as much by borrowing money cheaper for its new enterprise, and by the twenty years' extension of its lease, as it might fairly hope to gain, under possible contingencies, without our help,—considering that a much longer extension would be completely within the power of the Khedive, and that if he got a large revenue out of it, he would be not at all unlikely, unless we put a most unconstitutional veto on his authority, to grant that consent.

The weighing of the true nature of the bargain, however, has not as yet been attempted. Englishmen have been in such a pet at discovering that Egypt is not exactly their "property," to be dealt with as they please for commercial purposes, that up to the present time they have been quite unable to look at matters as they are. They have simply assumed that M. de Lesseps is bound to give way to England at once, now that she has found out that he was wise, and she was foolish, in the transactions of thirty years ago. But that is hardly a reason why he should give way and moderate his well-founded expectation of a thirty-per-cent. dividend, so as to accommodate himself to the demands of men who insist on thinking that if he can secure ten per cent. on the security of England, he ought to be very thankful to the Destinies and to us.

THE INTERNATIONAL THEORY OF THE CANAL.

WHEN we see the selfish greediness with which class-interests assert themselves in politics, we do not wonder that there should be a craving after that international administration of the interests common to more than one nation, which seems to promise something like an equitable holding of the scales,—a balance, if not of power, at least of national greed. This, if we understand it aright, is the motive which induces one of our ablest contemporaries to advocate the acquisition of the Suez Canal by an International Commission like that which regulates the navigation of the Danube, in whose hands the Suez Canal might be administered without fear of selfish preponderance of any single Power. There is something revolting enough in such displays as we had in the meeting at Lloyd's last week, and in Alderman Cotton's speech at the Cannon Street Hotel on Wednesday. It is not till we see the ugly rush of a class inspired chiefly by commercial greed exclaiming, like Alderman Cotton at the meeting on Wednesday, with a brutal candour, that it considers Egypt "almost as England's property," and that for that reason the second Suez Canal ought to be made "in English interests, and English interests only," that we begin to cast about for means,—which are too often more or less in the region of dreamland,—for the defeat of this tyranny of the pocket, which so often endangers, and sometimes positively degrades, the very idea of empire. But we do not believe that there is any real solution of the difficulty in the direction of that international Commission which a German contemporary has suggested, and the Pall Mall Gazette has so eagerly seized upon. Consider the situation. In the first place, here is a great and very prosperous Company in possession, which has already spent a good many millions in a very adventurous and risky enterprise now at last yielding twenty per cent., and promising with something like certainty to yield thirty per cent. before many years are out. In other words, the property of this Company is already a rich spoil, and is eagerly bought by investors for five or six times as much as has been actually invested in it. Now, here is the first difficulty of an International Commission. How is the International Commission to find the means of buying out such a company as this, and who is to decide amongst the nations represented on it if disputes arise, as disputes certainly would arise, as to the proper mode of administering so profitable a concern? We may be sure of one thing, that the present Shareholders,—of whom Englishmen are a large element,—would never consent to hand over their valuable property to an International Commission to administer, but would insist on being bought out by that Commission at the full value of their shares as that value is affected by the commercial prospects of the immediate future. Well, how is the International Commission to get the means of buying them out? Is each nation of Europe to contribute by its taxation to the cost of expropriating, and in what proportion? If it is to be in the proportion of their actual use of the Canal, England, it is said, would have to contribute four-fifths; and does any one suppose that Englishmen would consent to let the British Government contribute, say, eighty millions,—for we do not believe that the Canal could be bought much under a hundred millions, at the present high price of its shares,—towards the cost of a scheme so untried and so critical as the transfer of an adventure in which they are profoundly interested to a nondescript body like an International Commission?

But even if the United Kingdom were willing to acquiesce in such a chimerical enterprise,—and no enterprise could be imagined less likely to command English assent,—would the French Shareholders, who have had all the credit of originating the scheme, and who have the keenest national pride in their achievement, listen for a moment to any plan which would either diminish their influence over the conduct of the enterprise, as it would do if the national contribution were proportionate to the use of the Canal, or else tax Frenchmen very heavily to maintain their national influence over it,—an influence which they now exert by and through the Company which originated it? When people talk of an International Commission, they are thinking not of the management of a commercial enterprise, but of the political guardianship of the neutrality of the Canal in time of war. That is a totally different affair, and might, no doubt, be regulated by an International Commission, as the British Government have themselves more than once suggested. But it is one thing to keep neutrality on an arm of the sea by an International Commission, and a totally different thing to manage a very great commercial speculation by the help of such an agency; and for our own parts, we cannot imagine a project more hopeless than that of either, on the one hand, persuading a prosperous Company of this sort to trust its commercial prospects to the hands of an International Commission which would gain nothing by its success and lose nothing by its failure, or, on the other hand, persuading the various nations which would, through their Governments, take part in such a Commission, to buy out at great expense the interests of a Company in which they have very little concern, and the administration of which they would in the end be compelled, probably, to trust more or less to the agents of the great sea-going peoples. Either alternative is equally out of the question. The present Company can do well enough all that will be necessary to make it a very great financial success, though it cannot improve the means of transit as it would be improved by the scheme which the British Government have proposed. But to transfer the commercial enterprise into the hands of an International Commission is absolutely impracticable by any machinery which we can conceive, either because it would be repudiated by the present Company as fatal to their interests, or because it would be repudiated by the Governments to which appeal would have to be made to indemnify the existing Company for its property.

If, on the other hand, it be proposed that England and France together, as the nations chiefly interested, should take over the concern and manage it as a joint political trust, we should have all the evils and irritations of the Dual Control in Egypt over again, without any of the neutral international elements which are assumed to be non-conductors of international jealousy and rivalry. No plan less hopeful can be imagined than to take the commercial speculation out of the hands of the Company, which regards it solely as a commercial speculation, and to lodge it in the hands of the two Governments principally interested in it as a political speculation. If, in such a case, France and England were not quarrelling over it every year of their lives, it would be a miracle of self-control on the part of both Governments. In short, the dilemma of the International solution of the problem is this,—either it must be confided to the hands of the nations chiefly concerned in it commercially and politically—and then there would be no end of quarrels; or it must be confided to the hands of a number of national trustees not greatly interested in it, either commercially or politically, and then it would be commercially mismanaged, while the nations chiefly interested in it would be constantly tempted to rescue it from the hands of the disinterested, and therefore incapable, trustees.

The conclusion seems to us inevitable that nothing less suitable can be imagined for such an undertaking as the Suez Canal than the direction of an International Commission. It is essentially a commercial undertaking, and must be commercially managed, although it may and must be under sound political regulation. It is a practicable, though an immoral, proposal to force the hand of the Egyptian Government, for the purpose of plundering a Company which has executed a wonderful international work in a manner worthy of all praise. We can understand, though we reject with indignation, the suggestions of Alderman Cotton, and of those who talk as he does. But we cannot understand the proposal to hand over such a profitable commercial concern as this to an International Commission, because we cannot see how such a Commission could possibly be trusted by the Company as it exists, nor how it could acquire the means of buying that Company out, and subsequently administering a delicate commercial concern of this kind in the manner in which a mercantile company that understands its business can always be trusted to administer it.

THE ETHICS OF NEO-TORYISM.

IT has been becoming increasingly evident since Lord Beaconsfield's death that he had "educated his party" more successfully than he had himself imagined when he made the boast in the autumn of 1867. Household Suffrage, it is now clear, was by no means his only achievement as a political instructor. What he aimed at doing, as soon as he determined to supplant or to succeed Peel, was to revolutionise the Conservative Party, to change its character fundamentally, to undermine it at its foundation and place it on a new moral basis. The sober and statesmanlike Conservatism of Sir Robert Peel was abhorrent to him, and to mark his repudiation of it he abjured the very name. He ostentatiously proclaimed himself a Tory, not a Conservative; and his ideal leader was neither Peel, nor Canning, nor Pitt, but "the injured Bolingbroke." The reason of the preference is not far to seek. Lord Beaconsfield's ideas of government were essentially Oriental, and Lord Bolingbroke represented those ideas better than any other English statesman. Lord Bolingbroke desired to increase the power of the Sovereign at the expense of that of Parliament; which, in effect and generally, would mean the government of the country by the Minister who was most skilful in mastering the Royal will. Bolingbroke himself was not ill qualified for such a post. He was accomplished, brilliant, and eloquent; full of resource, and without scruples. It is easy to understand how such a politician would realise to Lord Beaconsfield's youthful mind the Oriental ideal of a successful statesman, and how the image of "the injured Bolingbroke" dominated his imagination even in the maturity of his career. From this point of view politics became a game of skill, of which the main object was to excel in manoeuvre and intrigue, and to baffle opponents. The politician degenerated into a sort of gambler, and became gradually possessed by the gambler's passion, in which all higher considerations are absorbed in the delirious wish to win. Apply this key to Lord Beaconsfield's political career, and it will be found to answer every lock and ward. Free-trade, Parliamentary Reform, foreign politics (except the Eastern Question, on which he had cherished ideas of his own), all were treated by him as pieces on a political chessboard, having no value in themselves except as instruments for check-mating an opponent. Macaulay's sagacity, thirty years ago, discerned "the little rift within the lute" that was by-and-by to destroy the traditional policy of the Conservative party. The passage we refer to occurs in the speech which he delivered on his election for Edinburgh in 1852, and it is so striking that it is worth while to quote it. Lord Derby's Government, of which Mr. Disraeli was of course the ruling spirit, was in office. That Government did not propose to touch the question of Parliamentary Reform; yet here is one of their haphazard proposals, as described by Macaulay: "What precisely I am to expect from them I do not know; whether the most obstinate opposition to every change, or the most insanely violent change. If I look at their conduct, I find the gravest reasons for apprehending that they may at one time resist the most just demands, and at another time, from the merest caprice, propose the wildest innovations." And then Macaulay proceeds to illustrate his meaning, by calling attention to the fact that "the most violent and democratic change that ever was proposed within the memory of the oldest man had been proposed but a few weeks before," by Lord Derby's Home Secretary. "In general, when a great change in our institutions is to be proposed from the Treasury Bench, the Minister announces his intention some weeks before. There is a great attendance, there is the most painful anxiety to know what he is going to recommend." Mr. Disraeli had taken another course. "At the end of a night, in the coolest way possible, without the smallest notice, Mr. Walpole proposed to add to the tail of the Militia Bill a clause to the effect that every man who had served in the Militia for two years should have a vote for the county." According to Macaulay's calculation, this would add about, "six thousand voters to every county in England and Wales." And the three qualifications were youth, poverty, and ignorance. As to age, "the nearer to eighteen, the better." As to poverty, "the elector is to be a person to whom a shilling a day is an object." As to ignorance, the men who compose the Militia "are not among the most educated or the most intelligent of our labouring-classes." From this and similar indications of the neo-Toryism introduced by Mr. Disraeli, Macaulay augured a serious danger to the institutions of the country:—"On the whole, what I do expect is that they will offer a pertinacious, vehement, provoking opposition to safe and reasonable change; and that then, in some moment of fear or caprice, they will bring in and fling upon the table, in a fit of desperation or levity, some plan which will loosen the very foundations of society." This prophecy has been fulfilled in a variety of ways already, and it is probably destined to receive some more illustrations. Fortunately, the Tories have only been once in office with a majority since Macaulay uttered the prediction, and then we all know how near they were to involving England in one of the most iniquitous and disastrous wars of modern times. And as it was, the efforts of the Liberal Opposition, backed up by the country, did not suffice to prevent wholly unprovoked wars in South Africa and India,—wars which added largely to the Debt and taxation of the country, and from the calamitous consequences of which the present Government has only as yet succeeded in partially delivering us.

The last illustration of Macaulay's gloomy prophecy has just been supplied by Sir Stafford Northcote in the House of Commons, and by Lord Salisbury in his startling speech in the House of Lords last Tuesday evening. The former gave notice of his intention to move the rejection of the provisional agreement with M. de Lesseps, when he had nothing before him but the bare skeleton of the arrangement. He saw the scheme suddenly exposed to a breeze of unpopularity, and he could not resist the temptation of inflicting what seemed a feasible defeat on the Government. In that exhilarating prospect the interests of shipowners, the risk of a rupture with France, the rights of private property, the complex problem of our occupation of Egypt, were forgotten or disregarded. What can be expected of a party whose soberest leader is capable of exhibiting such freaks of perilous levity? But Lord Salisbury on Tuesday evening surpassed—which was not easy—the rashness of his colleague in the Commons. The speech was unpremeditated—Lord Salisbury said so in his first sentence; yet this is the sort of policy which a responsible statesman, the leader of a great party, one who aspires to guide the counsels and to conceive and carry out the policy of the nation, thinks it prudent to fling upon the public mind without the slightest warning. Assuming that M. de Lesseps has legally an exclusive right of canalisation through the Isthmus of Suez, nevertheless, says Lord Salisbury, "I doubt very much the competence of the Sultan or the Khedive to make an agreement which should bar the nations from the natural right of a passage across the Isthmus for the commerce of the world. . . . This is something more than a legal question; it deals with that far higher question of how far Governments have the power to confer, without appeal, on persons receiving concessions, prerogatives which shall have the effect of preventing the natural access to means of transit which, as a prima facie right, is possessed by the commerce of the world."

Well might the Lord Chancellor express his "unfeigned astonishment" at such a doctrine. No more revolutionary doctrine was ever heard within the walls of Parliament; and from the lips, too, of the stout, the almost fanatical champion of the rights of property and the prerogatives of the Sultan! Egypt belongs to its Sovereign as much as any part of the British dominions belongs to Queen Victoria, and the nations of the world have just as much right to make canals and railways through British territory, in spite of the sovereign rights of England, as they have to make canals through the Isthmus of Suez without leave of the Sovereign Power. Suppose we had annexed Egypt after Tel-el-Kebir, what would the British Jingo think of Lord Salisbury's proposal that the Isthmus of Suez, or any other portion of Egyptian territory, should be considered the common property of mankind, so far as the needs of cosmopolitan commerce required it? If Mr. Chamberlain had propounded such a doctrine, how every Tory newspaper and platform would resound with indignation! Yet Mr. Chamberlain never uttered a sentence which even ingenious perversion could twist into decent resemblance to Lord Salisbury's Communistic suggestion. And here lies the danger. When a Radical propounds a startling doctrine, a thousand tongues and pens are on the alert to sound the alarm and magnify the danger. But the public have not yet realised the portentous change which has passed over the Conservative party since their late leader undertook their education, nor the consequent danger of giving them a majority in the House of Commons. As the career of the late Government proved, a Tory Ministry with a majority in the House of Commons, as well as in the House of Lords, is under no check, except from public opinion, and cannot be ejected till it chooses to dissolve. And it may persuade itself, as Lord Beaconsfield's Government did, that public opinion is on its side. Indications are rife that the advent of a Tory Government to office just now would be signalised, among other adventures, by some Irish policy which might disintegrate the Empire, shake the foundations of property, and necessitate the independence or reconquest of Ireland. A great deal more than the question of a second Suez Canal is involved in the substitution at this moment of a Tory for a Liberal Government, and we trust and believe that the Constituencies are alive to the danger.

THE SITTING TENANT.

BUT for the success of Mr. Balfour's amendment, we should say that the Agricultural Holdings Bill was moving on fast. Two clauses in as many days, when in one of them is embodied the two main principles of the measure, is excellent progress. But then Mr. Balfour's amendment may be thought to strike at one of these main principles, and, in that case, the progress of the Bill may yet be delayed by efforts made to get the recent decision of the House reversed or modified. Still, it is something that the question of the sitting tenant has been got out of the way, and the successive divisions of Tuesday night have at all events accomplished this. The strength of the Farmers' Alliance has been fairly gauged, and it is quite clear that in the existing House of Commons its strength is to sit still. On the whole, we are a little surprised that the sitting tenant was not able to make a better fight. There is a superficial equity about his claims which we should have expected to win more sympathy than was actually forthcoming. When once it has been admitted that a tenant who has made improvements is entitled to claim compensation for them when he quits his holding, why should not he be equally entitled to claim compensation if his rent is raised in consideration of them? In the one case, no doubt, he leaves so much of his capital behind him, and if he gets no compensation, it is altogether lost to him. But in the other case, this same capital may conceivably be made to yield him no profit. Supposing, for example, his rent is £100 a year, and he has laid out £1,000 upon the land. He is out of pocket by the interest which he has either to pay if he borrowed the money, or to forego if he has taken it out of other investments, but he hopes to recoup himself for this by the increased value of the farm. The landlord, however, is equally aware of this increased value, and at once raises the rent in proportion. Consequently, the tenant is worse off than he would have been if he had made no improvements. In that case, he would have kept or not have borrowed his £1,000, and have gone on paying his old rent. As it is, he has spent his £1,000, and has to pay a higher rent into the bargain. How can it be just to leave him without protection against such a contingency?

To this we answer, first, that the Bill does in a great measure protect him; and next, that so far as it does not, he could only be protected at the cost of an entire revolution in a land system which, on the whole, works well, and which only a very small minority of those who work it wish to upset. The power of the landlord to raise the rent on a sitting tenant's improvements will, if this Bill becomes law, be limited to a very narrow margin. The sitting tenant can always hold over the landlord the threat of becoming an out-going tenant. Consequently, whenever the landlord thinks of raising the rent on a tenant's improvements, he may in ordinary times be sure of getting the higher rent he asks, but in all probability he will only get it after he has paid the value of the improvements. When he has done that, he can let the farm to a new tenant, or he can make a fresh bargain with the former tenant. If he attempts to get the rent he would charge a new tenant out of the sitting tenant, without recouping him for the money he has spent on the land, he will lay himself open to the answer,—“Pay me the value of my improvements, and look out for another tenant. It will answer my purpose better to go away with my money in my pocket and find a landlord who will deal fairly by me, than to stay with a landlord who would, if he could, make an improving tenant pay twice over for his own improvements.” No doubt there is a margin within which this argument will not hold water. Though no landlord will be inclined to risk the annoyance of losing a good tenant, and having to pay money down into the bargain, there may be some who will try to raise a sitting tenant's rent not by the full value, nor anything near the full value of the improvements he has made, but by just so much as he thinks the tenant will be disposed to pay, rather than incur the cost and trouble of moving. They will not, that is to say, turn the rent which was £100 into £150, but they will make it £105, or £110. But even this will be attended with some risk, for the tenant may choose to leave rather than pay even this much in addition to what he pays already, and even if he does not leave, he will certainly not pay a higher rent, all told, than he calculates he can pay and make a profit. Consequently, the injustice against which Parliament has been vainly asked to protect him will, under this Bill, be very small, and only be committed in exceptional cases.

If for the sake of remedying even this the Government had accepted the amendment moved by Mr. Borlase, they would have committed themselves to the impracticable task of giving the English tenant the same security as they have given the Irish tenant, without importing the special machinery by which in Ireland this end has been attained. How is the sitting tenant to be protected against a rise of rent, unless a tribunal is created to determine what was a fair rent for the farm before the improvement was made? If improvements effected by the tenant were the only ground on which rent is ever raised, such a tribunal would not be required; but who is to say, when the rent of a farm is raised, whether the rise is due to a general rise of rent in the district, or to an accidental increase in the productive capabilities of the soil, or to the opening of a new market in the neighbourhood, or to some other circumstance quite unconnected with any improvements made by the sitting tenant? Before a demand for a higher rent can safely be put down to this last cause, the probabilities of its being due to one or more of the other causes must be carefully weighed. In point of fact, a judicial rent must first be fixed which shall take all these circumstances into account, and it is only of any excess over and above this judicial rent that the Judge will be able to say with any certainty that it is rent charged on the tenant's improvements, and so need not be paid until the landlord has recouped him for what he has done. It will not be enough, however, that the rent has thus been fixed, unless there is some prohibition against allowing it to be raised for a certain number of years. A judicial rent which only held good for the year in which it was fixed, would be no protection whatever to a sitting tenant. He would merely be secured against a rise of rent for twelve months, and after that time he would be in the same position that he is in now. Thus we are led irresistibly to the second of the distinctive features of the Irish Land Act. The establishment of a judicial rent would be one such feature; the definition of a period within which a landlord should be forbidden either to raise an improving tenant's rent, or to give him notice to quit, would be another. After that, it would certainly seem hard to forbid a tenant from disposing of the right thus created; and the third feature, free sale, would follow in the wake of the two others. The result of introducing this system was very well described by Sir Thomas Acland on Wednesday. It would be to “put an end for ever to that which has been the great foundation of the prosperity of English agriculture,—the system under which fair-minded landlords with intelligent agents had pursued, for a century at least, the policy of engaging good tenants, treating them liberally, and letting them make a fair and remunerative profit on their farms, with the expectation that twenty years afterwards the land would be worth more money.” The advocates of the sitting tenant—the sitting tenants themselves do not seem to care much about the matter—must make out a much stronger case than anything we have yet had from them, before it will seem good policy to exchange this state of things for that which, under wholly different circumstances, has been set up in Ireland.

MR. COWEN ON PARLIAMENTARY SHORTCOMINGS.

MR. COWEN, in speaking on Saturday to the miners of Durham, hit upon an odd accusation against the House of Commons, and a still odder remedy for the evil of which he complained. His complaint was of “the disposition to plane down opinion to a common level, to round off all individuality of character, all independence of action, and to establish a dull uniformity, instead of a genial and enlivening diversity of thought." We call that an odd accusation, coming as it does from Mr. Cowen, because Mr. Cowen professes to be a democrat of democrats; and of this at least there can be no question, that it is the characteristic disposition of democracy in establishing representative institutions—a disposition at once evil and good—"to plane down opinion to a common level, to round off all individuality of character, all independence of action, and to establish a dull uniformity, instead of a genial and enlivening diversity of thought." We call this at once the evil and the good of democracy in relation to the representative institutions which it imposes. It is both, because undoubtedly in tending to make average opinion—what is right in the opinion of ninety-nine out of every hundred—prevail over all the varieties of taste proper to eccentricity and genius, it does tend, indeed, to ignore more and more that which is useful or interesting to only one in the hundred, unless he can gain the ear of the rest, even though that one in the hundred have more human nature in him than all the other ninety and nine put together. Of course, this involves a great evil wherever what is true and original gets suffocated by the dullness of the multitude; of course, too, it involves a great good, when it really results in the raising of the ninety and nine common-place people to a fractionally higher level of character and intelligence, even though that elevation be gained at the cost of the exceptional character which is discouraged and depressed. The whole meaning of democracy is, however, that the advantage of the few must be sacrificed, when it comes into competition, as it often must do, with the good of the many;—that a very small substantial increase in the knowledge and dignity of the million is to be secured at the cost, if it must be, of a much larger increase in the knowledge and dignity of the middle or upper class; that a more diffused respectability of the dull, uniform character is to be gained, if it can only be so gained, at the sacrifice of a high concentration of taste and refinement in a single class. When a Conservative says to us that the modern House of Commons is not what the unreformed House of Commons was,—a stage for the brilliant display of the great gifts of a few,—we always reply that we admit the truth of what is alleged, but that, on the other hand, it is, what the unreformed House of Commons was not, an Assembly in which the elementary education of between four and five millions of children is a matter of infinitely greater importance than the higher culture of a few score of select youths. In the old House of Commons, the passing of the Education Act of 1870 would have been impossible. In the new House of Commons, refined passages of arms between men of taste and genius, who compete rather for an imaginative victory over the minds of their hearers than for success in interpreting the wants of the toiling millions, are becoming impossible. But Mr. Cowen appears to us to wish to have all the advantages of democracy without having any of its evils,—to secure all the attention which democracy does certainly secure to the prosaic wants and sufferings of the million, and to have as well all the freshness, elasticity, and genius which used to be displayed in a House of Commons that was not so closely related to the wants of the million, but which could afford to foster and applaud wit and imagination whenever they were displayed, and however irrelevant they were to the cravings of the people. The mere fact that there are twenty people to be considered, where there were not so very long ago only ten, and that these twenty are very often gathered into a close town group, where the ten were spread over a considerable acreage in the country, has itself a tendency "to plane down opinion to a common level, to round off all individuality of character, all independence of action." For the larger number, especially when collected in a more concentrated group, impress themselves and their dull uniform wants much more powerfully on the mind, and obscure your sense of the freshness of unusual or unique forms of character by the dead-level of need which they too often present. We can hardly understand how it is that Mr. Cowen, as a well-known advocate of democracy, can reasonably complain of the House of Commons for its success in representing a democracy. And it is success in representing a democracy to give the same slow, emphatic utterance to all wide-spread wants, and the same sturdy discouragement to those exceptional flights of individuality and genius which, though they may lighten the political atmosphere, do so at the cost of withdrawing attention from the great leading features of the political scene.

But if Mr. Cowen's complaint of the House of Commons is, as coming from a democrat, an odd one, his proposed remedy for the evil of which he complains is odder still. He thinks that if more members of the working-class could be got into the House of Commons, you would get "an ingenuousness and freshness of character" which would greatly relieve the dull uniformity of the Assembly. Now, so far as the present Assembly is marked by dullness and uniformity, the reason is, we think, not in the least the want of individual ability, and even talent, in that assembly, but the want of opportunity for their successful display. Business exigencies, party exigencies, and the overpowering pressure of the constituencies almost suffocate what individual ability and resource there is in the House. Five out of six able men have to be silent, in order that the sixth may get the opportunity of shortly exposing the folly of the vain and empty bidders for popular favour. Fill the House with men of the genuine artisan class, and though they might be as ingenuous as Mr. Burt and as fresh as Mr. Broadhurst, the only effect would be that feeling more keenly than any of their colleagues the absolute need of action rather than talk, they would, like Mr. Burt and Mr. Broadhurst, pretty sedulously hold their tongues, and follow their leaders in suppressing as much as possible the volubility of the loquacious party. That, no doubt, would be a grand result, and one which we have always desired; but it would not be the result for which Mr. Cowen looks. It would not restore the old vivacity and originality of an Assembly in which the great majority listened and the man of genius talked, but would at best only tend to diminish the confusion of an Assembly in which the political speculators talk, and the men of sagacity only try to compress talk. A few more shrewd working-men might greatly improve the representative character of the House of Commons,—we are disposed to think they would greatly improve it,—but certainly the way in which they would improve it would not be by breaking through the dull uniformity of opinion, but rather by trying to suppress the impertinent exuberances of opinion,—a very different matter,—in short, by urging the House of Commons more steadily to decisive votes. The artisans would reflect the democracy even better than the present representatives reflect it, and because they reflected it better, they would talk less and do more work. But that appears to be exactly what Mr. Cowen complains of. If we understand him rightly, he wants to see the House do less work and talk better than it does. But if he wants all the brilliancy and originality of the olden times, and yet all the sympathy with the "dim common populations" of the modern times, he must be disappointed; and though he may get more of the last by getting members of the working-class into the House of Commons, he will, for that very reason, get less of the first. His working-class Members will respond to the demands of the working-class; and to respond to the demands of the working-class, means a much grimmer silence and a much more decisive gift for action than was the habit of the brilliant days on which Mr. Cowen looks back with yearning and regret.

THE DUKE OF BuccLEUCH.

THE movement for recognising in some public way the services rendered to Scotland by the Duke of Buccleuch is receiving the cordial adhesion of the abler and more influential of his political opponents, and probably nothing but the Duke's own modesty will prevent it from attaining complete success. Such a movement is characteristically Scotch; it has only to take the familiar shape of the presentation of "an address and a purse of sovereigns," to become completely so. Wherever the flippant heresies of Mr. Mallock's "Social Equality" may have been received with favour, there is no hope of their taking root north of the Tweed; there man is recognised as above all things a labouring animal. Since the Union, still more since the breaking-up of the Highland Clans, the struggle for existence in Scotland has not been so desperate as it was up to the beginning of the eighteenth century; and, man for man, the Scotch commonalty is probably better-off at the present moment than the English. But creed and climate have perpetuated the tradition—which, after all, is religion in daily life—that whatever a man finds to do, he is bound to do it with all his might. Every Scotchman is expected to go through life resolutely performing his duties, expecting no reward but that given by a good conscience, receiving no encouragement from the undemonstrative but vigilant observers of his career, except an occasional but encouraging grip of the hand from some brother-labourer, saying to all enervating temptations to turn to the right or to the left, in the words of Burke,—but under his breath,—“For God’s sake let us pass on, for God’s sake let us pass on!” When, at last, he has achieved what material and moral success is open to him, and when he is in the vale of years, his contemporaries discover that he has been a credit to his parish or his profession, to his country or his species. A committee is formed, to organise a demonstration in his honour. A dinner is given him, and an address presented testifying that he has been a good and faithful servant, and above all things indicating the lesson of his life for other and younger men. If the committee, after due deliberation, come to the conclusion that a purse of sovereigns is not likely to turn the head of a man of threescore and ten, or to have a demoralising effect on his family, that is presented along with the address, as, to use the old-fashioned and somewhat metaphysical Scotch phraseology, “a tangible token of our esteem.”

Scotch Peers, in spite of their curious relationship to the Scotch Democracy, are expected to work hard. If any one of them figures before the world as a debauchee or a spendthrift, his Order treat him as a pariah. When in the course of their history they have as a class seemed lazy and indifferent to the public welfare, such an ominous and revolutionary growl has reached them from below as found expression in Carlyle’s “Diary” during his days of sansculotte Radicalism, “Canaille fainéante, que faites-vous là? Down with your double-barrels. Take spades, if ye can do no better, and work or die!” As a matter of fact, the Scotch Peers of the present day do such public work as comes to them to the best of their ability. Probably not more than three of their number could be mentioned who are not serving, as presidents, or as secretaries, or in some other post, on a political, or philanthropic, or ecclesiastical committee. Of the dozen or so of young politicians who might at the present moment be described as Mr. Gladstone’s hopefuls, at least a fourth are Scotch Peers on the bright side of forty. The Duke of Buccleuch has, after his fashion, worked hard and long and quietly. He is recognised throughout Scotland as having meant well and done well, according to his lights. No fainéant or absentee landlord, he has sought to promote the interests of his tenants, his dependants, and his country. He is in his seventy-seventh year, and surely the time has come to give him a dinner and an address.

The Duke of Buccleuch is the survivor of four very dissimilar Scotchmen, whose names some fifteen years ago the traveller north of the Tweed found in every one’s mouth, whose influence was coloured by, if not due to their personality, and whose successors their country has yet to discover. There was James Baird, the man of iron and Evangelical, but energetic, orthodoxy, the Dumbiedykes of his Church, anxiously asking of his clerical advisers, as a theological or ecclesiastical difficulty presented itself, “Will siller dae’t?” and ready with his half-million. There was Norman Macleod, a Burns in gown and bands, yet Celtic to his finger-ends, and whose Broad Churchism was really the enthusiasm of Wordsworthianism. There was Alexander Russel, with his masculine humour and his ready pen, the last and, perhaps, the robustest of the Scotch Voltaireans, not believing much more, perhaps, than that the earth is less the inheritance of the Saints than the hunting-ground for a succession of clever fellows, yet the sincere foe of intolerance, illiberalism, and oppression, in every shape and form. Beside these three, resisting here, co-operating there, or rather around them, a social atmosphere fully as much as a person, there stood the Duke of Buccleuch. They have gone, and he remains, as he was then, the leviathan of land and of the natural Conservatism that rallies round land, floating over many a square mile in many a county. You cannot be a day in Scotland but you find that in most public, and in not a few private transactions, “the Duke”—for there is but one Duke in Scotland, though several “his Graces”—has to be calculated with. The battle of Liberalism in the North has been essentially a struggle against his influence, from the day when he nailed his political colours to the mast down to the Midlothian Campaign. Much of this influence may, no doubt, be ascribed to his acres and his rental, to the fact that he is a political symbol, and, as we have already said, a social atmosphere. With no public man of the time would it seem more absurd to associate brilliancy than with the Duke of Buccleuch. He is no orator, he is, indeed, the reverse of an orator. He once had occasion to make a series of short speeches as chairman at an agricultural dinner, and proceeded to deliver a few good-natured common-places. Being among his own people, in his own county of Dumfries, he felt at his ease, and was beginning to dwell on some subject in which he had an interest, when he suddenly pulled himself up with the remark that, if he spoke at greater length, “there would be a paragraph in the papers saying that the Duke of Buccleuch had made a long speech.” The Duke’s comic horror at the bare idea of such a thing resembled nothing so much as David Copperfield’s remonstrance with himself on his first attempt to smoke,—“Copperfield, why did you try it? You might have known you couldn’t do it!” The Duke has made only one humorous remark in the whole course of his life, and he was probably never more terribly in earnest than when he made it. For it was shortly after the Disraeli Reform Act had become law, subsequently to its transformation in the Commons; the Duke declared that it contained nothing of the original measure but the word “whereas.”

Yet it is beyond question that the Duke’s influence and popularity are due in no small measure to his personality. He has shown himself from first to last a man of invincible amiability. Scotch Liberalism may war with his influence, and denounce his agents and subordinates; it spares and respects himself. Roxburghshire and Dumfriesshire tenants are bitter enough on occasions with the Duke’s chamberlains, but they evidently think the Duke himself can do no wrong. Then, though he may be intellectually short-sighted, and though his mental movements may be slow, he is a good and careful man of business. Before the Scotch Patronage Abolition Act of 1874 was passed, he, although an Episcopalian, discharged the difficult duties of patron to a large number of Presbyterian parishes with almost perfect success. His selections of incumbents were seldom, if ever, objected to, because before making them he had studied the characters and ascertained the wants of the congregations requiring spiritual instructors. Above all things, the Duke of Buccleuch’s popularity is due to his having, unconsciously perhaps and simply by being faithful to his excellent instincts, converted his position of landlord and feudal superior into a benevolent patriarchate. But little of snobbishness and nothing of flunkeyism mingles with the respect paid to the Duke of Buccleuch in Scotland, at all events by humble folk. It is but the expression of a belief that he has lived with, and in many ways for, his people, but never on them, or for himself.

One is so accustomed to think of the Duke of Buccleuch as the typical country gentleman of Scotland, the centre of its landed interest, the improver of estates, the builder of harbours, the natural bulwark of Church and State, that one is apt to forget that he once had a political ambition, and seemed in a fair way to have it gratified. He was a Cabinet Minister at thirty-five, or four years before Sir Charles Dilke, the youngest of Mr. Gladstone’s colleagues of the inner circle, reached that dignity. He was Peel’s colleague from 1842 to 1846, first as Lord Privy Seal, and then as Lord President of the Council. It was his secession and that of the then Lord Stanley which caused Peel to resign, at the most critical moment in the history of the measure for the repeal of the Corn Laws. His return to the side of Peel, his manly declaration in a letter to him, “I am ready, at the risk of any imputation that may be cast upon me, to give my decided support not only to your Administration generally, but to the passing through Parliament of a measure for the final settlement of the Corn Laws,” had not a little to do with his chief’s final resolution to complete his great work. It may be doubted if the Duke’s Conservatism has ever been even purged of the Peel leaven, unless, indeed, the successful Midlothian campaign of his old colleague has produced that result. “Dod” still classes him, as it classes Lord Selborne, as a Liberal-Conservative. He never served under the late Lord Derby, and probably had little sympathy with him. It was not till the second administration of Lord Derby’s successor that he could be got to recognise his party authority with even a semblance of heartiness. His dislike for Lord Beaconsfield was the dislike of the honest, if rather dull man for the theatrical political adventurer. Perhaps it was just as well for the Buccleuch estates in Scotland, and for the City of Edinburgh, that, with the collapse of the Peel Administration the Duke found his political vocation gone, and devoted himself to the completion of the work of his grandfather, the friend and pupil of Adam Smith. The one might not have obtained their patriarchal government, nor the other have had completed that harbour of Granton, which is the greatest public enterprise ever executed in Scotland at the cost of a private individual, if the Duke had become a busy partisan and place-hunter. About a generation ago, he found his true mission; and it is because he has discharged that mission faithfully and honourably that Scotland, which has defeated him on a hundred political battle-fields, and hopes to defeat him on many more, sees no inconsistency or degradation in recognising him as a national benefactor.

THE SET-OFFS AGAINST MODERN SCIENCE.

THAT science has as much right to its airs of self-confidence, as an unparalleled series of almost unexampled successes could give it, every intelligent man will admit. In the line of its own discoveries it has achieved wonders, and the only word of admonition that it is reasonable to pronounce is, that these wonders have turned the heads of too many scientific men, and led them to claim as the province of science, what science, as they understand it, has no prospect of ever conquering at all. To illustrate what we mean by this mistaken self-confidence or arrogance of science, we will make three quotations. Two are from a book of which we said something last week, Dr. Maudsley's book on "Body and Will," of which one may describe the fault as this, that it applies the scientific method very successfully where the ordinary scientific method is appropriate, and wholly ignores—nay, resolutely denies—all facts to which the scientific method, as men of science understand it, is wholly inappropriate. Here is one passage:—"Can there be a greater absurdity, when we think of it, a more completely knowledge-annihilating device, than to pretend to keep provinces of knowledge, however acquired, rigorously asunder! To assert liberty and self-sufficiency in one science, and necessity and interdependence in all other sciences, is really the negation of all science. It is a gaping contradiction in the very foundation of knowledge, which renders any stable superstructure impossible; for how can man, being one, have real knowledge unless it is unity of knowledge? How make for himself a synthesis of the world, if he is required to preserve an absolute separation, an impassable chasm, between two regions of knowledge?" That represents precisely the very vice of modern science,—that it will admit no paradoxes, no differences too deep for the unifying power of the human intellect, and, therefore, attempts to introduce an artificial unity into provinces which, the more we study them, the more we find to contain principles which cannot by any legerdemain of the intellect be shaded off into each other. And it is characteristic of the arrogance of science, that it is that very same school of science—the school of physical science—which denies most peremptorily, even to the principle of uniform causation, any intuitional universality, which, nevertheless, assumes to impose that principle on the conscience and the will, against the protest of self-knowledge. One would suppose that a principle which has been only empirically established, should be perfectly open to empirical exceptions. Yet, paradox being of the very truth of human life as we know it, and science, as learnt from the physical provinces of existence, not enduring paradox, the whole effort of such science as Dr. Maudsley's is devoted to suppressing the evidences of paradox which abound in all human experience when candidly recorded. If we replied to Dr. Maudsley that no sensible man had ever asserted "liberty and self-sufficiency" as the principle of any science, but solely thus much,—that directly you rise into the region of human action, you find for the first time, amidst the most ample traces of the necessity and interdependence of the lower regions of life, a new principle of liberty, though of liberty ranging within very narrow limits, a principle of which there had been no sign in the physical region, he would, we suppose, reply that no matter how limited its range, real liberty, if it exist at all, is the negation of causation as we know it, and therefore the negation of science. To which we should rejoin,—Yes, if you define science as meaning anything less than knowledge, if you define it as denoting only that department of knowledge in which uniform causation rules, of course it is so. But as you not only admit, but even assert, that our only knowledge of the uniformity of causation is purely empirical, have you the smallest right to pooh-pooh, as a priori impossible, a new fragment of knowledge of which it is the distinctive mark that under the same antecedent conditions you know two different actions to be equally possible?

Now, take another instance of the marvellous arrogance with which Dr. Maudsley imposes the yoke of the physical sciences on the moral order which he is investigating. He says very justly that "if there be an intuitive truth in the hope and conviction of a future realisation of lofty ideals, it does not follow that the realisation will take place on earth." But then he goes on:—"It is, perchance, a cosmic instinct of the matter of which we are constituted. In the countless millions of space-pervading orbs, it may have been, and may be again, the functions of many to take up the tale of organic evolution, and to carry the process to higher and higher levels,—even to organisations that are utterly inconceivable to us, constituted as we are. For us men and for our salvation, the earth and its sun are all in all; but in the universe and its evolution, new heavens and new earths may be natural incidents, and the whole solar system to which the earth belongs of no greater moment than the life of the meanest insect is in the history of that system, of no greater proportion than a moment in its duration. How grotesquely ludicrous, then, the absurdity of man's vainly attempted conceptions of a great first cause or purpose of things." In other words, Dr. Maudsley scorns to attach any value to what he calls elsewhere the "evolutional nisus," inspiring idealism, when it happens to be found—where alone, indeed, it ever is found,—in the mind of man, but is not disinclined to regard it, as appertaining intrinsically to the nature of "cosmic matter," as matter. Verily, those who ignore the paradoxes of freedom and faith are condemned by a sort of Nemesis to believe in paradoxes of their own even more astounding. What evidence is there of an "evolutional nisus" tending towards idealism in iron or carbon? Is "the evolutional nisus" which astronomers suppose to be already exhausted in the moon, only successfully imprisoned there? And why does "cosmic matter" retain idealistic aspirations in one place, and lose them in another? Can anything be plainer than that the materialist who recognises the idealistic faith in man,—as he cannot but recognise it, if he is to open his mind to facts at all,—and yet ascribes this idealistic faith to "cosmic matter" as such, does so solely and absolutely because, on his theory, there is nothing better left to ascribe it to? The truth is, however, that of idealism proper there is not a trace in the physical universe, and that if there be any "cosmic instinct" of idealism at all, it must be due to an inspiring mind in the universe, and not to "cosmic matter."

Now, take a third instance of the curious and rash arrogance of the spirit bred by the physical sciences. In last week's Academy, in a review of Mr. Douglas Galton's recent book by a very able student of physical science, Mr. Grant Allen, to whom we owe many original and ingenious speculations on vegetable physiology,—for example, one on the origin of the strawberry,—we find the following passage:—"The other point" [dealt with by Mr. Galton] "is the investigations into the efficacy of prayer. These are narrated with a quaint, scientific naïveté, which is not intended, doubtless, to be ironical, but which is as perfect a specimen of irony, in the pure Greek sense of the word, as we ever remember to have seen. The transparent candour, reverence, and scientific precision of Mr. Galton's reasoning will prove (quite unintentionally) a thousand times more annoying to dogmatism than any other tone that could possibly have been adopted. Abuse the dogmatists can stand, but gentle persuasion and clear logic are really too trying. When Mr. Galton remarks that he has not yet examined into the truth of Father Clarke's statement that 'substantial curative effects are often produced by pilgrimages to Lourdes,' or notes the absence of any marked answer to the daily prayer 'that the nobility may be endued with grace, wisdom, and understanding,' or cites the history of English ducal houses in opposition to the belief of the Psalmist that the descendants of the righteous shall continue, while those of the wicked shall fail, he is only honestly applying the methods with which he is familiar elsewhere to the particular subject under dispute; but it is almost impossible for unscientific readers not to suspect him of intentional satire." Is it possible to imagine a sublimer tone of arrogant assumption that prayer never receives any answer, than we find here, or one which is less becoming in a writer whose mind has been educated by the study of physics and physiology? The inner world is a sealed book, as it would seem, to the student of the modern physical sciences, who does not even know so much as this, that all Christian prayer at all events, is cast in St. Chrysostom's form, "Fulfil now, O Lord, the desires and petitions of thy servants, as may be most expedient for them," and that far more and far better answers to prayer come in the shape of purified desires than of granted wishes. And yet he dogmatizes on prayer with this sublime scorn for all the story of the ages. Even Mr. Matthew Arnold,—whom men of science have claimed as their champion on questions of this kind,—has asserted the truth of the paradox which is the very key to the efficacy of prayer,—“He that loveth his life shall lose it, and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal,” and has called it the sublime “secret of Jesus,” “the secret by which emphatically his Gospel brought life and immortality to light.” Even Mr. Arnold has declared that there is a secret life which is full of paradoxes to the man who looks only at the outward world, or even at the world of physical science, a secret life in which the paradoxes of self-abnegation, and all that the Christian includes in the life of prayer, are not only true, but the only living truth; and yet because they do not fall in with the methods of physical science, we find the whole life of prayer laughed to scorn by the successful student of the physical sciences.

Science has had a great and glorious career. But great and glorious as that career has been, we do not hesitate to say that all its achievements put together are of infinitely less value to man than the secret which Mr. Matthew Arnold calls “the secret of Jesus,”—a secret the true interpretation of which involves doubtless a great deal of theology which Mr. Arnold himself rejects, and a great deal of psychology against which both Mr. Grant Allen and Dr. Maudsley would hardly think it worth while, in their sublime arrogance, even to protest. But the study of insanity, and investigations into plant-life, even though they include the origin of the strawberry, hardly furnish a sufficient basis for the science of spiritual life.

ANIMAL LIFE IN THE MALAY COUNTRY.

SUPPOSING that one possessed Prince Hassan's carpet, the tree of inexhaustible fruit, the flask of unfailing water, and the cloak of invisibility, so that one might travel in any region of this planet at choice, and be under no sort of bondage or obligation to the human race, the Malay Country would be one of the best possible fields for the exercise of such a privilege. There are wondrous things to be seen in the great forest tracts, where man has not yet intruded, and the animal world leads its life unpersecuted (from the outside) in the jungle and the river; where birds, insects, and reptiles have their home in the trees, the air, and the swamps; where flowers more beautiful than any that deck our brides or die in our ball-rooms, mysterious of form, and lavish of growth, drape the giant palms and hang festoons of bells and feathers over the dark, swarming waters. It would be pleasant to pry, unseen, and with no need of protection, into the forest-covered interior of the great peninsula, where gigantic pachyderms, looking like monsters of the far past, roam; to see the huge elephant, the one-horned rhinoceros, little-eyed and of enormous weight; the tapir, quite slender and delicate by comparison, and the wild hog, progenitor of all pork, but who does not come to the scraped and pallid complexion of his descendants, because true Malays will not eat him; and with these a solitary plantigrade, that wistful-faced bear, who wants “back” among the feline and four-handed tribes, and no doubt, like Mrs. Todgers, finds it hard to live. It would be pleasant to watch the ways of this small creature, with its close fur, sensitive nozzle, and narrow, grasping paws, tenacious and miser-like. The Malay buffalo is bigger than the Chinese and Indian varieties, a greyish-pink in colour, hairless, probably stupid, but happily less ill-treated than his “explored” brethren, because he has not men to hunt and torture him, but only tigers, and at least it is soon over when the leopard makes a paralysing spring upon him, or the royal or the spotted black tiger (with the true stripes traceable in certain lights upon his shining, jet-black skin) stalks him and brings him down, fresh and happy from his mud-bath. It would take a long time to exhaust the forest-folk; for there are the civet, Java, and several other “cats,” the musang and the climbing musang, and the water-dog, known to us as the land-otter, an astute creature, with (at least as seen in captivity) a remarkably preoccupied and selfish expression of countenance. This, perhaps, is incidental to life in “gardens,” where food is not a fixed, but an arbitrary quantity, and all the excitement and suspense of existence concentrate themselves in one fateful moment, monotonously marked by the advent of a man with a fork and a barrow. And there are four species of deer, two smaller than a hare—gentle creatures that might be, and probably are, pets of the seraglio—one a noble animal, as large as the elk; wild goats, free, happy, and hairy; and bison, but these are not numerous. It would be “fine” to see the lives of these creatures; their wars, their truces, their strategy, their domesticity, and to observe the demeanour towards them of their superiors, the four-handed race, of whom there are nine kinds in the Malay peninsula, besides two apes, very curious and disconcerting animals, and a lemur, with the beautiful, bright eyes, that cannot bear the light, peculiar to the sloth tribe. Of course, the monkeys are the men of those unexplored forest regions, the superior persons who would resent the aping of their ways by clothed intruders, and say, with Gay's travelled Jocko, if they were ever tempted out of their safe “wilderness,”—

“I vow 'tis a disgusting sight,
To see men always bolt upright;
Because we sometimes walk on two,
I hate the imitative crew.”

Their brethren who outranged the forest fastnesses and fell into the hands of men, have they not been chained up, and taught, it may be, by that terrible instructor, hunger, to use their agile limbs and dexterous hands in the gathering of the kindly fruits for other consumption than their own, and have not the bonds of servitude descended to the children of these stragglers? One would like to see that clever service done, too; but how much better to behold, on the jungly banks of the Linggi River, in the midst of a scene at once of activity and stillness, with colossal flowering trees, green twilight, inextricable involvement, with brilliant birds, jewel-like lizards, weird, uncanny flying foxes, and huge saurians basking on shiny banks under the mangroves, the free creatures, sitting in groups, hanging by hands or tails, leaping, grimacing, jabbering, pelting each other with fruit, and, no doubt, perfectly alive to the intellectual inferiority of all other forest-folk. And then, to see the home of the monkey-man,—the wondrous river-side forest, where the great bamboo towers in its feathery grace, and the rattan creeps along the ground, and then, climbing the trees, knots them together with tough, tangled strands, for it may be twelve hundred feet of fantastic bondage, and the bound and loose alike are loaded with trailers, ferns, and orchids, so splendid and so rare that to have seen one of them once, in costly extradition to some gorgeous mansion here, is a thing to be remembered! There the “audacious liana,” with great clusters of orange or scarlet blossoms, flings itself on several trees at once, or a trailer leaps across the river from tree to tree—the agile monkey of the plant world—and from a height of a hundred feet dangles the festoons of gorgeous blossoms, in which myriads of fairies must surely sleep in the tropical daytime, so as to be fresh for the dancing, with moths and dragon-flies and butterflies, when the cool evening comes. There is no lack of partners for the elfin beauties, “trooping all together,” for the butterflies swarm in countless thousands in the forest openings, and their variety is endless. It would be pleasant to see a Butterflies' Ball, opened by the Queen of the Fairies with such a gallant cavalier as either of those that Miss Bird saw in the Pass of Bukit Berapit, when all around was light and colour, the morning-hymn of birds, and the sound of crystal waters:—“The upper part of the body of one of them, and the upper side of its wings, of jet-black velvet, and the lower half of its body and the under-side of its wings of peacock-blue velvet, spotted; another of the same ‘make,’ but with gold instead of blue; and a third with the upper part of the body and wings of black velvet, with cerise spots, the lower part of the body cerise, and the under-side of the wings white, with cerise spots. All these measured fully five inches across their expanded wings.” One thinks joyfully of these creatures, for they were not netted and impaled, but left to the happy little life their Creator meant them for, unperturbed to the base uses of the “specimen.”

If one should spread Prince Hassan's carpet in the jungle where the elephants are at home, or by the river-side, where the trackless mangrove swamps begin, and the alligator basks; where the turtle, the tortoise, and many kinds of lizards pursue their peaceful ways, and the deadliest of the serpent tribe wind their beautiful but horrid forms through the slimy recesses, what strange sights one would see, and how curious an impression one would receive of an entire department of nature in which man is of no account at all, not wanted or missed in its economy! And how solemn an experience would the night be—not terrible, because the cloak of invisibility is always understood—with the awful, still forest, the note of that grand night bird, the Argus pheasant, which is said to resemble the cry of the wild man of the interior, the sounds of fierce gambols, of pursuit and capture, hunter and victim, and the plunging of elephants come down to drink! And then, with sunrise, the change would be like that which followed the arrival of the Prince who awakened the Sleeping Beauty with a kiss, and whom we are—quite ineffectually—bidden by modern un-wisdom to believe was the Sun himself. “Loudly chattered the busy cicada, its simultaneous din, like a concentration of the noise of all the looms in the world, suddenly breaking off into a simultaneous silence; the noisy insect world chirps, cheeps, buzzes, whistles; birds halloo, hoot, whoop, screech; apes, in a loud and not inharmonious chorus, greet the sun; monkeys chatter, yell, hoot, quarrel, and splutter. Occasionally, some heavy fruit, over-ripe, falls into the river with a splash.” Now, if we were willing to lay aside the cloak of invisibility for a while, and let the human sentiment of surprise in upon monkeymanity, would swarms of agile creatures come down on living “monkey-ropes” from the feather-crested trees, to inspect, upside-downedly, the “despiseable” intruder, incapable of even elementary climbing, and deplorably deficient in chatter?

If, like Ingoldsby’s “Sir Thomas the Good,” one’s taste points insect-wise, there is much (in addition to the “tiger” and the “night” mosquito) to gratify it in the Malay Country, where moths of such surpassing beauty that neither jewel nor flower can compete with them abound; and notably the wonderful Atlas, measuring ten inches across its wings; where multitudes of beautiful little creatures live upon the myriad leaves, and the dark nights are illuminated by the flashing of fireflies, moving in undulations like the phosphoric waves of the sea. Glancing through the jungle-openings, we should see sun-birds, rivalling the colours of those living jewels, the humming-birds; and on the river-banks large kingfishers, arrayed in the glory of their matchless blue plumage; while the forest trees are studded with green paroquets, coral-beaked, and the jungle-tracks are trodden by the stately Argus, the gallant and bellicose jungle-cock, and the Java peacock, with its exquisite, iridescent green feathers. Here is a glimpse of what the waters would reveal to us:—“Multitudes of fish of brilliant colours, together with large medusæ, dart or glide through the sunlit waters among the coral groves, where every coral spray is gemmed with zoophytes, whose rainbow-tinted arms sway with the undulations of the water, and where sea-snakes writhe themselves away into the recesses of coral caves.”

The ordinary traveller might possibly get too much tiger, especially in Malacca, where a black one (perhaps a panther) came down the principal street early one morning, and made its chota hazree of a Chinaman; and up in Lingat, where the windows of the bungalow in which Miss Bird resided had to be closed, on account of an adjacent tiger, “whose growling was most annoying;” but the tiger at home would be a great sight,—from an earth-skimming balloon, or Prince Hassan’s carpet. As in Corea, so in the Malay peninsula, the tiger is an object of great dread and reverence. The Malays speak of these animals in whispers only, believing that souls of men departed dwell in them; and in some places they will not kill a tiger, unless he is a very mauvais sujet indeed. The Malay’s version of the wehr-wolf myth is that some men are tigers by night and men by day. They wear tigers’ claws to avert disease, use the liver, dried and pounded, as a medicine, which is worth twice its weight in gold, and set the centre of the “terrible eyeballs” in gold rings, to be worn as charms. Whether one liked or did not like the ape as an inmate would regulate one’s enjoyment of the domestication of that animal in the Malay Country, but that it is a wonderful creature is not to be denied. The Malays are passionately fond of pets, and of all the nice things which travellers and residents in their peninsula have told us of this interesting people, nothing is more charming than this testimony of Miss Bird’s:—“They have great skill in taming birds and animals. Doubtless, their low voices, and gentle, supple movements, never shock the timid sensitiveness of brutes. Besides this, Malay children yield a very ready obedience to their elders, and are encouraged to invite the confidence of birds and beasts, rather than to torment them.”

THE DEFEATED ENNERDALE RAILWAY.

ALL lovers of English Lakeland and all believers in the need of keeping the few Dales left to us inviolate for the rest and pleasure of weary England will owe a debt of lasting gratitude to the Select Committee appointed on the motion of Mr. Stafford Howard to inquire and report “whether the proposed Ennerdale Railway will interfere with the enjoyment of the public who annually visit the Lake District, by injuriously affecting the scenery in the neighbourhood, or otherwise,” for the report against that railway which it adopted.

Ennerdale is the most impressive of our Cumbrian Valleys for simple and austere grandeur. What the spectator feels, as he looks at Honister Crag from Buttermere, he feels doubly, when—after a climb over the intervening mountain mass of Red Pike and Starling Dodd, and descending upon Ennerdale Water at Gillerthwaite Farm—he looks south-east up the green trough of the wild vale, and sees towering upward, cloud-capped, the gigantic, purple mass of the Pillar, Steeple, and Haystacks at the head of the vale; and watches the shining, serpent-like coils of the Liza run towards the pastures at the head of the Lake. Right opposite him, as he descends into the valley upon one of the only two farm-houses that exist in all the six miles of vale, he notes between the two ravines down which, from the skirts of the Haystacks, fall the cascades known as High Ghyll and Low Ghyll, that the hill-side has been hideously scarred in about twenty-four different places by the adventurers for whom powers have just been asked of Parliament to complete the destruction of the valley. He observes that the terminus of the proposed line was to have been a mile further down the valley, just at the head of the lake; and on inquiry learns that, once get the rail there, “They’ll happen get leave to run it right oop;” but that till then, the men who get the iron ore are intending to run it down by tram to the lake.

Entering Gillerthwaite Farm, he learns that the iron-ore royalties between High Ghyll and Low Ghyll are belonging to the Lowther family, but that there are said to be other iron veins worth working away up the beautiful ravine known as Silver Cove, in the hollow that divides Great Crag and Ern Crag from the Haystacks. The royalties here belong to William Tyson, the grand old yeoman who may be said to be King of Ennerdale. Listen to his wife, as she says, sadly enough, “Once let them ragabones and navy folk come oop here away, Barn, we mun just leash house and be off!” It is evident that the chance of royalties does not outweigh in her mind the peace and quiet of the Dale. We leave the lonely mountain farm of Gillerthwaite, noisy enough and busy enough to-day, for it is sheep-shearing time, and pass along a good mountain road for about a mile, to the head of Ennerdale Water. On our right is the barrow or burying-ground of the Norse chieftain Lathar,—Latter Barrow of to-day. And as we gaze north-west along the shining levels of the lake, it is easy to see that no choice was left the railway promoters as to which side of the lake they must run; for, sheer down to the water’s edge on the opposite or south-west side fall the brown, heath-covered masses of Crag Fell, Borter Fell, Reveling Crag, with Angler Crag standing out a sole promontory into the water beneath it. Nor, pace Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, is it difficult to observe at a glance, that the masses, on this, the north-eastern shore, of Starling Dodd and Herd House, with their spurs of Latter Barrow and Bowness, come so closely to the lake, that the Ennerdale Water foreshore on this side is also very limited; and that as the present carriage roadway for at least two-thirds of the distance down the lake is not more than thirty to forty yards away from the margin of the lake, so the projected line, which is to run parallel with it, will not be more than one hundred to two hundred yards distant from it over the same distance. How Parliament could ever have been expected to sanction the danger to horse and carriage traffic along this the only road up to Ennerdale, it is difficult to see. Walls cyclopean, or a formal belt of trees, as a protection between the echoing train and the roadway, if insisted on, would have been as great a blot in the scenery of the Ennerdale foreshore as anything that could have been devised to damage the vale.

We are now standing by the first foot-bridge over the River Liza, and at the proposed terminus. All the beauty of the river would have been doomed here to be given up to iron girders, and all the charm of the rugged pasture-land to the incidental waggon-standing ground and sidings of the iron-ore traffic. Any one who remembers the red mud, and ruddled appearance of Boot or Ravenglass Station, on the Eskdale Railway, will know what that means. But the mines are at least a mile and a half away. Trams were to be laid by the side of the Liza to fetch the trucks. Trams were again to go up yonder beautiful combe or hollow in the hills between Ern Crag and the Haystacks. For ore is reported to exist in the Deep Ghyll and also in Silver Cove; and why should Deep Ghyll not have been made to run loamy-red to join the discoloured Liza, and pour such a torrent of ironwashings into Ennerdale Water, as would have made it one great reach of red incarnadine, and plagued it with an Egyptian plague of blood, only equalled by the colour of the River Ehen, as it flows by Cleator and Egremont to the sea? "Eh, Barn!" said a farmer with whom the present writer once spoke, "let t' Raale git here, and it 'ull goo reight thro' t' vale hooiver. There's a canny bit o' slate at top, and a bit of lead in t' Pillar, so they saay." The Whitehaven folk depended on Ennerdale to supply their water without lead or iron in it. If Ennerdale had been made the sport of mining experimenters, and the foxes, who consider the Todd Holes up in the Haystacks Mountain their strongest "beald" in this part of Cumberland, had been compelled to give place to human foxes of a more destructive order, great would have been the pity. Look up and count the red burrows of this latest fox, and see how even his preliminary workings have marred the vale.

We turn and pass down the vale, by the side of Ennerdale Water. On our left the lake, on our right the glorious crags of Herd House and Starling Dodd, and the flanks of Latter Barrow and Bowness Knott. One thing strikes us at once. The singular loveliness of the wild strip of land between lake and mountain-wall. And who that knows the beauty of that boulder-strewn, ferny foreshore, between the hills and the water's edge, but must see the certain injury any railway line permitted would have inflicted? We have now in our walk towards the foot of Ennerdale Water reached a rising ground, that projects into the lake from the base of the beautiful Bowness Knott. The rail must here either have made a deep cutting by the side of the road that climbs over the hill, or must have gone to the water's edge, and so round it; and either alternative would have disfigured the scene. Once round the Windsor Point (as this promontory is called), we find the hills recede, and a pleasant bit of farm-house-bedotted prospect reaches to the foot of the red-brown Herd House Heights, and Banna Fell. Yonder, away to the west, is How Hill; and there, by How Hall Farm, the steam-invader would first dare his intrusion into the Ennerdale sanctuary. As one walked under the How Hill, by the wild roses and forglives, and flowery, bowery, half-wall, half-bank fences, that lie between Anglers' Inn and Ennerdale Bridge, one felt it a pity that the holiday-makers should be whirled by all this beauty, in their haste to the foot of the lake, for that last mile and a half.

At Ennerdale Bridge lies the only population, some three hundred and fifty, that could be said to be a community that needed railway accommodation at all. Beyond Ennerdale Bridge, in the lakeward direction, not more than twelve houses can be counted. Of these, ten at least lie in the little bay or natural recess between How Hill and the Bowness Knott, on the north side and quite at the foot of the lake. It cannot be doubted that for the mining people of West Cumberland who need a holiday, and who now for want of direct railway accommodation to the nearest vales take train to Keswick, a railway that ran to Ennerdale Bridge village would be a convenience. One yard further that railway need not come; unless the interests of the landlord of the Anglers' Inn and the greater convenience for the three or four farmers who live close by are thought to outweigh in importance the certain destruction of this the most impressive and romantically beautiful vale of Cumberland, and all to please the whims of a parcel of speculators and the pockets of a few mining engineers, railway-making lawyers, and royalty-owners.

Is there any belief in the progress of education? Then one day the toiling masses who are digging coal and iron in West Cumberland will greatly appreciate the quiet and change of scene, and be impressed by the grandeur of Ennerdale. And Ennerdale is the nearest valley to those toiling masses that could be ever to them a holiday-ground. We are careful for the masses, in refusing to allow their recreation-ground to be made impossible for them in the future.

But the public opinion that saved Borrodale was alive, and has now saved Ennerdale also. No doubt, owners of iron ore at this particular juncture are anxious to crowd out of competition the Spanish ore which, through the temporarily low freightage, has found its way inconveniently into the English market. Parliament will doubtless give the commercial side a fair hearing, but Parliament has been wise in remembering that England's true wealth lies not in her mineral supply, so much as in her supply of healthy souls in healthy bodies. Parliament does not forget that the work of the world demands that there shall be rest-places for the weary workers. The Legislature has been most just in refusing to sanction the certain destruction of the Vale, because it is currently reported that iron ore exists in an untried quantity somewhere on the slopes of Tewit Fell.

THE SUEZ CANAL AND SELFISHNESS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It appears that the Government have made the best bargain they could with hard-headed monopolists in the matter of the second Suez Canal. That it is a monopoly they had to deal with was confirmed by the best opinions at their command; and they were bound, therefore, to act upon those opinions, whatever opinions Conservative partisans may have given to the contrary.

England is suffering in this matter from her excessive selfishness, just as she did from the same cause in the late Russo-Turkish Eastern Question. In the latter case, the majority of our upper classes did all they possibly could to secure impunity to Turkey in her inhuman government of her Christian subjects, lest by restraining her she might be made weaker to resist problematical designs of Russia; and by thus, on account of remote possibility, backing up and identifying themselves with fiends, they landed us in the very situation they most dreaded, namely, the territorial aggrandisement and increased influence of Russia. In the present case, that of the Suez Canal, the same cause, excessive selfishness, caused groundless suspicions and fears of France, so that our Government, with the whole body of ship-owners behind it, did all they could to hinder the inception and execution of the work, and so confirmed the preponderance of French influence in it. How different would it have been had we cordially co-operated with M. de Lesseps from the first in furthering the maritime communication of the world! We would then have been in a position to acquire and maintain an influence in the undertaking equal, if not superior, to that of the French.—I am, Sir, &c.,

MR. BRADLAUGH AND THE BLASPHEMY LAWS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—You would not, I am sure, wish to do an injustice even to "such a man" as Mr. Bradlaugh. Allow me, therefore, to assure you that Mr. Bradlaugh did not "boast" at the meeting in St. James's Hall at all; his speech was most studiously moderate and self-restrained; he stated, indeed, his belief that those who had prosecuted Messrs. Foote and Ramsay had hoped to catch him in the same net, that political and not religious motives were at the back of the prosecution. But there was nothing in his speech to show that "notoriety is turning his head;" much to show that he felt the tremendous responsibility of his position as leader of an enthusiastic body of men and women, smarting under a sense of political wrong done in the name of the religion of Jesus Christ.

May we not hope that by-and-by the Spectator may think it worth while to find out accurately what "such a man" with such followers does actually say, for if Mr. Maurice's teaching as to the difference between "the mob" and "the people" is true, it is no mere mob which regards the Freethinkers now in prison as martyrs.—I am, Sir, &c.,

STEWART D. HEADLAM.

[Mr. Bradlaugh's language did convey such a boast to one of his audience, but we are quite willing to let another of his audience give his different impression.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE FRENCH IN TAMATAVE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—You think the "Shaw affair" not very important, because, you say, there may be evidence of imprudences. Is it quite fair to say that? Is Mr. Shaw's case likely to receive serious attention from France, if his own fellow-countrymen not only make light of it, but even prejudice it, by assuming that certain evidence "may be" forthcoming?

I know Mr. Shaw well, and can testify to his prudence, moderation, and common-sense. He is highly esteemed in Tamatave, not only in Missionary circles, but amongst the trading community also; nor is he at all such a man as one would expect to see in a difficulty of this kind. But if we are to suspend judgment upon Admiral Pierre until the arrival of his explanations, surely it is not too much to ask for a similar act of justice to Mr. Shaw.—I am, Sir, &c.,

BOOKS.

MACHIAVELLIANISM.*

THIS handsome edition of the principal works of Machiavelli is the completest and the most accurate that has yet appeared in an English dress. It has evidently been a labour of love to the translator, and he has laid the English-reading public under a great obligation. We have compared the translation in a variety of passages with the original, and can bear testimony to the general accuracy with which the sense is preserved, even where the translation is somewhat free. The errors which we have detected are few, and of no great importance, and we only refer to them in order that the translator, by correcting them, may make a good book still better in the second edition, which we have no doubt the work will reach. We give one specimen. In the fifty-fifth chapter of the first book of the Discorsi, Machiavelli denounces two classes of "gentlemen" who infested Italy at that time:—"Those who live idly on their abundant possessions, without taking any trouble to earn a living, either by engaging in agriculture or any other useful pursuit. Such men are pernicious in every Republic and in every province. But even more pernicious are those who, in addition to their other possessions, have castles at their command, and subjects in obedience to them." Then follows this sentence:—"Di questi due sorti di uomini ne sono pieni il regno di Napoli, terra di Roma, la Romagna, e la Lombardia." Mr. Detmold's translation is:—"This class of men abound in the Kingdom of Naples, in the Roman territory, and in the Romagna." Of course, it ought to be, "these two classes of men." Mr. Detmold has prefixed a useful introduction to his translation, and we trust that his work will help to give English readers a better knowledge and appreciation of the character and writings of Machiavelli than the traditional opinion which makes the great Florentine's name a proverb for political perfidy and cruelty.

Machiavelli was not only a busy and versatile actor in one of the most turbulent periods of Italian history; he was also a voluminous and versatile writer, and achieved distinction in various fields of literature. His History of Florence is a masterpiece of historical composition, concise, yet lucid, critical and philosophical, but never tedious. His despatches from the Courts and camps to which he had been at various times sent as envoy are models of what such compositions should be. His comedies were highly popular, and are not more coarse than the taste of his contemporaries. His essay on The Art of War proves not only the ardour of his patriotism, but also a rare insight into military tactics. And whatever judgment may be passed on the political morality of his Prince, that famous treatise is an enduring monument of Machiavelli's genius as a statesman, as are also his Discourses on the First Ten Books of Livy.

While the judgment of posterity has been tolerably unanimous with respect to the other works of Machiavelli, his Prince still remains a problem for critics and moralists. Authorities like Alberico Gentile, Wicquefort, Rousseau, and Alfieri have passed a favourable judgment on The Prince. Frederick the Great, strange to say, condemned the book as strongly as did Voltaire and Dugald Stewart. Between these two extremes come critics like Lipsius, Artaud, and our own Macaulay, who mixes praise with blame, and, on the whole, saves the moral character of Machiavelli at the expense of the general morality of Italy in that age. Others, again, have adopted a more subtle style of advocacy, and have endeavoured to show that The Prince is not a serious book at all, but a refined satire by a sincere Republican (as Machiavelli undoubtedly was), having for its object the unmasking of kingcraft, in order to make it odious to the multitude. To this it is obvious to object that the satire is so well concealed that it was much better calculated to instruct Princes in the art of maintaining their power than their subjects in the art of recovering their liberty. But we are not left to speculation in the matter. In a letter written from his rural retreat at San Casciano to his intimate friend Vettori, Machiavelli explains the aim and purpose of The Prince, in the composition of which he was then engaged. The title which he then intended to give to the treatise was "De Principatibus," and he says that his object was to discuss "what a principality is; what kinds there are; how they are acquired; how maintained; and how lost." The letter was a private one, addressed to a bosom friend. There is also a letter on record from another of Machiavelli's confidants, Biagio Bonaccorsi, which leaves no reasonable doubt that The Prince was written as a serious political manual, without any arrière-pensée whatever. And, indeed, Machiavelli himself, in some of his subsequent works, quotes The Prince as an authoritative exposition of his political opinions. No passage in The Prince has done more damage to the reputation of its author than the eighteenth chapter, where he discusses "the manner in which princes ought to keep their faith." In a passage in the Discorsi, after remarking that princes were in the habit of violating as soon as they could promises which were extorted from them by force, and made no scruple even of breaking all promises, without exception, when the reasons which induced them to make them no longer existed, he adds,—"How far such conduct is praiseworthy or the reverse, or whether a prince can be justified in so acting, we have discussed so fully in our treatise of The Prince, that there is no need to say anything more here."

Undoubtedly, then, The Prince must be regarded as the frank expression of Machiavelli's deliberate opinion on the subjects of which it treats. So far we agree with Macaulay; nor do we question the general accuracy of his view of Machiavelli's character. But we can by no means accept the premisses which conducted Macaulay to his conclusion. His theory, briefly stated, is as follows. He draws a sharp contrast between the moral obliquity and moral elevation of sentiment which are conspicuous in the writings of Machiavelli. But even here Macaulay's passion for antithesis betrayed him into exaggeration. "We doubt," he says, "whether it would be possible to find, in all the many volumes of his compositions, a single expression indicating that dissimulation and treachery had ever struck him as discreditable." And he adds:—

"After this, it may seem ridiculous to say that we are acquainted with few writings which exhibit so much elevation of sentiment, so pure and warm a zeal for the public good, and so just a view of the duties and rights of citizens, as those of Machiavelli. Yet so it is. And even from The Prince itself we could select many passages in support of this remark. To a reader of our age and country this inconsistency is, at first, perfectly bewildering. The whole man seems to be an enigma, a grotesque assemblage of incongruous qualities, selfishness and generosity, cruelty and benevolence, craft and simplicity, abject villany and romantic heroism. One sentence is such as a veteran diplomatist could scarcely write in cipher for the direction of his most confidential spy; the next seems to be extracted from a theme composed by an ardent schoolboy on the death of Leonidas. An act of dexterous perfidy and an act of patriotic self-devotion call forth the same kind and the same degree of respectful admiration. The moral sensibility of the writer seems at once to be morbidly obtuse and morbidly acute. Two characters altogether dissimilar are united in him. They are not merely joined, but interwoven. . . . The explanation might have been easy, if he had been a very weak or a very affected man. But he was evidently neither the one nor the other. His works prove, beyond all contradiction, that his understanding was strong, his taste pure, and his sense of the ridiculous exquisitely keen."

This is an excellent example of Macaulay's proneness to subordinate strict accuracy to picturesque effect. It is an exaggeration to say that in all the writings of Machiavelli there cannot be found "a single expression indicating that dissimulation and treachery had ever struck him as discreditable." The first sentence of the famous eighteenth chapter of The Prince, where Machiavelli defends violation of plighted faith on the part of Princes, asserts the self-evident superiority morally of good-faith and integrity over craft; and passages might be quoted from other parts of his writings which entirely refute Macaulay's accusation. Take the following, from the Thoughts of a Statesman, a collection of maxims from Machiavelli's writings, which we only know in Mr. Detmold's translation:—"Even in war, but little glory is derived from any fraud that involves the breaking of a given pledge and of agreements made." "An ally should prefer his pledged faith to advantages, or [? escape from] perils." "No law should ever stain the pledged faith of public engagements." "Fraud is detestable in every action." There is all the less excuse for Macaulay's exaggeration, because there is undoubtedly matter enough in Machiavelli's works to justify the most startling contrasts. Macaulay's explanation of these contrasts contains a great deal that is true. But it is not the whole truth, and it is in some respects the reverse of true. So that the general effect is to save Machiavelli's character at the expense of the character of his nation. Macaulay's view is, in brief, as follows:—While in other European countries in the middle-ages a feudal aristocracy trampled on the people and overawed the central government, the peculiar circumstances of Italy placed a check on the power of the nobles on the one hand, and of the ruling princes on the other. The municipal franchises of the old Italian towns survived the fall of the Roman Empire, and created a powerful middle-class, which was tolerably independent both of the nobles and of the ruling powers. The importance of this middle-class was further enhanced by the policy of the Papacy, which created dissensions between the ecclesiastical and civil power on the one hand, and between different princes on the other. Thus it happened that, outside the Kingdom of Naples and the Estates of the Church, the nobles and petty princes became gradually merged in the class of mercantile citizens. This was especially the case in Lombardy and Tuscany. So that while the annals of France and of England exhibit only a scene of barbarous ignorance and misery, not only did liberty flourish under the democratic development of northern and central Italy, but literature also, and science, and the fine arts, —in a word, all the results which usually follow in the wake of prosperity and luxury. But “untimely decrepitude was the penalty of precocious maturity.” “The sedentary habits of the desk and of the loom rendered the exertions and hardships of war insupportable.” Instead of fighting their own battles, the Italians hired armies of foreign mercenaries to fight for them; and these mercenaries naturally lacked the virtues and courage inspired by patriotism. Hiring themselves out to the highest bidder, the enemy of to-day might be the employer of the morrow. These mercenary troops therefore opposed and betrayed their employers in turns, and became the scourge of the country. The consequence was two kinds of morality. Among other European races, courage and violence, tempered with scorn for fraud, were the predominant characteristics. The Italians, on the other hand, had recourse to the traditional arts employed by the weak against the oppressor. The qualities in repute were fraud, hypocrisy, dissimulation, cruelty by deliberate purpose and calculation, not less than love of country and elevation of mind. Machiavelli was thus a type of his countrymen, and a very favourable and elevated type. His virtues, which were conspicuous, were his own; his detestable doctrines were but the methodical reflection of the morality current around him. Such is Macaulay's theory in bare outline, and there is undoubtedly a great deal of truth in it. His Essay, moreover, deserves the praise of being the first English attempt by a great writer to do justice to Machiavelli, and to make a complete statement of the case. Yet we are obliged to dissent from some of the most important of the brilliant essayist's conclusions, which appear to us to be drawn from inaccurate premisses. In the space at our command we can of course do no more than indicate some of the errors which, as we think, are mixed up with his very effective sketch.

Macaulay's description would leave the uninstructed reader under the erroneous impression that in Italy—at least, outside the Papal States—there was in the time of Machiavelli a tolerably uniform system of government, namely, a powerful democratic middle-class, dominating both an enfeebled aristocracy and a number of petty princes. The fact, however, is that the political condition of Italy at that time was of the most various character. There were hereditary aristocracies and pure democracies; hereditary principalities and elective principalities; feudal oligarchies and feudal monarchies, like that of Spain or France. Moreover, the same kind of government produced totally different results in different parts of Italy. The hereditary aristocracy which led Venice to so much power and glory made Genoa the theatre of chronic disorder. Under the princely house of Sforza, on the other hand, Milan was distinguished by its progress in the fine arts, in literature, and in material wealth; while the cities of the Romagna for the most part languished in wretchedness, under a form of government similar to that of Milan. All these differences are lost in Macaulay's picturesque generalisation, and his conclusion is consequently fallacious. The several States of Italy were then separated from each other by differences as great as those which divided some of them from Transalpine Governments. It is absurd, therefore, to reduce them all morally, as Macaulay does, to one common denominator. Nor is there any reason to suppose that a democracy addicted to commerce, literature, and the fine arts loses thereby its aptitude for war, and forms and develops a disposition to employ mercenary troops in defence of its territory. Piedmont, the kingdom of Naples, and the Pontifical States employed mercenary troops; yet they remained feudal. On the other hand, Venice, Genoa, Pisa were in the van of civilisation and commerce, and not less distinguished in arms. Nor was the decline of the Italian Republics in material and moral prosperity due, as Macaulay imagined, to any natural law of decay resulting from precocious maturity. It was due to the invasion and domination of alien rulers, and to the malign influence of the Spaniards in particular.

The simple truth is that there was not that radical difference on which Macaulay insists between the political morality of the Italians of the fifteenth century and the political morality of other European countries. For fraud and breach of faith, Ferdinand the Catholic could not have been easily surpassed by any Italian prince of that age. Louis XII. of France made a traffick of his alliances, and our own Richard III. could have been with difficulty matched in perfidy and cruelty by any contemporary Italian ruler. The Borgias are probably more responsible than all other Italian princes collectively for the evil reputation of Italian political morality in the middle-ages. But it is only fair to add that the Borgias were a purely Spanish family. Macaulay is right in saying that Machiavelli did but draw out frankly and exhibit in his Prince the political doctrines which were current in his time. But they were neither indigenous nor confined to Italy; they pervaded European society in general.

We are thus brought to what seems to us the true solution of the bewildering contrast between the elevated and the debased morality which are taught, sometimes side by side, in Machiavelli's political treatises. He recognised the higher morality as the true standard; but he saw it everywhere set at naught. On the other hand, he saw his beloved Italy torn into factions and reduced to misery by the oppressive rule of the stranger; and he yearned and laboured for a United Italy. Republican though he was, he saw that Italy could only be made free by the strong arm of a single ruler; and The Prince is a manual of political statecraft, to help such a ruler to defeat the foes of a unified Italy with their own weapons. Machiavelli does not attempt to justify the doctrines of The Prince on moral grounds; but he thought them justifiable as instruments of political strategy. All that need be said on that point is that Machiavelli was not in advance of his age. And is it quite certain that our own age and country are as far in advance of Machiavelli's age in this respect as they seem? Has there not been within the last few days a remarkable recrudescence in the London Daily Press of the kind of political morality which goes under the name of Machiavellianism? If ever a Government was pledged to respect public right and private property in Egypt, that Government is the present Liberal Government of England. Yet the leading organs of the Daily Morning Press in London, with the honourable exception of the Standard, have been abusing the Government for maintaining its good-faith and respecting the rights and property of men who are supposed to be at its mercy. It is evidently far easier to condemn Machiavellianism than to eschew it. The political immorality of Machiavelli had, after all, for its aim the liberation of his cruelly-oppressed country. Our modern Machiavellis, on the other hand, have no nobler end than the enriching of some respectable traders and a handful of speculators. The ardour of Machiavelli's patriotism and his yearning for the unity of Italy is shown in the passionate outburst of musical eloquence with which he concludes The Prince, and with which we may fittingly conclude this article:—

“Non si deve, adunque, lasciar passare questa occasione, acciocchè la Italia vegga dopo tanto tempo apparire un suo redentore. Nè posso esprimere con quale amore ei fussi ricevuto in tutte quelle provincie che hanno patito per queste illuvioni esterne; con qual sete di vendetta, con che ostinata fede, con che pietà, con che lacrime. Quali porte se gli scerrerebbono? Quali popolo gli negherebbono la obbedienza? Quale invidia se gli opporrebbe? Quale Italiano gli negherebbe l'ossequio? A ognuno puzza questo barbaro dominio? Pigli, adunque, la illustre casa vostra [he is addressing Lorenzo the Magnificent, to whom The Prince is dedicated] questo assunto con quello animo e con quelle speranze che si pigliano l'imprese giuste, acciocchè sotto la sua insegna e questa patria ne sia nobilitata, e sotto i suoi auspicii si verifichi quel detto del Petrarca:—

Prenderà l'arme; e fia 'l combatter corto;
Che l' antico valore

It would probably be an impertinence to the author of Gloria to style him the Spanish Victor Hugo, for, to all appearance, that would be attributing to him a literary ambition of which he is, no doubt, unconscious. But this remarkable story belongs undoubtedly to the Hugoesque school of fiction. It presents the combination of tragedy and comedy, the spectacle of humours luxuriating in the midst of horrors, with which the author of Quasimodo and Les Misérables has rendered us familiar. Señor Galdós, like Hugo, holds up life as a hopeless tragedy. With him, at all events in Gloria, the world, especially the world of creed and motive, is irremediably out of joint. Some of his characters, too, talk what to English ears sounds only like Scholastic jargon and moon-struck rhodomontade, and seem prepared to tell us on the smallest provocation that,—

* Gloria. A Novel. By B. Perez Galdós. From the Spanish by Clara Bell. 2 vols. New York: William S. Gottsberger. London: T. Fisher and Co. 1883.

“The raging rocks
And shivering shocks
Will break the locks
Of prison gates.”

Nor is it too much to say that there are passages in this story—the representation of the struggles between the hapless lovers, the narrative of the agonised conflict between the faith and the heart of the unfortunate man whom Fate and superstition convert into a combination of hero and villain—that will, for intensity and still more for purity of passion, compare not unfavourably with Hugo at his youngest, and what some of us still think his best. Señor Galdós has not attained the stature of his French contemporary; Gloria is not in any sense a grand novel. But there is a vein of softness in him which will recommend him to English readers, and which in Gloria is best shown in the pathetic, closing scene. Circumstances have, indeed, been rather cruel to Señor Galdós, for nature seems to have intended him to be an English novelist, and to have painted for us a whole gallery of bright girls who lead happy lives, because with them “love is an unerring light, and joy its own security.”

The translator of Gloria says she has been prompted to place it before an English-reading public both because it is a sketch of Spanish life of the present day, and because it is a study from nature. These reasons for the translation are sufficiently good. But a third might have been given, in the extraordinary character of the plot. Gloria is really the representation of a duel between fanatical Catholicism and fanatical Judaism—the fanaticism in the latter case is none the less strong that it is racial rather than theological—which ends in the ruin and death of the unfortunates who fight for their creeds. Gloria, a Biscayan Maggie Tulliver, is the daughter of Don Juan de Lantigua, a high-minded, but pedantically Catholic Spanish squire. A peculiar course of reading, chiefly fiction and theology, has made her at the age of eighteen a combination of romance, filial duty, and superstition. Here she is, as she prattles to her father in the beginning of the story, while she waits for the arrival of her uncle, the Bishop:—

“Well, and what about the chapel?”—“Nothing; but his Reverence will want to perform mass there, as he did last time. And a pretty state the chapel was in! We had to wash the Christ three times, for the flies had done his sacred person more dishonor than the Jews. The Virgin’s robe was ruined. I had to burn it and make her a new one out of the velvet you bought for me. I thought we should never get the stains out of the candlesticks with all the whitening we had in the house, but luckily Caifás and I could rub hard, and it has all come as bright as gold. But, do you know, the rats have begun to eat away the feet of St. John!”—“Abominable brutes!” exclaimed Don Juan, laughing. “There is no knowing what they will not do! But thanks to Caifás, who is so clever, he has filled up the wounds in the saint’s feet with some sort of paste or putty, and with a touch of paint they have come out very well. But those rascally vermin, that respect nothing, will not do any more mischief! In three days after the rat-trap was set and baited eleven were caught, as big as wolves! And you still think I have little to do!”—“I think you have plenty to do.”—“Well, then, there are the clothes I had to make for Caifás’s children, that they might turn out decently to receive my uncle—and you wonder that I am incessantly in and out, and up and down. It is my way, dear papa.”—“It is your way—I know that; God bless you!”—“I love my uncle dearly; he is a saint, and I am so happy to think that he is going to live under the same roof with me! All that we have seems to me too little to do him honour and give him pleasure, and I should like to bring him all the wonders of a king’s palace; not having these, I rack my brain to devise every luxury and prodigality to arrange a worthy reception for a man who in God’s eyes—Oh! I cannot bear myself!—I cannot keep quiet—I lie awake in a perfect fever—I pass the night without sleep, thinking of Francisca’s dawdling, of the chapel, of poor St. John being gnawed away, of the spotted candlesticks, of the rats, the smallness of our house for such an illustrious guest.”

Gloria’s father has a lover ready for her, a gallant and orthodox gentleman. But Gloria only likes him, and waits for the arrival of “the other one.” Him a storm in the Bay of Biscay throws at her feet, in the person of Daniel Morton, a member of a Spanish Jewish family that has settled and amassed enormous wealth first in Hamburg and then in London. He is nursed back to health in Don Juan’s house; his Christ-like face, his secret philanthropies, above all, his real goodness of heart, prove too much for poor Gloria’s loyalty to Church and father. Clandestine meetings lead to seduction, or to be just to Morton, to what he considered a natural marriage. Meanwhile, he is weak enough to conceal his religion, and to pretend to be nothing worse than a Protestant. At last all is discovered, and the report of Gloria’s dishonour kills her father. The crisis of the story is reached when Morton, with the connivance of one of Gloria’s uncles,—a banker, a man of the world, and a rationalised Catholic—appears once more on the scene. He finds Gloria secretly visiting their child, and on his pretending to be converted to Catholicism, her relatives, and above all herself, open their arms to him. How the fair prospect of a happy marriage is once more, and finally, overcast through the intervention of Morton’s mother, it would be unfair to tell. Such a plot naturally leads to a number of strong situations. Gloria and Morton, in particular, live in a state of perpetual conflict with each other, with those around them, and above all with their own natures, which are rent alternately by passion and fanaticism. The theological argumentations in which the book abounds become occasionally tedious; and the winds of passion in it have a tendency, as we have hinted, not only to blow, but to crack their cheeks. Yet there is no weakness in Gloria, as regards either plot or style.

With the translator, however, we like Gloria most as a study from nature, and as a sketch from actual Spanish life. Señor Galdós has not made the mistake of crowding his canvas, and so every one of his characters is carefully drawn. Among the most likeable are Caifás, a luckless, but loyal Spanish retainer of Gloria, and a boastful, but physically powerful and courageous curé, who is not much of a saint, but is a great force in political elections, who saves Morton’s life, and then trembles with delight as he reads a newspaper account of his feat. Señor Galdós reproduces the intolerable but spontaneous prattle of the female gossips of present day Spain in a style whose vivacious fidelity to truth recalls Theocritus. His masterpieces in portraiture, however, are the four Lantiguas, Don Juan, the father of Gloria; Serafinita, his sister, equally good and equally superstitious; and their two more easy-going brothers, Don Angel, the bishop; and Don Buenaventura, the banker, who while he is latitudinarian enough to see no difficulty in a Jew becoming a Catholic for the sake of love, cannot conceive himself becoming a Jew for the same reason. We cannot refrain from giving the portrait of the Bishop:—

“The Bishop was just a grown-up child. His plump and rosy features, with their constant, gentle smile, were framed, as it were, between his flowing episcopal robes and the brim of his green sombrero, radiant of spiritual joy, benevolence, perfect peace of conscience and a happy frame of mind towards God and man. He was one of those men who, by the simple impulse of a healthy nature, are prepared to take good for granted in all that surrounds them. His studies, and his experience in the confessional had taught him that there was wickedness in the world; still, whenever he had been talking to any one, he would always say, ‘What a good soul! What an excellent fellow!’ Just as a lamp throws its light on all that come near it, his warm, bright spirit radiated goodness on to all who approached him. He was incapable of harbouring an evil thought of any one whom he knew, and when he heard of the iniquities of those whom he did not know, he never failed to say something in defence of the absent. His intellect was perhaps inferior to that of his brother Don Juan, who was in fact a remarkable man; but he was his superior in genuine piety and sweetness of character; and even with regard to matters of dogma, he held the doctrine of intolerance of error in its purely theological sense, and not in the vulgar acceptance of that misused word; his keen compassion for all the failings and shortcomings of humanity seemed to temper the severity of his opinions. What Don Angel might have done if he could have held in the hollow of his hand the whole mass of modern society, with its vices and heresies, it is impossible to say; as to Don Juan, it is quite certain that he would have flung it unhesitatingly into the fire, and have enjoyed afterwards a perfectly quiet conscience—indeed, a sense of satisfaction at having done a good deed.”

It is plain that, but for the serious character, if not purpose of his work, Señor Galdós would excel as a landscape painter. His style, as such, is a combination of Mr. Hardy’s and Mr. Black’s. Here is Ficobriga, which represents a typical town on the Biscayan coast:—

“It is June, a delicious month in this seaboard district when the storm spares it the visitation of its terrific hand. To-day even the lashing and turbulent Bay of Biscay is at rest. It allows the passing vessels to ride unmolested on its calm surface and plashes sleepily on the shore; while in the depths of the hollows, up the narrow creeks, through the rifts and over the rocks, its myriad tongues murmur sounds of peace. The undulating hills rise gently from the sea to the mountains, each one asserting itself against the rest as though they vied with each other as to which should reach the summit. Little country-houses of quaint aspect are scattered throughout the whole extent of the landscape, but at one point they seem to concentrate and combine, one sheltering itself against another, uniting, in short, to form that noble civic community which is to be known to future ages as Ficóbriga. In the midst of it rises an unfinished tower, like a head bereft of its hat; nevertheless, its two belfry windows are a pair of keen and watchful eyes, and within are three metal tongues which call the congregation to mass in the morning, and lift their voices in prayer as night swiftly falls. All round the little town—for we have now reached it and can see—luxuriant harvest-fields and smiling pastures argue a considerable amount of agricultural skill. Wild brushwood and undergrowth enclose here and there an orchard—with honeysuckle covered with perfumed bunches of pale blossom like spread hands, thorny furze, enormous clumps of fern waving and fanning each other, a few green-crowned pines, and fig-trees innumerable—to which it no doubt owes its name of Ficóbriga. And beyond, what a lovely spectacle is offered by the mountains! a vast staircase mounting to the skies. The most remote, in their pale hues, are lost among the clouds, and in the nearest we can detect many red scars looking like bleeding wounds; which, in fact, they are—cuts made by the miner's tool, as day by day he eats into the sturdy flanks of those giant forms. They rise precipitously towards the west, and in their remoter summits the play of light calls up the semblance of strange humps and crenellations, of towers and out-works, wens and rifts, till the monstrous pile is lost in the clouds. After crossing a timber bridge, of which the rotting piles are half submerged in brackish mud, we mount a hill-side—we are now actually in Ficóbriga—down which the brook rushes, leaping as though not knowing whither it goes, nor where the sea lies waiting to devour it; flinging itself into all the pools at high tide, and rushing out again as the sea ebbs. A few small boats float on its shallow waters, and God alone knows the toil its costs them to make a few yards of progress in the narrow passage when the breeze is sleeping and the tide bears the current downwards, toward the perilous bar. The first houses we come to are miserable enough, and the next not much better. Ficóbriga is a poor community of fishermen and labourers; a few wealthy natives repose on their commercial laurels in a dozen or so of pretty and convenient residences. But what streets! good heavens! The crowded and squalid houses seem ready to tumble down, and from the miserable balconies hang nets, blue shirts, wet capes, and a thousand varieties of discoloured and ragged raiment, while from the rotting eaves hang bunches of maize and of cuttle-fish left to dry, and long strings of garlic."

A storm at sea is also depicted with great power.

We have not had the opportunity of comparing the translation of Gloria with the original, but we should say it is faithful, from the general excellence of the English in which it is rendered.

THE admiration for the writings of Walt Whitman which has been expressed by several cultivated writers and critics of our time has been a matter of much surprise to us. That Mr. Swinburne should have been moved to eulogy of Whitman's "poems" is natural enough. There is an old proverb about the gregariousness of birds of similar plumage which goes far to explain it, and we can understand how it is that many of the less cultivated of Whitman's compatriots should be won over by his gorgeous anticipations of the "fruitage" of American democracy; but that Emerson and Mr. Ruskin, to mention no others, should be found quoted in the advertisement of his book has long puzzled us. Mr. Ruskin is reported to have said that "it carries straight and keen as rifle-balls against our deadliest social sins;" Emerson wrote that it is "the most extraordinary piece of wit and wisdom that America has yet contributed." And besides these and several other eminent authorities, there are not a few of our younger writers who regard Whitman as the great poet of democracy and the pioneer of a new literary era. According to the accepted canons of criticism and taste—canons to which the best minds of the best epochs of civilisation have successively added, or from which they have subtracted—we should have expected that the greater part of Whitman's "poems" would be set down as mere egotistical mouthings of sentiments either trite or untrue, sometimes deliberately nasty, and exhibiting very few traces of the inner qualities or external characteristics of true poetry. What, then, is the explanation of the admiration and eulogy which they have provoked? It seems to us to lie in the following considerations. In his essay On Liberty, Mill says that in an age of conformity "exceptional individuals, instead of being deterred, should be encouraged in acting differently from the mass. In other times, there was no advantage in their doing so, unless they acted not only differently, but better. In this age, the mere example of non-conformity, the mere refusal to bow the knee to custom, is itself a service." A half-unconscious conviction to this effect exists in most men; we often feel that we conform too much, although we see no point at which we had better cease to conform. There is a feeling of individualism, of self-assertion,—of manliness, if you like,—prompting a moment's sympathy with men or causes which reason immediately shows to be unworthy of it. It is hardly too much to say that for the first moment of thought upon a new subject—the Promethean moment—every man is a Radical. Defiance of established custom, though it may soon be seen to be mistaken and misleading, is, for the moment, a grateful testimony to the fundamental independence of our common nature. And the more closely any matter is confined within strict rules and customs, the more sure is any abrupt departure from these to secure a temporary approval and admiration. Now, in no field of modern thought is custom more imperious than in literature, and in no branch of modern literature is the tendency to lay down and follow strict rules so strong as in poetry. When, therefore, a writer appears, styling himself "poet," utterly defying and ridiculing all our rules and customs, he is almost certain to find a temporary circle of admirers who will exaggerate his merits and glorify his defects. This has been the case with Whitman. He comes with the latest version of the old heroic command, "Son of man, stand upon thy feet, and I will speak to thee;" and so at first men overlook all his defects and his emptiness,—they forget that they still find their daily spiritual and intellectual satisfaction in the long-accepted singers of mankind,—while the innate Radicalism of human nature is leading them to offer him a generous welcome.

The volume before us contains Whitman's complete prose works. The edition of Messrs. Wilson and McCormick is apparently printed from the same plates as the American edition, but upon better paper, with wider margins, and is therefore pleasanter to read. We may add, by the way, that the publication of Whitman's works by a Philadelphia house is doubtless accounted for by the fact that the Attorney-General of Massachusetts informed Messrs. Osgood and Co., Whitman's Boston publishers, that the issue of a second edition of Leaves of Grass would be followed by a prosecution for publishing obscene literature. Part of the present prose has appeared before in his books, part in the magazines, and part in the newspapers,—hence the title "Collect"—and the rest, consisting chiefly of items of autobiography, is now printed for the first time. "Specimen Days" occupy more than half the volume, and these are described as "a huddle of diary-jottings, war-memoranda of 1862-65, Nature-notes of 1877-81, with Western and Canadian observations afterwards." They average about half a page each, and are impromptu, unrevised bits of description or reflection "pencil'd" (or sometimes "pencil'd"), about any person, place, or thing to which the author "feels to devote a memorandum," falling for the most part under the three heads of himself, nature, and literature. The following "day" will give the reader an adequate idea of Whitman's descriptions of Nature; his days are joined each to each in natural common-place, and to have read half-a-dozen is to have read them all.

"A HINT OF WILD NATURE."

"As I was crossing the Delaware to-day, saw a large flock of wild geese, right overhead, not very high up, ranged in V-shape, in relief against the noon clouds of light smoke-color. Had a capital though momentary view of them, and then of their course on and on south-east, till gradually fading—(my eyesight yet first-rate for the open air and its distances, but I use glasses for reading.) Queer thoughts melted into me the two or three minutes or less, seeing these creatures cleaving the sky—the spacious, airy realm—even the prevailing smoke-gray color everywhere, (no sun shining)—the waters below—the rapid flight of the birds, appearing just for a minute—flashing to me such a hint of the whole spread of Nature, with her eternal unsophisticated freshness, her never-visited recesses of sea, sky, shore—and then disappearing in the distance."

One quality, however, saves this passage from being pure common-place, viz., its egotism, which makes it offensive. It is a fair specimen of the assurance with which the author sets forth trite reflections, dressed up in a sledge-hammer style, and constantly interrupted by trivial personal parentheses. Here is a typical example of Whitman's literary criticisms, exhibiting the same characteristics. It is typical, we should add, in every respect but one,—in this instance, the reader can discover a definite meaning on the part of the author:—

"There is, apart from mere intellect, in the make-up of every superior human identity, (in its moral completeness, considered as ensemble, not for that moral alone, but for the whole being, including physique,) a wondrous something that realises without argument, frequently without what is called education, (though I think it the goal and apex of all education deserving the name)—an intuition of the absolute balance, in space and time, of the whole of this multifarious, mad chaos of fraud, frivolity, hoggishness,—this revel of fools, and incredible make-believe and general unsettledness we call the world; a soul-sight of that divine clue and unseen thread which holds the whole congeries of things, all history and time, and all events, however trivial, however momentous, like a leash'd dog in the hand of the hunter. Such soul-sight and root-centre for the mind—mere optimism explains only the surface or fringe of it—Carlyle was mostly, perhaps entirely without."

In this grandiloquent and verbose passage there is, at any rate, a very familiar idea to be found; but we have to confess that after careful reading we were unable to detect any definite meaning in the majority of Whitman's literary statements and prophecies, even in the cases where he puts a plain question and professes to give a direct answer. As this may result from our inability to grasp the stupendous forecasts likely to be made by a man who calmly informs us that he found the Rocky Mountains to be the law of his own poems, we will leave our readers to judge between author and critic in a test case. Toward the end of Democratic Vistas (of which, by the way, we made a careful epitome, in a fruitless effort to follow the author's reasoning), Whitman says:—"Repeating our inquiry, what, then, do we mean by real literature? especially the democratic literature of the future?" This is admirably clear and to the point, but hardly has he asked the question before he begins to shuffle out of an answer to it. "Hard questions to meet," he goes on to say, and every succeeding clause takes us further from the point. "The clues are inferential, and turn us to the past. At best, we can only offer suggestions, comparisons, circuits." Then follows a page and a half of really eloquent tribute to the literature of the past, and an apostrophe to its great representatives:—

"Unknown Egyptians, graving hieroglyphs; Hindus, with hymn and apothegm and endless epic; Hebrew prophet, with spirituality, as in flashes of lightning; Christ, with bent head, brooding peace and love, like a dove; Greek, creating eternal shapes of physical and æsthetic proportion; Roman, lord of satire, the sword, and the codex."

This is good in itself, but the "circuit" is leading us further and further from the answer to the plain question with which the author started. When at length the answer does come, it is as follows (and who will interpret it for us?):—

"Ye powerful and resplendent ones! ye were, in your atmospheres, grown not for America, but rather for her foes, the feudal and the old—while our genius is democratic and modern. Yet could ye, indeed, but breathe your breath of life into our New World's nostrils—not to enslave us, as now, but, for our needs, to breed a spirit like your own—perhaps, (dare we to say it?) to dominate, even destroy, what you yourselves have left! On your plane, and no less, but even higher and wider, must we mete and measure for to-day and here. I demand races of orbic bards, with unconditional uncompromising sway. Come forth, sweet democratic despots of the west!"

By points like these, we, in reflection, token what we mean by any land's or people's genuine literature."

In the regretted absence of the sweet democratic despots of the west, we should have been grateful if a little more simple meaning had come forth from the many pages of discourse like the above, which duty has compelled us to peruse. Mr. Stevenson, in his charming eulogistic essay, says, "Whitman is too clever to slip into a succinct formula;" we think it would be truer to say that he is far too unenlightened.

Taken as a whole, however, this volume shows its author in a pleasanter light than is shed upon him by his "poems." The personal element in it is more modest, less vulgar; there are passages of considerable power and original insight, although in most cases his descriptions still depend for their effect more upon a catalogue-like exhaustive enumeration, than upon selective acumen; and he is occasionally very happy in his epithets. But the most interesting parts of the book are those in which he really has something to tell; his reminiscences of the war and his description of the assassination of Lincoln are worth more than all his literary prophecies and political rhapsodies put together. These "war memoranda" suggest one rather unpleasant question; he seems to have done good service in visiting the hospitals and purveying small comforts to the wounded, but when we read his enthusiastic account of the young Union soldiers who faced death so simply and bravely, and bore their fearful sufferings and neglect without a word of complaint, it gives us rather a shock to find him saying immediately afterwards, "During the war I possessed the perfection of physical health," and, "There has lately been much suffering here from heat; I go around with an umbrella and a fan." We cannot help asking what would have become of the Union if many men in the perfection of physical health had contented themselves with an umbrella and a fan and "diary-jottings," instead of shouldering a musket and giving their lives in silence. And while we freely admit the merits we have mentioned, the examination of this volume has confirmed us in our conviction of the absence of any real and permanent significance in Whitman's writings. It is difficult to escape the belief that much of them has been produced with a view to effect. A man who was thoroughly actuated by the principles of democratic independence professed by Whitman would hardly have taken from a private letter of Emerson the over-generous words, "I greet you at the beginning of a great career;" and have flaunted them upon the cover of his book. Occasionally he does give us what he terms "a radical utterance out of the emotions and the physique,"—a phrase intense in its expression, an idea startling in its originality and scope, an exhortation or an appeal powerful in its personal directness, but this is all.

But, in the first place, Whitman is ignorant: this book, with its scrawled title-page, furnishes abundant evidence that its author knows next to nothing of many things which he unhesitatingly exalts or denounces, and that he has no adequate conception of many of the problems he so confidently solves. He declares his determination to get "away from ligatures, tight boots, buttons, and the whole cast-iron civilizee life;" he will have "no talk, no bonds, no dress, no books, no manners;" he tells us that Grant's life "transcends Plutarch," that "it was a happy thought to build the Hudson River railroad right along the shore," (what deadly social sin will Mr. Ruskin think that statement carries against?) that "the time has arrived to essentially break down the barriers of form between prose and poetry," that "the Muse of the Prairies, of California, Canada, Texas, and of the peaks of Colorado . . . soars to the freer, vast, diviner heaven of prose." What rubbish all this is! His grammar is constantly faulty, and much more so in his later works than in his earlier ones,—a suspicious inversion of the general rule. Why should any sane man prevent even his proof-reader from correcting blunders like "I do not know as," and "who they come from"? Unless, too, the reader possesses considerable familiarity with American slang, he will frequently be stopped by such expressions as "fetching up," "scooted," "derring-do," "out of kilter." But the English language, even when supplemented by the most forcible slang in the world, is still unequal to the expression of this man's thoughts, so that he is compelled to employ a large original vocabulary, e.g., "jetted," "gaggery," "compaction," "outcroppage," "literatus," "ostent," "philosoph," "to promulge," and "memorandize." Even in his own name he perpetuates what was doubtless his familiar title among his fellow-compositors on the old Long Island Patriot. Moreover, just as his one successful lyrical poem, "My Captain," is enough to disprove all his theories of poetry, so we have noticed a curious slip, which, though small in itself, still tends to show that his outspokenness is an affectation rather than a genuine impulse. In describing the scene of wild excitement that followed the assassination of Lincoln, he says that the soldiers of the President's guard charged the audience in the theatre, shouting, "Clear out! clear out! you sons of" Think of this for a moment: "no bonds, no manners, no fossil-etiquettes," and then,—"you sons of" Why, even Shakespeare, whom Whitman calls the "tally of feudalism," "offensive to democracy," or Tennyson, "lush-ripening" and "quite sophisticated," would have ventured to write "Hell."

Whitman's second prominent characteristic is animalism, using the word in no specially bad sense. Not to renew an old and unpleasant controversy, we will let the statement pass that he has not written anything which is not pure in its intention, although whatever the author's intention may have been, the intention of his American publisher is indicated by the announcement that the new edition of Leaves of Grass "contains every page, every line, every word attempted to be officially suppressed" by the Massachusetts authorities. We will content ourselves with describing his characteristic as animalism,—the emphatic expression of the simply animal side of human nature. His works simply raise again, with greater vehemence, perhaps, but with the same shallow views, the once famous cry, "Retourmons à la nature!" If to sit naked on a gate in the sunshine, rubbing oneself scarlet with a flesh-brush—a process of which this volume contains a detailed account—were in any way symbolic of human life, then Whitman would be our proper teacher. But as far as this "al fresco physiology" is from being such a symbol, so far is Walt Whitman from holding such a position. And we have nothing to lose in discarding him; for all the radicalism, the love of truth, the independence, the faith in men, in democracy, and in America, which his admirers discover in him, is to be found in Emerson in purer, saner, higher form.

CHURCH AND BRODRIBB'S "LIVY."*

HISTORY records but few campaigns that are comparable for interest with those of Hannibal, and fewer still, perhaps, than have been painted in colours so bright and enduring. Livy was the Macaulay, as Polybius was the Napier, of that memorable contest which is commonly called the Second Punic War,—a contest which Arnold compares with that which Napoleon waged against England. He brackets these mighty struggles together, as being the only two examples which history affords of the highest individual genius being matched against the resources and institutions of a great country. It seems to us that the cases are not quite analogous. Hannibal, while he appears to have been a man quite equal in capacity to Napoleon, stands out as a far more interesting figure in history. Be this as it may, there can be no doubt that the first half of Livy's third decade, which Messrs. Church and Brodribb have translated, is full of undying interest, and that not merely for the striking nature of the events which it recounts, but for the admirable way in which those events are recounted. Not, indeed, for professors and students of military science; they must go elsewhere for the lore which they require, as there is nothing of Jomini in Livy. To take a single example, in his description of the battle on the Trebia, he places the Roman camp on the left bank of that river, and in consequence of this absurdity has to represent Hannibal as so paralysed by his own victory that he either perceived nothing, or else pretended to perceive nothing, when the defeated Romans crossed the river on rafts in his presence, on the night after the engagement. The Roman camp was on the right bank of the Trebia, and it is strange, indeed, that a writer who strove so earnestly to realise the scenes which he describes as Arnold did should have failed to see that it was. But Livy was a writer of a different stamp, and evolved the manœuvre which his blunder necessitated with perfect insouciance; and hence it is that students who consult his work to learn the lessons which campaigns so masterly should teach learn little or nothing:—

"Inconsulti, abeunt, sedemque odere Sibyllae."

But in war, as Napoleon insisted, moral force stands to physical force in the ratio of three to one, and the moral aspects of Hannibal's immortal struggle are finely brought out by Livy, who, as Mr. Church and Mr. Brodribb justly say, had a charming and delightful style, which could most skilfully adapt itself to the events he was narrating, a hearty sympathy with goodness and virtue, and a fearless truthfulness when there was a strong temptation to flattery. These last words may sound strange to some who have been taught to think that Livy's picture of "dirus Hannibal" is a grossly unfair one; but in the main they are just, and we quote with pleasure some further remarks on this subject, from the admirable little essay on "Livy and his History," which is prefixed to this translation:—

"The thought of Rome's surpassing greatness, of her almost miraculous growth from a very humble beginning, was ever present to his mind. This it is, coupled with a remarkably vivid style, which gives to his work the charm and interest of which we are all conscious. The truth is that his History is all the better for having been written with a strong patriotic feeling. He may have been unfair to the great Hannibal, just as many of our own writers find it impossible to be fair to Napoleon. Still, we believe that, even in such cases, when his mind would naturally have a very decided bias, the general impression he leaves is not very far wrong. Hannibal, for instance, whose very name was enough to excite a perfect frenzy of hatred in a Roman breast, stands out in the pages of Livy as quite the greatest figure of the time. Here, at any rate, he has let us see the truth, even while he was most zealously striving to hold up to his reader's admiration the glory and greatness of Rome."

As to the way in which Messrs. Church and Brodribb have translated those eloquent pages in Livy which describe the mightiest exploits of the foremost General of all this world, there is little to be said, since good wine needs no bush. It was not likely that the scholars who have translated Tacitus with such brilliant success would fail with an easier author; and failed, of course, they have not. They have succeeded in a way which leaves no room for criticism. Always faithful, and when consistent with English idiom, literal, their translation is as nearly perfect as possible,—quite as perfect, we should say, if we regard the readers for whom it has been written. A little more brilliancy and force might have been thrown into it, had the translators' object been chiefly to give an unlettered Englishman a vivid notion of Livy's vivid style. But such a game as that would have been by no means worth the candle. It would have been time ill spent to polish and polish sentences in English which, however manipulated, would have failed after all to communicate the ineffable charm of Livy's inimitable style. That charm is really as untransferable as Quintilian's famous description of it (lactea ubertas) is untranslatable. But the readers for whom this translation has been made will find it, as we have intimated, all that they can wish. It is an excellent "crib," then, some one might object. It is, we should answer, but let us distinguish. There are cribs and cribs; and the late Mr. Bohn is answerable for some, but by no means all, of the disfavour in which some cribs are held in England. Arnold knew what he was about when he cried aloud for an honest, straightforward "schoolboy" version of any classic. Such cribs are aids to scholarship, indeed; and as men are beginning to see, or rather, do now see, very plainly that the tortoise-pace at which Latin has hitherto been learnt must be changed for something much faster, they are the aids which yearly become more popular. Macaulay has recorded his method of learning a new language. Well, what that excellent crib the Authorised Version of St. John's Gospel was to him that and more this translation might be made, by an able schoolmaster, for his pupils. We have no space to point out how, and we say without the faintest hesitation that the schoolmaster who would discountenance the use of a translation like this is not worth his salt. Another use to which it might be applied is this. It would really make one of the best introductions to Latin prose composition that can be conceived. If a persevering student will translate four or five sentences every day from this "crib" into Latin, and correct them with Livy for his tutor, we will guarantee that at the end of a year he will write Latin prose with a facility and correctness that cannot be learnt from the books of exercise which are so much in vogue. If, during the same year, he will read as rapidly as he can the text of these five books, with the aid of this translation, and we are contemplating now a fourth-form boy—who during the same period will be put on starvation diet of some thirty of Arnold's exercises and half a book perhaps of Livy—he, that fourth-form boy, will at that same year's end know quite as much Latin as half of the men do who at present teach it in England. There is no need, therefore, from our point of view—and we make no doubt of its correctness—to praise this book. We regard it as a distinct boon to all students of Latin literature, and regarding also Latin itself as an indispensable element in the education of all Englishmen who aspire to anything higher than the Three R's, we do not hesitate to say that Messrs. Church and Brodribb, in writing this translation, have deserved well of the republic of letters. We conclude with an extract, as a specimen of their excellent handiwork; it is the famous description of Hannibal's winter-quarters in Capua:—

"Then for most of the winter he had his army under cover. Often and long had it steeled itself against every human hardship; and of comfort it had had no trial or experience. And thus the men whom no intensity of misery had conquered were now ruined by a superfluity of good things and an excess of pleasure; all the more utterly as, from the novelty of their enjoyments, they plunged into them so greedily. Sloth, wine, feasting, women, baths, and the lounging which, with daily habit, became increasingly attractive, so enervated both body and mind, that henceforward it was their past victories rather than their present strength which saved them. The error of the General was considered by good judges of the art of war more fatal than his not having marched instantly from the field of Cannae to Rome. Delay on that occasion could be thought only to have deferred victory; this blunder sacrificed, as it seemed, the strength needful for victory. And so, undoubtedly, just as if it had been another army with which he had left Capua, Hannibal kept up afterwards none of his old discipline. In fact, entanglements with women made many of his men return thither, and the moment they began to serve under canvas, and trenching and other military duties came upon them, body and spirit alike gave way, as if they had been raw recruits. From this time during the whole period of the summer campaigns, numbers would steal away from the ranks without leave; and it was Capua, and Capua only, that was the hiding-place of the deserters."

FRENCH PURITANS.*

In spite of the reputed impossibility of "seeing ourselves as others see us," there is always a charm in making the attempt to look at ourselves from an outside point of view, and so discovering "how it strikes a stranger." M. Daudet's last book, therefore, deserves to be studied by English people, whether in the original or in Mr. Meltzer's excellent translation, as it shows us how the latest form of Protestant—or, far more truly, Puritan—fanaticism strikes an intelligent and thoughtful man who has not had his senses blunted to religious eccentricities by being brought up in the midst of them, as English and Americans are. No doubt, an Anglican may reasonably resent being told by the curé, in L'Évangéliste, that the Reformed Church is, "Une religion sans discipline, où tout le monde entre comme au moulin, croit ce qu'il veut, peut même jouer au prêtre, si cela l'amuse." "Aussi, voyez quel gâchis de sectes, de croyances! Vous avez les Irvingiens les Sabatistes les Péagers, dont toute la dévotion consistait à se frapper la poitrine à grands coups de poing; [a sect we must confess to never having heard of before] les Derbystes, rebelles à toute organisation ecclésiastique les Méthodistes, les Wesleyens, les Mormons, les Anabaptistes, les Hurlleurs, les Trembleurs. . . . Quoi encore?" We may, indeed, repeat, "What more?" and hold resolutely that between ourselves and many of the sects named above there is a deep gulf; but there can be no doubt that to the eyes of a foreigner, and especially of a Roman Catholic, the gulf is but a small one, and in this humiliating classification we do but "see ourselves as others see us."

The whole plot of the book turns upon the alleged existence of a small Puritan sect in Paris, started and dominated, apparently, by one woman, and holding much the same tenets and doctrines as what M. Daudet calls "L'Armée du Salut" in England. We may as well say at once that our feelings towards the Salvation Army and its French counterpart are very much those of a man who is compelled to have constantly before his eyes a coarse and degrading caricature of a face which he has loved and honoured from infancy; but we are unwilling to believe that the "Army" can ever have descended to such practices as the "Evangelists" are accused of, and we must think that much of what M. Daudet alleges of them is only part of a "roman parisien," as he calls his work. This sense of caricature throughout rather spoils the power of the book; in the most really impressive scenes a certain feeling of unreality steals in, one cannot help thinking it is a bad dream, from which one will soon waken, and perhaps the most prominent idea left on one's mind at the end is the time-honoured,—"Et, surtout, mon ami, point de zèle!" Nevertheless, some of the minor scenes in the book can hardly be surpassed in tenderness and pathos; and we only grieve that these so soon disappear, before the baneful influence of "l'Évangéliste."

Jeanne Autheman and Eline Ebsen are the heroines of the story. The former, daughter of a wealthy Lyons merchant, is, we are told, of a "race emportée et froide, au caractère de volonté et de mélancolique exaltation." Motherless, and left to the charge of an old aunt, "d'un protestantisme étroit, exagéré, noyé de menues pratiques," the aunt's teaching finds congenial soil in Jeanne, who grows up beautiful and delicate, intensely earnest in her narrow views, and longing to devote herself to religious work for life. Engaged at eighteen to a young Genevese missionary, the delightful prospect of sharing his labour absorbs all her ideas; she is really attached to her future husband, and would probably have played a noble part as a missionary's wife, and found a safe outlet for her energies in some heathen land; but her father loses all his money, the marriage is broken off by the young missionary's mother, and the romance of Jeanne's life is over. Soured and embittered by this blow, her religion becomes a matter entirely of head without heart, and her marriage to a wealthy Jewish banker who worships her, and whom she accepts simply for his money, opens the door to all her wildest dreams of evangelising the world. Her husband, one of her earliest converts, makes no difficulties, and Jeanne, taking as her motto, "Une femme a perdu le monde, une femme le sauvera," starts on her ambitious career. Disgusted by the worldly, irreligious lives going on all round her, realising intensely, "What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" Jeanne can see only one way by which this salvation may be made certain,—utter abandonment of all home and family ties, and missionary work in various parts of the world, backed up by the Autheman gold. Her powerful will and intense faith in herself produce a small number of converts, who as soon as they are converted all appear to adopt "un long flottant waterproof" as their invariable costume, and who of course encourage her in her views, so that by degrees the Christian ideal of self-renunciation becomes an insane asceticism, in which Jeanne herself is one of the leaders. Eline Ebsen is the daughter of poor parents; her father gone before her birth, she has been loved and cared for all her life by her mother and grandmother, the latter just dead when the story opens. Eline and her mother live happily together, Madame Ebsen devoted to her daughter, and Eline working contentedly as a daily governess. Like Jeanne, she has had a romance in her life, which the impossibility of leaving her mother and grandmother has destroyed; and now she has consented to marry a man who has never touched her heart, but for whose motherless children she has an intense affection. Full of a passionate mysticism, to which her cold, Swedish Lutheranism gives her no outlet, full of all the heroic enthusiasm of early youth, and of feelings and ideas utterly uncomprehended by those round her, Eline is at a critical period of her life and only eighteen years old when Jeanne Autheman sets her powerful will upon winning her, and little by little draws her into her net. Of course, the attraction to Eline is the idea of self-abnegation and devotion to the Saviour which is the one thread of truth running through Madame Autheman's gloomy creed, illustrating the fact, so well expressed by Tennyson, that,—

"A lie which is half a truth is ever the blackest of lies.

A lie which is all a lie may be met and fought with outright,
But a lie which is part a truth is a harder matter to fight."

The steps by which Eline is led to forsake her home, become one of the "Évangélistes," and break her mother's and fiancé's hearts, are too long and too painful to be dwelt upon here, besides having a savour of impossibility about them, as, indeed, the author seems to have felt, when he has recourse to belladonna and nuxvomica to explain some of Eline's doings. She goes, and the frantic mother exhausts herself in efforts to rescue her; but on every hand the wealth and power of the Authemans defeat her, and her story is, not unnaturally, treated as a "roman d'Anne Radcliffe." By the way, we never saw that celebrated romancer mentioned by her Christian name before. The first lawyer in Paris dismisses her story with the half cynical, half tender, and wholly French sentiment, "Toutes les mères sont martyres," and the only person who raises a voice on her behalf is the old preacher and orator Aussandon, who relates her story from the pulpit to a large audience, including Madame Autheman herself, and winds up with words which we give at length in the original, for their truth, as well as beauty:—

"Dieu bon, Dieu de charité, de pitié, de justice, pasteur d'hommes et d'étoiles, vois quelle caricature ils font de ta divinité travestie sur leur image. Quoique tu les aies reniés et maudits du haut de ton Sermon sur la Montagne, l'orgueil des faux prophètes et des marchands de miracles commet toujours des crimes en ton Nom. Leurs mensonges enveloppent d'un brouillard ta religion de lumière. C'est pourquoi ton vieux pasteur, chargé d'ans et déjà rentré dans la nuit où l'on se recueille et se tait, remonte en chaire aujourd'hui pour dénoncer ces attentats à la conscience chrétienne, et faire entendre à nouveau ta malédiction: 'Retirez-vous de moi; je ne vous ai jamais connus.'"

Aussandon is disgraced and silenced, and an attempt, which, however, fails, is made to put Madame Ebsen into a lunatic asylum. The suicide of Autheman, who has always suffered from a loathsome disease, and has been slowly discovering that his wife is absolutely indifferent to him, turns the tide of public sympathy (the cause of the suicide being unknown) towards Jeanne. Madame Ebsen is forgotten, and lives on alone and sorrowful, until one day Eline unexpectedly returns to her. This is the moment for which the poor mother has so longed, never realising that the separation between her and her child is one of heart, not only of place, and that nothing can reunite those so separated. It does dawn upon her by degrees that, as she writes to Lorie Dufresne, "C'est mon enfant, et ça n'est plus mon enfant;" but she adds immediately, "et, pourtant, je ne perds pas tout espoir de guérir ma fille de cette affreuse maladie de ne plus aimer rien; c'est une affaire de temps et de tendresse." The tenderness is there, but the time is, purposely, not allowed her. Eline is summoned away to carry on "the work" elsewhere, and the mother and child part, it is implied, for ever. With this final blow the book closes, and this ending has been so long inevitable, that it is a relief when the axe has fallen and the worst has come. French people, to our shame be it spoken, seem always to have more sympathy with parental feelings than we have, and the whole episode of Madame Ebsen's devotion to her child and her anguish over the separation is intensely touching, in its simple truth to nature.

We regret that want of space prevents our commenting further on other parts of the story, or on the characters who brighten it by the keen humour with which they are sketched; but it would require pages of quotation to set before the reader the amusing yet touching story of Lorie Dufresne, with his wife and children; or Henriette Briss, the ex-Sister, with her hopeless muddle-headedness and her efforts at being "pratique"; or the excellent husband and wife Romain and Sylvanire; or the "orateur funèbre," Magnabos, &c. Anne de Beuil, we admit, we don't believe in, and are delighted that we see so little of her. We almost owe Mr. Meltzer an apology for not having made our quotations from his translation, which is a most exceptionally good one, indeed the only translation from the French we have ever seen which it is a pleasure to read; but we can conscientiously recommend it, or the original, to such readers as care for a powerful and telling study of a melancholy phase of religion "falsely so called."

AMERICAN LIBERTY AND CONSTITUTIONALISM.*

A GREATER interest attaches to the methods, spirit, and style of the writers of these two volumes than to any fresh facts they have discovered, or any original theories they propound. In his preface, indeed, Mr. Sterne admits that when he was asked to write a popular book on the Constitution of the United States, the first inquiry that occurred to him was "whether, in the multiplicity of works on this, as on every other conceivable subject touching large popular interests, there is any room to say something novel, or to put into a novel form the old matter which has been said and written over and over again by abler tongues and pens." If Mr. Scott does not say the same thing in the much more remarkable work which he has written, he implies as much in the abundant foot-notes which give his authorities for every statement he makes, from the historians and special pleaders of the hour, back to that eminent combination of the practical politician and the theorist whom, with a quaint, cloister dignity, he persists in styling "Mr. Burke." Both works are original—and even then they are original only to a limited extent—in so far as they contemplate the history of the United States in its ante-Independence and post-Independence periods from the evolutionary stand-point. Mr. Sterne speaks of what he has done as "a sketch of the Constitution of the United States as it stands in text and as it is interpreted by the Supreme Court, accompanied by a history of the political controversies which resulted in the formation of and changes in that instrument, together with the presentation of the actual situation of political parties and questions, which, in their turn, may produce constitutional changes." In fact, as treated by Mr. Sterne, American constitutionalism is at once the result of past evolution and material for the evolution of the future. Mr. Scott does not, it is true, concern himself with the American history of the future, or even with the history of the Union, since its place as a nation was definitively recognised. But his essay is cast in almost ostentatiously Spencerian lines. It seeks to disclose the plan of development contained in the history of colonial life in America. We are further told, in what is now the orthodox fashion, that there were three eras in that development,—the era of constitutional development in England; the era of State development in America; and the era of constitutional development in America. The "motives" of these eras are also revealed; that of the first being freedom of conscience, that of the second the development of tribal institutions, and that of the third, the longing for popular sovereignty. Finally, it is set forth that "throughout this trilogy glowed the spirit of liberty, which in the final stage became fierce, and crowned its long task by giving to our people political, religious, and personal freedom, guaranteed by constitution."

Mr. Sterne's work is a conscientious performance of the handy-manual kind, and does not pretend to be anything more. The first four chapters deal with the Constitution of the Union, the Legislative Department, the Executive Power, and the Judicial Power; and as the original articles of Confederation and Constitution, and the supplements which were made to them in the course of time, are given in an appendix, this portion of the book will be found very valuable for reference purposes. The remaining chapters treat of the post-constitutional history of the Union—Mr. Sterne's narrative of the Civil War is rather scrappy—the changes and development of the State constitution, and current questions productive of changes in the Constitution of the Union generally. Mr. Sterne has nothing fresh to say on the political corruptions, the Civil-Service jobbery, and the like, that, to observers like Mr. Spencer, constitute the element of danger in the magnificent American prospect. He attributes them, as everybody has been doing for the last quarter of a century, to the apathy of the cultured and moneyed classes in the Union. This reminds us, however, of a shrewd remark which appears in one of the volumes of essays and addresses that have come from the pen of the present Governor of Madras. Referring to the popular opinion that government should be vested in intellect and property, he says so it should, if only intellect and property were perfect. Property must be far from perfect in the United States, when those who hold it give themselves up to the worship of millions, and what is far worse, of millionaires. Culture, too, must be far from perfect on the moral side when it leads to apathy, isolation, coterie cynicism, and a disinclination to take some part in the public life,—which in the eyes of the author of Natural Religion is synonymous with irreligion, and in the eyes of all thoughtful people is a form of irreligion. The hope for the future of America lies not so much in the possibility of the moneyed and leisured forming a ring against the jobbers and place-hunters, as in the probability of their yet rising to a thorough appreciation of all their own responsibilities and obligations, in their struggling, in fact, after perfection, in the religious, New-Testament sense. One word as to Mr. Sterne's style. It is clear, but rather too ostentatiously adapted to the understanding of that personal or rather third-personal power in modern democratic life who used to be described as "the ordinary reader," but is now coming to be known as "the plain man." Such a style is apt to defeat the purpose of the writer who affects it. Thus a phrase like "a monetary question which has been unfortunately muddled in the United States by demagoguery" has three faults. Its meaning is far from clear, it is long to clumsiness, and it is far from pretty.

Of Mr. Eben Greenough Scott we confess not to have heard, until we read his work on the development of liberty in the American Colonies; and, possibly, it is his first important effort in literature. If so, we sincerely hope it will not be his last. It looks like the production of a man of the modern and mellowed New-England type, serious, and yet imaginative, who, having leisure on his hands, has devoted it to studying and reflecting on the early history of his country in the light of modern ideas. He is the master of a rich and vigorous style, not altogether free, however, from that literary weakness of the cloister, a proneness to over-compression. A single quotation will show our meaning. Speaking of Roger Williams, the remarkable man who founded Rhode Island State, and who anticipated by more than two centuries both the Liberation and Aborigines Protection Societies of our own day, Mr. Scott says:—"His mind was active and clear, and he reasoned well; he had studied hard, and was learned; he had thought much, and was a man of opinions; he had sought light, and had convictions; he was ambitious, resolute, courageous, and of inflexible will; he had winning manners, and being of an amiable, sociable disposition, was born to persuade men. Yet the first thing he did was to set them against him." There is power here, but it is the power that strives to put a quart into a pint measure. Mr. Scott is happiest in his short characterisations. We have never seen a better description of clever, audacious, unscrupulous Charles Townshend than "a political ruffler."

We have already explained the plan and given the fundamental ideas, of Mr. Scott's work. For the rest, it may be fairly described as a sermon of the old-fashioned and eloquent Scotch sort, having for its text Burke's declaration, in his speech on conciliation with America, that liberty there was made fierce by six capital causes,—descent, the colonial forms of government, religion in the Northern provinces, manners in the Southern, education, and remoteness of situation. Mr. Scott deals with all these capital causes in detail, and we may say at once that we have never seen this subject treated so exhaustively by a writer who is, above all things, readable. The chapters on "Religion in the Northern Provinces," "Manners in the Southern," and "Education," are exceptionally good. The most original portion of Mr. Scott's work is that in which he sets forth the commercial relations of the colonies to the mother-country and to each other—the Act of Navigation and the Acts of Trade—as among the co-causes of the American Revolution. For the first time, ample justice is done to

James Otis, a remarkable but little known man, who seems to have been to John Adams very much what Adam Smith was to the younger Pitt. Books of this kind make various impressions on the reader, of which, as a rule, one survives the others. The enduring impression, in the present instance, is that of the township, as the essential strength of the political organisation of New England. "The Government of France," says De Tocqueville, "sends its agents to the commune; in America, the township sends its agents to the Government." In differentiating between French and American constitutionalism, we have not yet got beyond De Tocqueville, as in differentiating between English and American constitutionalism we have not yet got beyond Bagehot.

MEDIÆVAL AGRICULTURE AND COMMERCE IN ENGLAND.*

ONE of the charms of living in an old country like England is to be found in the wealth of antiquarian interest, often, it is true, of a very humble kind, with which every nook and cranny of the land abounds. Many persons realise that they are connected with the past,—or, indeed, seem conscious that they have had any ancestors more remote than their grandfathers—only when they visit an ancient battle-field or the scene of some celebrated event, clamber over the ruins of hoary castle or abbey, or tread the aisles of one of our lovely cathedrals. But to the thoughtful mind there is always a lively interest in trying to read those records of a less pretentious character which are to be found on every hand, and in endeavouring to recall what were the ways and methods of the "rude forefathers of the hamlet," and what were their labours and pursuits. They, in times long past, frequented in their daily life the scenes of our present homes, their eyes beheld the same general features and outlines of the country that our eyes mark to-day, they saw the sun rise above and watched him set below the horizon which to-day is ours, and they tilled and cultivated the very fields we know. The roads we travel were used by them, they strolled by the same foot-pathways which thread our copses and skirt our fields, bargained at the fairs and markets which are still held among us, and worshipped, married, and were given in marriage in the grey old churches yet standing in our midst, and in whose shadow they were laid to rest. It is well for us to grasp the fact that our social life is absolutely continuous with theirs, and to recognise that they were, as are we, actual links in the unbroken chain which binds the ages together. As Professor Rogers says, in the preface to his fourth volume,—

"The economical history of England is as important as the study of legal antiquities, of diplomatic intrigues, and of military campaigns. I cannot but recognise that some indications of progress have been made in the acceptance of such a view about the proper functions of history. Nor do I fail to see that, since the date of my earlier volumes, there has been a growing disposition to test economical conclusions by the evidence of facts, and to avoid the temptation of arriving at general inferences from hypothetical and even imaginative postulates. I do not doubt that at no remote period all history which has neglected the study of the people, and all political economy which has disdained the correction of its conclusions by the evidence which facts supply, will be cast aside as incomplete and even valueless."

It is to the history of England from its social and economical side that this great and laborious work forms so valuable a contribution. An interval of no fewer than sixteen years has passed between the appearance of the first two volumes, which comprised the period from the year 1259 to the end of the fourteenth century, and the publication of the third and fourth, wherein the history is continued during the fifteenth and the greater part of the sixteenth centuries. Following the same lines in the construction of these two volumes as were taken with the first and second, Professor Rogers has given us one volume of pure statistics, and in the other a commentary thereupon. In the third volume we find, arranged under their respective headings, in yearly tables, the prices of hundreds of articles of produce, manufacture, and commerce, of carriage, and of many kinds of labour, with the locality where such prices prevailed. These tables have been derived chiefly from the accounts preserved in the Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, and from the documents deposited in the Record Office. Their compilation has involved almost incredible labour, "peculiarly wearisome, very costly, and frequently disappointing," the whole of which has been personally undertaken by Professor Rogers, who, unassisted, has "consulted at least 80,000 documents, some barren, but most supplying a link in the chain of evidence." But the general reader might wander vainly among these enormous masses of figures, were it not for the guidance of the fourth volume, in whose pages their real significance is made clear. Here we are treated to a series of chapters, analytical and explanatory, on such subjects as the distribution of wealth in England, agriculture in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, the cost of carriage, and the purchasing power of wages; and the masterly way in which Professor Rogers handles his facts, and clothes the dry bones of his statistics with flesh, is well worthy of admiration. He also gives tables of average prices for each year, and for each decade of the period under review, viz., from the year 1400 to 1582; and also for the first 140 and the last 42 years of the term. This is rendered advisable and necessary, owing to the enormous rise in prices consequent on the shameless depreciation of the currency by Henry VIII.

The fifteenth century opened favourably for the labouring and artisan classes, whose numbers had been so thinned by the Black Death that, in spite of all statutes to the contrary, the price of labour was high, whilst the cost of living was very moderate. We read that,—

"Obnoxious and intrusive sectaries were punished with fire and faggot, there was no zeal, hardly any character, no learning at all, no history beyond the battles of the kites and the crows; but there was solid, substantial, unbroken prosperity. The fifteenth century and the early years of the sixteenth, were the golden age of the English husbandman, the artisan, and the labourer. . . . The war of succession was as distant in its incidents, and it seemed to be in its effects, as summer lightning. Even those who took part in the broil, when out of the battle, were safe."

In all his researches among thousands of documents, penned whilst the Wars of the Roses were raging, Professor Rogers says he has only found two allusions to current events. This fully confirms the accounts of Philip de Comines, and other contemporary historians. The Black Death had one indirect effect, which lasted for some sixty years, in bringing in the system of stock and farm leasing; but early in the fifteenth century, land, with the exception of that held by corporations, was usually let "on short leases, and, as a rule, at low and almost fixed rents," to capitalist farmers, who found their own stock, whilst the landowner became simply landlord, living on his rents. To avoid the loss of their estates, except by voluntary alienation, the nobles who fought in the Civil Wars, taking advantage of the statute De Donis, commonly entailed them; and this practice, coupled with primogeniture, was disastrous to younger sons, who, whilst the ancestor had farmed his own land, had shared his personality, but now found themselves portionless. But the new class of yeomen gathered wealth, and bought land, the value of which rose greatly, though rents were inelastic. The art of agriculture was stationary during the whole period of 324 years comprised in Professor Rogers's four volumes. Most of its operations during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries are touched upon in the chapter on the "Condition of Agriculture;" and it is not difficult, after reading these pages, wherein free use is made of Fitzherbert's Book of Husbandry, to realise the manner of living, and the daily labours of the yeoman of the time.

Both horses and oxen were used on the land; wheat, barley, oats, rye, and beans and peas were grown. The mediæval farmer was entirely dependent on his hay and straw for the winter-keep of his stock, for there were no winter roots, and the hay was only the produce of native grasses, artificial grasses being unknown for 300 years longer. Cattle and sheep were fattened in summer, and killed at its close, and their flesh salted for winter use; for few could be kept in condition, save at great expense, through the winter months. The old song of "Summer is y-cumin in," meant much more in those days than it does in ours; the return of spring and summer meant a return to fresh meat and fresh vegetable diet. Onions, garlic, and mustard were grown, but the profusion of garden produce of the present day was quite unknown, and food, though abundant, was coarse, and wanting in variety. Professor Rogers has noted only one instance of the purchase of a $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. of "cabeche" seed in 1458, by King's College, Cambridge, at the enormous rate of 4s. per pound, and this was probably an experiment. The cultivation of the hop was introduced from the Low Countries early in the sixteenth century, and somewhat later sheep-farming began to take the place of agriculture, and was a subject of complaint and of legislation. "The practice appears to have arisen from two causes,—the deficiency of capital, owing to the general impoverishment of the country, and the high prices of wool." In 1532, some flockmasters had 20,000, 6,000, or 5,000 sheep, and it was enacted that in future no one should have more than 2,000. Wheat and rye from the Baltic were imported in quantity sufficient to attract the notice of the Legislature, so that the English farmer was exposed to competition in corn whilst he had the practical monopoly of the wool market. As a consequence, land was laid down in grass, and vast enclosures were made from the common field; and it was this practice, and the injury done to the poor by depriving them of their curtilages, that were the chief cause of Ket's rebellion in 1549, which is "remarkable as being the last attempt which English labourers have made to secure what they believed to be justice by force of arms." Poultry and geese were everywhere reared, and must have been very welcome luxuries in winter. The price was low, a capon or a goose averaging 4d. during the fifteenth century. It should be noted, though the remark is a trite one, that a low money-value by no means indicates cheapness, which is relative to prices then current, and cannot be compared with the prices of to-day. The purchasing power of money in the fifteenth century was extremely great. The average price of an ox was 18s., of a good saddle-horse, 55s., whilst wheat averaged 5s. 7½d., and oats 2s. 1d. a quarter; but the wages of an ordinary labourer were barely 4d. a day, and the rent of arable land did not exceed 6d. an acre. The yield was very small—not more than a fourth of that of the present day—and it may be put down that the average yield of wheat was not over seven bushels to the acre. When, in 1544, the debasement of the coinage began, a notable but variable rise was effected in every commodity but one, the exception being glass, the manufacture of which had been greatly improved. Taking the average price of the first 140 years as unity, the rise in the price of provisions was 2·71, but the price of labour rose only 1·62, a difference which sufficiently explains the evil times that fell on the peasant. The golden era was past:—

"From the epoch of Henry's death, the degradation of the English labourer begins. For nearly three centuries, the artisan suffered with the peasant; that is, as long as the combination laws impeded the creation of those labour partnerships which we call Trade Unions. But the condition of the farm labourer has gone on from bad to worse, has become more hopeless. The best and most capable of them have fled from their traditional occupation, and at the time at which I am writing (1881), as I foresaw when I wrote the last words of my first volume, sixteen years ago, the agricultural problem in England is not the adjustment of local burdens, or the arbitration of rent, or the revival of confidence in those who put capital into land; but it is assuredly the recall of the agricultural labourer to effective and hopeful industry. It is a striking illustration of the fact that economical history has no break in its chain of causes, that we are still engaged with a problem which had its remote but certain beginnings in the wantonness of Henry VIII., and in the rapacity of that aristocratic camarilla of adventurers which he planted round the throne of his infant son."

The artisan and the mechanic flourished during the fifteenth century, and the early part of the sixteenth. Wages were good, and the hours of work short; indeed, the summum bonum of the British workman, eight hours a day, seems to have been attained. The houses and habits of the people at this period were extremely filthy. Life in the middle-ages must have been full of constant alarm from plague and pestilence, and the only wonder is that the Black Death ever ceased its ravages. In the large towns especially, the want of sanitary arrangements caused fearful mortality, and there can be no doubt that their populations, like that of London in the eighteenth century, were kept up solely by immigration from the country districts. The history of the "Rise and Progress of Personal and Domestic Cleanliness" has yet to be written, but it is suggestive of the customs of the time that one lotrix does all the washing at New and All Soul's Colleges, Oxford, and "her remuneration at the latter society does not seem to denote very hard work."

Judging from the low rates for carriage, and the long journeys performed in one day on horseback and by carts, the roads must have been excellent, for the custom of attending fairs and markets and going on pilgrimages made it needful that roads should be well maintained, besides which, the corporations and monastic orders held widely-scattered estates, and these had to be visited; nor was it until after the dissolution of the Monasteries that the roads went out of repair. "It was clearly the interest of those who possessed these scattered properties, to have the communications between them as regular and easy as possible.

The worst English roads were those of the Georges, such as are commented on by Smollett; and they were, perhaps, all the worse because the country party had contrived to shift the cost of repairing them from their own rents on to the purse of the traveller."

We have touched but lightly on a very few of the topics discussed by Professor Rogers. Those who find interest in the annals of the daily life of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries will search these volumes for themselves. There is sometimes a tendency to repetition, in most cases excusable, in some advantageous, though it was hardly necessary to tell us three times within as many pages that sand and brass-dust were used by our ancestors for drying their ink. To the student of history, the facts collected in Volume III. will be found invaluable, even if all Professor Rogers's inferences are not agreed with, whilst the general reader who is so fortunate as to come across them will find a vast amount of entertainment and instruction in the commentative chapters of the fourth volume.

MARY STUART'S "APOLOGIA."*

MR. STEVENSON has no need to apologise for offering this work to the public. The information it contains is, as he truly says, both new and important, and the evidence is that of a witness who has, indeed, "something to say on an interesting question" which is yet, in the opinion of a faithful few, an undecided one. For the witness is no other than Mary Stuart herself, and Nau's fragmentary narrative is in reality a portion of what she intended to be her Apologia. Claude Nau de la Boisselière was a Lorrainer, and naturally, therefore, attached to the House of Guise. He passed from the service of the Cardinal de Guise to that of the Queen of Scots in 1575, probably still a young man—Mr. Stevenson tells us nothing concerning his age—and remained with her up to the abduction of Chartley in 1586. He had studied and practised law, was a fair accountant, and a good linguist, possessing, what was in those days a rare accomplishment for a foreigner, a thorough knowledge of English. There can be little doubt that he was the author of the narrative, and as little that the narrative itself was mainly taken down from the Queen's own lips. The narrative, or rather the fragment we possess, which has long lain unnoticed among the treasures of the Cottonian Library, deals with the history of the years intervening between the death of Rizzio and the removal of Mary Stuart from Carlisle to Bolton Castle, in Yorkshire, in 1568, with some scant notices of events in the years 1569 and 1570. The principal occurrences recorded in it are the murder of Darnley, the marriage with Bothwell, the imprisonment in Lochleven Castle, and the famous escape from that stronghold, so graphically told in Scott's Abbot. The narrative was certainly composed after the death of Bothwell, in 1578, and probably not long before the seizure of Mary's papers at Chartley.

Mr. Stevenson has supplemented the work of Nau with notes and illustrations drawn from various sources, and has added several appendices, containing translations of documents preserved among the secret archives of the Vatican. But these hardly prove more than that the Queen's story as told in the narrative was pretty much the same as that which her defenders had all along presented to the world. On the principal points in the indictment brought against her by her contemporaries and by posterity, the author offers scarcely any rebutting evidence stronger than her own assertions, which can in no wise be regarded as proofs. And, as we shall presently attempt to show, the narrative itself not only charges her accusers with a treachery infinitely more incredible in its diabolical wickedness than what they ascribed to Mary, but by its general tone, and to some extent by positive statements, tends to confirm their case.

The assassination of Darnley, justly characterised by Mr. Froude as belonging to that rare class of incidents which, like the murder of Cæsar, have touched the interests of the entire educated world, was the turning-point in the Queen of Scots' career, from which, deserted by her good angel, her course of life and conduct was one of uninterrupted descent. Without directly asserting the innocence of Bothwell—in one passage, indeed, his guilt seems to be distinctly implied—the narrative on the whole tends to his exculpation. It asserts that the Earl justified himself in full Parliament, and records the Queen's persuasion that "he was entirely cleared of the crime laid to his charge;" while a little further on, it is more positively stated that it was "settled (by the Lords of the Council) that Bothwell should be accused of Darnley's murder," under "pretext of avenging the late King's death;" and that this "was done by the advice of Secretary Lethington (Maitland), with whom Bothwell was on bad terms." But it is impossible to read the following very remarkable passage in the narrative without feeling convinced that Mary must have had, from the beginning, at the very least a shrewd guess as to the authorship of the crime:—

* The History of Mary Stuart, from the Murder of Rizzio until her Flight into England, by Claude Nau, her Secretary. Now first printed, from the Original Manuscript, with Papers from the Secret Archives of the Vatican, &c. Edited, with Preface, by the Rev. Joseph Stevenson, S.J. Edinburgh: W. Paterson, 1883.

"That very night [February 9th-10th, 1566], as her Majesty was about to leave the King, she met Paris, Lord Bothwell's valet-de-chambre, and noticing that his face was all blackened with gunpowder, she exclaimed, in the hearing of many of the lords, just as she was mounting her horse (to return to Holyrood, to assist at the wedding-feast of her servant Sebastian), 'Jesu, Paris, how begrimed you are!' At this he turned very red."

No one doubts Bothwell's guilt at the present day, and no one, probably, doubted it at the time. It is incredible that Mary Stuart, even if no accessory before or after the fact to her husband's murder, could have doubted it in 1586, and the tone of the narrative, which throughout aims at the exculpation of Bothwell, not merely furnishes an argument against its truthfulness, but raises a strong presumption that the peculiarly fiendish treachery she ascribes to her accusers was a late creation of her own brain, a mere count, and an ill-conceived one, in a plea of defence:—

"Their plan," she says, "was this,—to persuade her to marry the Earl of Bothwell, so that they might charge her with being in the plot against her late husband, and a consenting party to his death. This they did shortly after, appealing to the fact that she had married the murderer."

The absurdity of this plea is made manifest by the narrative itself. The one object, we are told, of the Lords was the usurpation of the Crown, planned before Murray's departure, which had preceded the murder. With this special object, it is added, Bothwell had gained them over to his side—they are previously stated to have pressed him upon the Queen as "a man of resolution, well adapted to rule"—some through friendship, others through fear, and "having thus secured their help and advice," seized the Queen's person, in order to compel her consent to a marriage. The marriage, then, was forced on by Bothwell, not urged by way of persuasion by the Lords. Or if Bothwell conspired with the Lords to bring it about, in order to prove Mary's complicity in Darnley's murder, he effected the latter object only at the expense of a practical admission of his own guilt. Lastly, the moment the marriage was accomplished, pursues the narrative, the Lords turned round upon Bothwell, and charged him with the crime, the sole result of which accusation, if successful, would have been the undoing of the very work they had combined to accomplish, and the restoration of Mary to independence. Bothwell, as we have already mentioned, is tenderly treated throughout the narrative. The abduction on the Stirling road is mentioned with the faintest blame. The party opposed to him, although it comprised many of those who "persuaded" the Queen to marry him, is described as actuated simply by jealousy of his rapid promotion, and by disgust at his want of inclination to "put himself to much trouble to gain the good-will of those with whom he associated." The promotion, again, was the spontaneous act of the unfortunate and infatuated woman; at all events, the narrative makes it clear that it was not pressed upon her by any party in the State, and that Bothwell was in no position to compel it. That his enemies hated him otherwise than on account of the elevation they, or many of them, are said to have conspired to bring about, is not hinted at. At Carberry Hill it is admitted that his cause was warmly espoused by Mary, who refused to give him up to the Lords, and it is expressly stated that it was only through her entreaties that he reluctantly left the field, and practically abandoned her to her fate. Not a single phrase or sentence, not a single expression in the narrative betrays the least resentment against the man who, after a violent abduction and imprisonment of his Sovereign, is alleged to have compelled her consent to a marriage which only a few days previously she had absolutely refused to give, and which cost her both crown and kingdom. On the whole, it is impossible not to see in this apologia of Mary Stuart a moral confirmation of the authenticity of the celebrated Casket Letters, to which, by the way, no allusion whatever is made from the first to the last page of the volume.

Of her life at Lochleven and of her escape some details are given which are new to history, and this portion of the narrative is full of dramatic interest, too full, perhaps, to be entirely trustworthy. One of the most curious revelations made is the fact that shortly after her arrival, somewhere about July 24th, 1567, the Queen gave birth to twins, the issue of Bothwell, which were still-born. The account of her escape from Holyrood after Rizzio's murder is equally graphic, and some of the incidents narrated, especially in connection with the subsequent interviews with the Lords and with Darnley, afford a striking picture of the coarseness and brutality of the times.

One more criticism, and we must take leave of this interesting and in some respects valuable book. Nau's fragment begins as follows:—

"Foyz ils avoient mis la main à l'œuvre, il fallait parachever, si tous ne vouloient se mettre au hazard de leurs vies, d'autant qu'ils estoient trop avant, pour reculer."

Mr. Stevenson's version is:—

"As for themselves, as they had begun the business, they must needs finish it. Even if all persons would not risk their lives, they had at least gone too far to recede. . . ."

But surely the point of the passage is here missed. The proper translation seems to be,—“Since they had begun the business, they must needs finish it, if they did not all wish to put their lives in peril; all the more so, in that they had gone too far to recede,” &c.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The French Revolution, 1789-1795. By Bertha Meriton Gardiner. (Longmans.)—The adult reader of this volume, the latest of the "Epochs of Modern History," will do well to bear the fact in mind that the series was, at least originally, intended not for such as he, but for advanced pupils in schools. The period of which Mrs. Gardiner treats—if, indeed, it should not be styled a tragic episode rather than a period—has been so much left to the psychologist on a large scale, the moralist, the rhetorician, the prose-poet, and the scientific historian, that we are as yet hardly prepared for a calm and almost painfully matter-of-fact narrative of it adapted to the intelligence of boys and girls of sixteen. Mrs. Gardiner is, perhaps, a little too anxious to put the Revolution in "plain collar, and cuffs to match." She has probably no sympathy with the magnificent deshabillé of Carlyle; at all events, it is rather ominous that in her preface she should make no mention of him, while she acknowledges her obligations to Michelet, Louis Blanc, Von Sybel, and Taine, and even to such less-known writers as Francisque Mège and Mortimer Ternaux. But we cannot have everything in a history of the French Revolution—at all events, yet—and we ought to be content with the fact that Mrs. Gardiner supplies us with a great deal,—impartiality, method, clearness of statement, caution in judgment. Seldom, if ever, even in much larger and more imposing works, has there been given, at least to the English public, a better narrative of the events that led up to the Revolution. In the course of four pages (pp. 13-17), we have the differences in doctrine between the Voltaireans, the Encyclopedists, the Economists, and the Rousseauists stated with a precision and even a fullness quite sufficient for all practical purposes. Mrs. Gardiner's representation of the aims of and the essential differences, between the leading Revolutionary chiefs is marked by scrupulous fairness. The few words in which she traces the connection between the doctrines of Rousseau and the fanaticism of St. Just, who, had he lived, would probably have superseded Robespierre, since he excelled him in moral force, will compare favourably, even in point of lucidity, with what Mr. John Morley has so admirably said on the same subject.

Eberhard; or, the Mystery of Rathbeck. By Katherine Clive. (Tinsley Brothers.)—The author of this grotesque story deserves some credit for the originality of her plot and for the industry she has displayed in the development of it, though certainly for nothing else. It is a new thing to mix up the fortunes of English girls of the ordinary middle-class type with those of German students—"Herr Pastors" and "Herr Professors"—who speak dubious English, and are susceptible in the extreme. This very Irish-stew of love and examinations, and the "mystery" which forms the centre of it, are all so absurd indeed as to suggest that there may be in them that truth which is stranger than even nineteenth-century fiction. There is one character in the story, Fräulein Schwarzkopf, who keeps a German educational establishment at Rathbeck, and who is so odious from beginning to end that we cannot help thinking her portrait must have been drawn from life; it is quite superfluous on the part of the author to tell us that "never yet had the lightning-flame of glorious, God-given thought flashed through her." If Miss Clive would concentrate her energy and enthusiasm on some simple plot, give up soaring into "prose-poetry," eschew digressions and marks of exclamation, and have no literary dealings with "young tradeswomen of rather questionable character," she would do much better as a novelist than she has done in Eberhard.

The Life and Correspondence of the late Dr. Samuel Hibbert Ware. By Mrs. Hibbert Ware. (Cornish, Manchester.)—The late Dr. Hibbert Ware was well known in Edinburgh and Manchester as a worthy medical man, an antiquarian, and a geologist; and even as the author of "The Philosophy of Apparitions" and "History of the Foundations of Manchester," he deserved something in the shape of a biographical notice. But a brief and modest memoir, telling the story of an honourable but uneventful career, would have been far more to the point than the bulky volume, swollen out with but slightly interesting letters, which is due to the affection and perhaps also to the cacoethes scribendi of his daughter-in-law, who, as she is careful to inform us, is "the youngest daughter of the late Duncan Stewart, Esq., author of 'A Practical Arabic Grammar,' published by Parker, of London." Mrs. Ware means well, however, and tells us some interesting things in the course of her narrative. We have found the first chapters of this book, relating to the Manchester of a hundred years ago, the most curious. A cook could then be had for £5 a year, and the annual rent paid for his dwelling-house by Titus Hibbert, a well-to-do man of business, was £20. Verily, tempora mutantur!

Friends and Lovers, by Annie Thomas (White), contains a really wonderful number of vulgar characters, who use language worthy of them. Among them are a Lord Charildale, who is, till about the last page of the story, a habitual drunkard, and endeavours to get through a marriage ceremony in a state of intoxication; a Lord Timerton, who foams and fumes, and has a habit of breaking out on his wife with "what the deuce;" and a Lady Victoria Gardiner, who has a "gay and débonnaire way of kicking her heels over all social traces," has a little "bijou nest" at Barnes, styled "The Keg," and writes of a couple about to be married that they are "greedy beasts." Even the better-heated among Mrs. Cudlip's "Friends and Lovers"—the Dons, and the Trixies, and the Sylvertres—might well be a little more refined in speech and motive. The plot of the story is poor, and the characters do not bustle about with as much animation as this author generally endows her marionnettes with. Altogether, she has probably never written more hurriedly, or to less purpose.

The New Biblical Atlas and Scripture Gazetteer. (Religious Tract Society).—This atlas, the maps of which are the work of W. and A. K. Johnston, is designed as a companion to Dr. E. P. Barrow's Biblical Geography. The maps are sixteen in number, and supply all that is needed, not only for a popular, but even for a close knowledge of the subject. We may note, as one that gives details, that we do not remember to have seen so conveniently represented before "The Sea of Galilee."

The Marriage in Cana in Galilee. By Hugh Macmillan, D.D. (Macmillan and Co.).—Dr. Macmillan expounds the circumstances of this miracle with much care, with a good-sense and a sound judgment that are but rarely at fault, and with some happy illustrations supplied by his knowledge of natural processes. It is almost inevitable that a writer dealing in this way with a single subject should sometimes find in the narrative, or the language in which it is told, more than is really there. Dr. Macmillan is not quite free from this fault; but on the whole, he is eminently sensible and moderate. We would especially select for notice the admirable treatment of the total-abstinence question, as it touches upon the incident (Dr. Macmillan, however, somewhat minimises the force of μεθυσθῶσι, "When men have well drunk"), the remarks on the evidential use of miracles, and on miracles in general. From the latter we may give a brief extract:—

"I know nothing more comforting, among all the doubts and anxieties caused by the recent discoveries and speculations of science, than the suggestions which arise from the fact that our Lord's first miracle was wrought in such a quiet, unobtrusive, natural way, that it seemed to most of those present an ordinary occurrence. What though science is showing to us more and more clearly that God is working in Nature by uniformitarian methods, and not by cataclysms and abrupt transitions! What though it should reduce the field of the miraculous, and bring much of what we thought were the wonders of God's special and supernatural dispensations within the cycle of natural law? Such a conclusion, could it be satisfactorily established, ought not to shake the faith of any one in God's direct administration, or in any of the great verities of his revealed truth."

Juvenal, Persius, Martial, and Catullus; an Experiment in Translation. By W. F. Shaw, M.A. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.).—Prose translations, Mr. Shaw thinks, are not attractive, and translations in rhymed verse are seldom faithful. The third course is to give verse that shall not be rhymed. Hence the present attempt, which seeks to utilise for the purpose the metre of "Hiawatha." Now, this metre has a certain "fatal facility" about it. A little practice can enable one almost to talk in it; but like all easy metres, it is very difficult to write well, and we cannot think that Mr. Shaw has overcome this difficulty. We shall take a specimen at random:—

"This is how your fancied patron
Will avoid doing anything for you.
He will tell you he's no time left
For your public recitation—
As he's now himself a poet,
Greater e'en than Homer but for Prejudice in antiquity's favour."

Here the second and the seventh lines are wholly out of rhythm. But, however well Mr. Shaw might write the metre, it would not suit the dignified verse of Juvenal. Dignity, indeed, is wholly wanting to this experiment, and it must be said to have failed altogether. Martial is better suited to the purpose, and though we cannot congratulate Mr. Shaw on a success, we willingly allow that some of his work is passable. Here is an epigram (viii.) :—

"What a nuisance is old Euctus,
With his fine old plate! I'd rather Eat off plain Saguntine platters;
Oh! how very flat the wine gets
While he's praising the decanter;
This was great Laomedon's goblet,
And for it Apollo built the Walls of Troy; for this old punch-bowl
Rho-cus battled with the Lapithæ;
How it suffered in the encounter!
This cup's said to have been Nestor's,
How his thumb has rubbed the dove on't!
There's the bowl in which Achilles
Had his grog mixed strong; and here's the Loving cup in which sweet Dido,
At the banquet given to Aeneas,
Drank to Bitias; when you've done your Best to admire this old silver,
You'll have wine quite up to keeping,
Mere Astyanax out of Priam."

Some of these lines are sadly halting, but the effect of the whole is passable. The last line will be probably unintelligible to most readers. The original is, "In Priami cyathis Astyanacta bibes." This is hard to put into good English, though the meaning is plain enough that the liquor was, indeed, a "petit vin." The subtlety of allusion in the Latin,—

"Hic scyphus est in quo meroeri jussit amicis

where the reference is to the,—

"Μελίονα δὲ κρητῆρα, Μενoitίου υἱε, καθίστα, Ζωρότερον δὲ κέραι," of "Iliad" ix., 202-3 (the embassy to Achilles) is wholly lost in Mr. Shaw's somewhat vulgar rendering.

NOVELS.—Pretty Miss Neville. By B. M. Croker. 3 vols. (Tinsley Brothers).—The first volume of this novel relates the sayings and doings of the heroine while she is living at her Irish home, and was a very plain-looking hoyden. In the second volume she is transported to India, and blooms out into the "Pretty Miss Neville" who supplies a title to the story. In her hoyden stage she has been engaged to her cousin, the heir of her grandfather's estate, and this engagement is the source of no little complication when she enters upon her career as a beauty at an Indian station. On the whole, we prefer the Irish scenes, to the Indian; but both are described with much liveliness, and make sufficiently good reading. The story is told in the autobiographical form, a form which it is not easy to manage well. The author contends with this difficulty successfully, and is always natural and easy. Some of her characters, especially the old colonel and his wife, who give Miss Neville her Indian home, are very pleasantly drawn. So is the lively Mrs. Vane, who plays the part of a chorus, and accompanies the action of the story with admirable comment and advice.—A Maid Called Barbara. By Catharine Childar. 3 vols. (Hurst and Blackett).—Miss Childar has certainly succeeded in making her heroine an attractive young person, who keeps the sympathies of a reader, even when she takes the perilous step of losing her heart to a second lover while she is still engaged to the first. The author, indeed, shows no little skill in the management of this part of her tale. There is real dignity and pathos in the story of her heroine at this crisis of her life. She has just written the letter that dismisses her lover; then comes the news of his dangerous illness, caught while he is attending on the sick, and she is in an agony of self-reproach. She finds that a lucky accident has delayed the despatch of the letter, and she regards the incident as a divine help to making effective her repentance. We shall not spoil Miss Childar's story by revealing its plot any further. Let it suffice to say that things are brought round, though not without some ingeniously contrived suspense, to what they should be. The story is a good one, and it is well told. The scenes in Florence, with the picture of the life of the English colony there, are particularly good. The writer, too, gives frequent proof of a gift of quiet humour. The only fault that we are disposed to find in the book is one which springs from the conventional necessity of lengthening it into three volumes. There is a little too much of it; things are put in which might well have been spared,—e.g., a quite general description of sunrise, à propos of nothing in particular, in Vol. II., p. 161. But there is nothing which will seriously interfere with a reader's pleasure.—Miss Standish and By the Bay of Naples. By A. E. N. Bewicke. 3 vols. (F. V. White and Co.).—There is nothing remarkable in the first of these two stories. It is fairly well told, and sufficiently interesting. But is not Miss Bewicke a little confused, when she gets to speak of women's rights and wrongs? "Think, Marian," cries her heroine, "of the women struggling to earn a living for their children, and unable, because of the Factory Acts!" She denounces, it will be seen, laws which were made in the interests of women, because they were not able, it was thought, to take care of themselves under a system of free contract. This is intelligible enough. It is the theory, we suppose, of the advanced advocates of women's rights. But it is surely most unreasonable to go on, as the heroine does, and clamour for all kinds of protection for women, for protection even against the inequalities of natural law. The other story is, we are bound to say, of a most objectionable kind. The plot turns upon the hideous complication of a man in love with the daughter of a woman whom he has seduced. Miss Bewicke doubtless thinks to serve high moral ends by introducing these horrors; but she is making a grievous mistake.—David Easterbrook: an Oxford Story. By Tregelles Polkinghorne. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—What can prompt a writer who, to all appearance, knows very little of Oxford, to write an "Oxford story"? He goes astray in things great and small. The present writer has dined in many college halls, but he never saw in any one of them the "beer bottles" which the hero saw, among many elements of confusion, at his first visit to the hall of his own college. Further, the present writer knows something of University discipline, but he never heard of Professors making reports, either favourable or unfavourable, to the Heads of Colleges about the progress of Undergraduates. The whole story is crude in colouring. As a story, in fact, it is of very small merit indeed. The writer shows at his best when he becomes rhetorical. In chapter xxi., for instance, there is writing of some force about the predominance of evil in the world.

We have received:—A Treatise on Navigation, for the use of students, by J. Merrifield, LL.D., head master of the Navigation School, Plymouth; Helps for Latin Students, by W. T. Jeffcott and G. J. Tossell. (Longmans, Green, and Co.)—Outlines of Sermons on the Old Testament, an addition to the "Clerical Library;" A Popular Introduction to the New Testament, by J. R. Lumby, D.D., Norrisian Professor of Divinity, Cambridge. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—The Religious Feeling, a study for faith, by the Rev. Newman Smyth, D.D.; Christ the Way, and other Sermons, by the Rev. A. Fürst, D.D. (Dickinson.)—Wimbledon, Putney, and Barnes (T. F. Unwin), an addition to the Unwin series of half-holiday handbooks and guides to rambles round London.—In the Country, essays by the Rev. M. G. Watkins, M.A. (Satchell and Co.)—The Epistle to the Hebrews, in Greek and English, with critical and explanatory notes, by F. Rendall, A.M. (Macmillan and Co.)—A new edition of Reminiscences of an Old Bohemian. (Tinsley Brothers.)—Kalos, by a Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons (Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.), a treatise on the so-called scientific culture of personal beauty and the cure of ugliness.—New editions of D'Anvers's Handbooks of Elementary Art,—"Painting the Old Masters;" "Painting, Modern;" "Architecture;" and "Sculpture." (S. Low and Co.)

We have received from Messrs. Pither and Co. (Mortimer Street) a rather clever and successful caricature of Mr. Irving as Benedict; and a less successful one of Mr. Bancroft as Captain Hawtrey, in Caste.

SPECTACLES V. BLINDNESS.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection generally employed by the mere vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." The Rev. Professor W. A. Hale, M.A. Cantab., 2 Minford Gardens, West Kensington Park, writes:—"The Spectacles are perfect, and a most decided boon. I had occasion on Monday to write to Lord —, and took the opportunity to mention your name, and the wonderful power of your Spectacles." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age (82). I can now read the smallest type, although suffering from cataract on the right eye." Testimonials from Earl and Countess Lindsay; F. D. Dixon Hartland, Esq., M.P.; the Venerable Archdeacon Palmer, Clifton; Rev. Mother Abbess, St. Mary's Abbey, Mill Hill, Hendon; C. J. Alford, Esq., Gas Light and Coke Company, Horseferry Road, Westminster, &c. Mr. HENRY LAURANCE, F.S.S., Oculist Optician, 39 OLD BOND STREET, W. DELHI MEDICAL MISSION (S.P.G.)—Established 1867.
—The First Female Medical Mission begun in India.

Over The Delhi and South Punjab Mission of the S.P.G. carries on its work among 3,000,000 of people, and besides Delhi and its suburbs, occupies fifty towns and villages. Its work is carried on,—(1) By training native agents. (2) By philanthropic agencies, of which the most important is medical work among women and children. (3) By day and night schools for boys and young men, with 1,535 pupils. (4) By sanatorium missions, with 792 pupils. (5) By dividing the city and country into districts, giving each a systematic parochial organisation, for both Christians and non-Christians. The Medical Mission attended 13,983 cases, with an average of 121 sick attended daily. Owing to the growth of the work, the Missionaries are responsible for raising £1,500 a year, over and above annual grants from the Society and Government.

Subscriptions for the general work, or for the Medical Mission in particular, will be gladly received and acknowledged by the Rev. Canon CROWFOOT, Minister Yard, Lincoln; by the Rev. R. B. WINTER (Delhi); or by Rev. W. C. BROMHEAD, Kensington Palace, W.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

ON Monday, the Prime Minister announced in the House of Commons, and Lord Granville in the House of Lords, the withdrawal by the Government of the agreement concerning the Suez Canal. Both speeches were speeches of great dignity, and Mr. Gladstone maintained from beginning to end a very high level in treating matters of political and of international feeling. The Government had been compelled, he said, early in the year, by the pressure of the commercial classes and the increasing value and success of the Suez Canal, to open negotiations with the Suez Canal Company and its President, M. de Lesseps, for the improvement of the methods of traffic and its management on the Canal, and for the reduction, so far as possible, of the heavy shipping dues. The danger of identifying such negotiations with the spirit of political party inseparable from party government, and of exciting the international jealousies inseparable from national government of any kind when these negotiations involve the rivalry of two great nations, made the negotiations most delicate and difficult; and the Government determined early to close no negotiation without taking counsel of Parliament and the country, and convincing themselves that what they felt they could on their responsibility safely recommend, would be accepted by Parliament and the country as on the whole satisfactory. Mr. Gladstone recited what they had proposed to give and what they had expected to get by the agreement, and remarked that the real question for the country was whether their quid had been fairly balanced by the quo for which they had proposed to exchange it. The country, apparently, determined that question in the negative,—at first, with some violence,—afterwards with increasing signs of hesitation and suspense of judgment. This being so, the Government had sent over Sir Rivers Wilson to Paris, not to ask for fresh concessions, but to learn whether or not M. de Lesseps thought the Government free to drop the proposal, or whether he held them bound by an engagement to take the opinion of Parliament on the subject. M. de Lesseps, in the readiest way, had released them from any implied engagement to recommend the agreement to Parliament; and this being so, the Government held that, considering the very great mischief of taking issue on such a subject between the two parties in the present excited state of French and English feeling on the subject, the proper course was simply to drop the agreement altogether, and to take no further action on the subject at present.

There were three sentences in Mr. Gladstone's speech which were important enough to make it desirable to put them on record, in relation, first, to the position of the existing Suez Canal Company; and next, to the international character of the Canal. "We think it our duty to do justice, as far as lies in our power, to this great Canal Company, and to its sagacious and energetic projectors. I say that they have claims upon us, claims to respect and honour; for they have conferred a vast benefit upon mankind, and have conferred it by enormous labour and in the midst of great dangers, under unparalleled difficulties, difficulties which were unhappily, in some respects, due to the unfortunate action of this country in former times. We must also disclaim all community of sentiment with those who seem to us virtually to assert an English dominion over the water-way of Egypt; and we must make it known that we at least are not parties to the employment of any influence that may attach to our temporary and exceptional position in Egypt, for the purpose of procuring any invasion or any abatement of any rights they may have. And lastly, recollecting and urging honourable gentlemen to bear in mind that I am speaking for ourselves, I wish to announce that we cannot undertake to do any act inconsistent with the acknowledgment, indubitable and sacred in our eyes, that the Canal has been made for the benefit of all nations at large, and that the rights connected with it are matters of common European interest."

Mr. Gladstone also announced that it was the intention of the Suez-Canal Company and M. de Lesseps to construct at once, under their existing concession, a second canal for the greater part of its length, though they might have to apply to the Government of Egypt for new concessions at one or two places where at present the breadth would be insufficient for a new canal. Secondly, the proposed reduction of dues, pari passu with the increase of profits, would still take place; but would be much slower, of course, than under the proposed agreement, since new share capital or debenture capital must be raised at a higher rate of interest than was asked by England for the loan, and this would diminish the growth of profits. The new shares or new debentures would be issued pro rata to the original shareholders, and England, of course, would have the option of subscribing in respect of her 176,602 shares. M. de Lesseps, it will be observed, has no doubt at all as to his power, under the existing concession, of constructing another canal, so far as the territory already conceded admits of it.

Contemporaneously with Mr. Gladstone's speech, a letter addressed to him by M. de Lesseps was published, asserting in the strongest way the monopoly of the existing Company in the Isthmus of Suez for the ninety-nine years ending in 1968, and explaining his regret that the agreement for extending the commerce and diminishing the dues of the Canal, received so well in France, had been so hastily judged in England. M. de Lesseps, anxious not to foster in any way the international jealousies which heated discussions of this kind might excite, waived with high French magnanimity all claim to the raising of the issue in Parliament, and professed his undiminished zeal for complete accord in the extensions he means to give at once to his undertaking between England and France.

Sir Stafford Northcote on Tuesday gave notice that he would move next Monday, if the Prime Minister would give him the opportunity of doing so, "That a humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying that in any negotiations or proceedings with reference to the Suez Canal Company to which her Majesty may be a party, she will, while respecting the undoubted rights of the Company in regard to their own concession, decline to recognise any claim on their part to such a monopoly as would exclude the possibility of competition, on the part of other undertakings designed for the purpose of opening a water-communication between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea." On this motion Mr. Gladstone commented merely that he and his colleagues had never asserted for M. de Lesseps any monopoly of driving a canal between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, during the term accorded to their Company. All that had been said had been said only in relation to the right of piercing the Isthmus of Suez. The Government, therefore, cannot well meet this ambiguous resolution with a negative,—without relation to the fact that they do not think it expedient to assert officially what they have never conceded officially to M. de Lesseps, though their own opinion as to his "exclusive power" is well known. They will, therefore, meet this ambiguous resolution—meant to draw votes, rather than to elucidate policy—by supporting Mr. Norwood's amendment, denying the expediency of committing the House of Commons at present to any conclusion on the question at issue.

The cholera has spread everywhere in Egypt, though it is a marked feature of this particular epidemic that its deadliness begins to decline rapidly within a week or ten days of its first appearance in any particular city. In Cairo, for instance, the mortality from cholera reached on Tuesday about 500—the population is about 368,000—since which day it has begun to decline, while the epidemic in Alexandria has just commenced its ravages. Of the English troops, 14 have been attacked, of whom 9 have died. The precautions against cholera appear to be almost more cruel than the complaint itself, poor wretches being forced from their plague-stricken homes into camp, without sufficient food to eat, and often suffering there more from hunger than from disease. In Europe, the usual childish and cruel quarantine rules, which have really hardly any proper application to cholera,—which is not an infectious, but strictly an epidemic disease,—are being applied in a sort of irregular panic, at the caprice of the authorities. It cannot be too earnestly insisted that all the best sanitary authorities now concur in declaring the active element in cholera to arise chiefly from bad water, or, indeed, an escape of drainage, and in describing quarantine and strict cordons as "cruel, selfish, morally wicked, and medically useless."

News from Durban, dated July 24th, states that Cetewayo had been defeated and, with a number of his chiefs and wives, killed, by his northern neighbour, Usibebu. It seems hard on Cetewayo that, when he was restored, great pains were taken to limit his army, while no provision was made, or, indeed, could be made, to limit the military power of the savage tribes pressing down upon him from the centre of the African continent. What Palestine had constantly to dread in the old days, these partially-civilised regions of Africa have constantly to dread now,—the rush of the multiplying populations of the north, migrating towards the more enviable countries of the south. "Evil appeareth out of the north, and great destruction," was the constant cry of the Hebrew prophets. From the same cause, and partly for the same reasons, it might be the constant cry of South-African statesmen.

The English Agricultural Holdings Bill has passed through Committee, and it is probable that before this paper is in our readers' hands the Scotch Agricultural Holdings Bill will likewise have passed through that ordeal; nor do we think that, except as regards Mr. Balfour's unfortunate amendment on the former Bill, either Bill has suffered seriously in the process. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's amendment to Clause 5 of the English Bill, which practically enabled landlords and tenants to contract themselves out of the Bill, and to substitute some other scale of compensation for that secured to the tenant by the Bill, was defeated by 139 to 97. On the other hand, Mr. Blennerhassett's amendment, which would have abolished the law of distress for rent altogether, instead of limiting it, as is proposed in the present Bill, to the recovery of one year's rent,—an amendment supported by Mr. J. Howard and Mr. Barclay,—was negatived by 207 to 58. The Bill as it stands is a very moderate, though a very just measure, and we may anticipate that it will pass through the House of Lords with little serious change. The House of Lords are not in a mood to bring odium on themselves by resisting so moderate a proposal as this.

Dr. Andrew Clark and Mr. Prescott Hewett have received baronetries, and this will make the Medical profession in Dublin still more angry at the knighthood just bestowed on Dr. Porter. Still, may it not be fairly argued that there should be gradations in the recognition of medical services, as there certainly are gradations in those services themselves? Dr. Andrew Clark is undoubtedly quite at the head of his profession, and, if he had done nothing else, the service he has rendered in persuading middle-aged men and women not to over-eat themselves, and in showing them how much less food and wine and tea they ought to take than they actually do take, is one quite inestimable, and deserves a certain ethical as well as medical recognition. Mr. Prescott Hewett is one of the most considerable surgeons of his day. When the Dublin men can produce a physician and surgeon who have done as much, we trust that they, too, will receive baronetcies. If hereditary titles are to be of any value, they should be well rooted in public services of a high order.

Mr. Mundella made a very remarkable, as well as a very terse exposition of the educational progress and the educational shortcomings of the country, in moving the new estimates on Thursday night. The estimate for 1883-84 is close on three millions sterling,—£2,938,930,—an increase of £189,000 on the estimate for the past year, but of only £146,945 on the estimate of last year as that was swelled by the supplementary estimate which was submitted in February. Children continued to come into our schools at the rate of 3,000 per week, double the rate of the increase of population, and the average attendance was steadily increasing. The number of children who came into our schools last year was 144,000, but the average attendance had increased by 152,000, so that there are 8,000 more added to the average attendance than were added to the number of scholars. Out of every 100 children on the books, there are now close on 72 of average attendance. The proportion of scholars examined in the higher standards was increasing fairly well. In 1872, only 118,000 children were examined in the higher standards; in 1882, there were 599,029; in other words, the number had more than quintupled in the ten years. Still the school life of English children was the shortest in Europe, and is not only the shortest in Europe, but is growing shorter year by year. "The tendency was to make the children pass the standards earlier and earlier. He was very much struck by a paper which was put into his hand by the Vicar of Meare, a very backward, poor, and much scattered parish in Somersetshire, much flooded in winter. This paper contained an account of the ages at which children passed standard four, the standard of total exemption there. In 1877, it was 14 years; in 1878, 13 years 5 months; in 1879, 11 years 8 months; in 1880, 11 years 2 months; in 1881, 10 years 10 months; in 1882, 10 years 9 months; in 1883, 10 years 8 months." In Saxony now, the compulsory school period was one of eight years,—from the sixth to the fourteenth year,—and yet, while the children liable to attendance were 493,467, the number in attendance was 492,912, so that the Saxon ideal is not as yet even approached by England. To an honourable Member suggesting that this might be because Saxony had a system of free schools, Mr. Mundella promptly replied that Saxony had never had free schools.

Nevertheless, Mr. Mundella did give us hope that education is already telling on the vagabondage and the morality of children. In Birmingham, the average number of juvenile offenders was in the five years ending with 1875, 1,373; while in the five years ending with 1882, it had fallen to 842. In England, the maximum number of juvenile offenders was reached in 1869, when it touched the number of 10,314. In 1875, it had fallen to 7,212, and now it was 5,480. Education, therefore, though it has not yet had time to tell much on the adult criminal classes, has already nearly halved the number of our juvenile offenders. That is truly a beam of light in a dark room.

Amongst the remaining measures of the Session, we trust that the National Debt Bill is pretty sure of cordial support. When we see what our American cousins are doing in the reduction of Debt, a sensation of positive shame comes over us. Here is the account of their achievements as given in a recent number of the St. James's Gazette:—"The amount of Debt paid off in the year ended June 30th, 1880, was £17,000,000, £20,300,000 in 1881, £30,200,000 in 1882, and £27,500,000 in 1883,"—95 millions sterling in four years. "The interest on the Debt at the close of the fiscal year 1880 was £15,900,000. In the fiscal year ended June 30th, 1883, it was £10,200,000, a reduction to two-thirds the amount of four years ago. The Treasury balance at June 30th last stood at £6,000,000 more than it was a year ago; consequently, whatever surplus there is in the Revenue receipts of 1883-84 will be applicable to the further reduction of Debt." Mr. Childers's wise proposals appear very modest indeed, when we compare them with this Titanic operation for the extinction of Debt.

Mr. W. H. Smith and Sir Richard Cross had an opportunity on Wednesday of attacking the Government in addressing the members of the Henley-on-Thames Conservative Association, an opportunity which they used with a good deal of ardour. "If there is one thing," said Mr. Smith, "more prominent in connection with the present Parliament than another, it is that failure is written upon everything that it has undertaken." That depends on a verdict much more weighty and much more important than Mr. Smith's,—the verdict of history. For our own parts, we believe that in the history of this century, as it will be estimated generations hence, no measure is so likely to redound to the credit of this country as the Irish Land Act which this Parliament passed, and which Mr. Smith and his party did all in their power to resist. Nor will this Session itself prove unfruitful, if, as we hope, it passes an Agricultural Holdings Bill, a Corrupt Practices Bill, a National Debt Bill, a Bankruptcy Bill, and a Patents Bill. However, it is of the utmost importance to Mr. Smith and his party to find failure everywhere in the doings of this Administration; and the speck which they carry in their eye, they not unnaturally project on to their field of view.

Sir Richard Cross was even more bitter. He vilified everything that the Government had done. "He charged them with responsibility for all the misery which had been inflicted upon Ireland,—for all the murders, terrors, and abominations that went on, but which ought to have been checked long before the Government held out their hand,"—a responsibility which we suppose he is ready to assume for the previous Administration, which did not hold out its hand, but dissolved Parliament at the very moment at which, in that Government's own opinion, a new Coercion Bill ought to have been passed. Sir Richard Cross had a little stone of his own to fling at the Government, and selected a special Minister for his aim:—"Who was responsible," he said, for the Suez-Canal agreement, "he did not know, but they would probably know, when some other member of the Government was added to that long list of deceased Ministers to whom he had previously referred; but whoever he was, if he had a proper sense of his position, in having been guilty of leading his colleagues into this great blunder, he would send in his resignation without delay." Verily, this indispensable party criticism does become a very petty, ungenerous, and malicious affair, in the hands of small men. They do not mean much harm,—but they want to be smart, and smartness in depreciation does come out so very much like the sly pinches of malicious schoolboys.

A meeting was held yesterday week at Willis's Rooms, in connection with the new Church Schools Company, the object of which is to establish good and moderate Church day schools, into the teaching of which religion should enter on moderate Church lines, though in no sense on the lines of theological seminaries. The Archbishop of Canterbury was the chief speaker, and his speech was a very sensible one, especially guarding against the notion that no Dissenter should be admitted, or that every boy in these Church schools was to be submitted to all the religious teaching in these schools, whether his parents wished it or not. The Archbishop anticipated the best results from the successful establishment of these schools, and their co-ordination in this sense with the higher-class schools,—that the most successful pupils should have the means of passing into the schools where they would obtain still higher teaching of the kind for which they had shown themselves specially fitted. Whether these schools will do much towards undermining Dissent in the next generation, as the Archbishop seems to hope, is another question. We are not quite sure even that, as citizens, we entirely desire it. Unity, no doubt, is a great boon. But it is a question whether the absence of union between Church and Dissent is not less harmful than the internal disunion which almost always exists in a Church not checked by moderate and conscientious external criticism.

Mr. John George MacCarthy, Chairman of the Kerry Land Sub-Commission, dealt this day week in Court with the charges brought against the Irish Land Sub-Commissioners by the House of Lords, in very able and dignified language. "Some of these accusations," he said, "are very serious indeed. They imply that certain unnamed Commissioners reduce rents according to a suggested average; and that others, while making believe to decide according to evidence, really decide according to some juggle of arithmetical figures. As to any suggested average of reduction, or any reduction at all, no one has ever presumed to give to any member of this Commission, directly or impliedly, from first to last, any such suggestion, or any similar intimation whatever. If any such suggestion or intimation had been given, no member of this Commission would hold office for one hour. As to deciding according to a juggle of figures, euphemistically termed by their Lordships 'an arithmetical process,' it is to be presumed that any Commissioners against whom the imputation was made, have got an opportunity of rebutting it. If they be guilty of a fraud so reckless and so heartless, they deserve not merely dismissal, but impeachment. It is scarcely necessary to say that nothing could be more foreign to our principles and our practice. Every essential fact of every case is first heard in Court, and carefully noted by each Commissioner who hears it. Every holding is next subjected to a most careful and generally a most laborious field-to-field examination by the inspecting Commissioners, all gentlemen of high position, stainless probity, and life-long experience in practical farming. Its soil is tested, its improvements estimated, its inherent capabilities investigated, its advantages or disadvantages of locality, climate, and proximity to or remoteness from markets considered. A consultation then takes place between the legal Commissioner and the inspecting Commissioners, when the results of the evidence and of the inspection are compared, the law applied to the facts, and a fair rent fixed according to the best judgment of three impartial men. We interfere with contracts only to secure justice." Nothing could be more satisfactory to the supporters of the Irish Land Act than such statements, and we believe that Mr. Justice O'Hagan, in a very masterly defence of the Land Commission addressed to the House of Lords, has defended the procedure of the Land Commission generally still more authoritatively, on the strength of the same general statements.

Captain Matthew Webb, who succeeded in swimming the English Channel on August 24th, 1875, an operation in the achievement of which he was immersed for nearly twenty-two hours, was drowned on Tuesday, in a mad attempt to swim through the whirlpool at the foot of Niagara. He was rowed in a boat to a point about three hundred yards above the old suspension bridge, and then dived into the river, at four o'clock. He succeeded in swimming the rapids, though very nearly turned over by the force of the water; but when he reached the whirlpool, his strength and courage availed him nothing. His plan was to dive beneath the surface eddy, and to avoid the point of greatest suction; but in all probability, the violence and depth of the whirlpool proved to be something far beyond his utmost imagination. He got through a small part of the whirlpool, but then suddenly threw up his arms, and was seen no more. He was born on January 18th, 1848, and was therefore at his death over thirty-five years of age; and latterly he had not had good health, so that his almost unrivalled strength as a swimmer was not what it had been when he accomplished the great feat of swimming the Channel, eight years ago. We are glad to hear that the statement that the Railway Companies had raised £2,000 as a bribe to him to attempt this mad feat, is untrue. Such a bribe would have been wicked, and should be made criminal.

Mr. Bradlaugh having given instructions to his solicitor to apply for an injunction to restrain the Serjeant-at-Arms from interfering to prevent him from complying with the law, by taking the oath and his seat as the duly-elected Member for Northampton, the Attorney-General moved yesterday week "That leave be given to the Serjeant-at-Arms to appear and plead in an action brought against him by Mr. Charles Bradlaugh;" and afterwards, "That the Attorney-General be asked to defend the Serjeant-at-Arms in the said action." It appeared from his speech that he did not intend the House to enter into the rights of the question between itself and Mr. Bradlaugh, but simply to plead the express orders of the House as full and sufficient warrant to the Serjeant-at-Arms for obeying them. Nevertheless, Sir H. Giffard and others were very anxious to prove that such a course was derogatory to the honour of the House, and that the onus should be thrown on any plaintiff of attempting to prove that what the Serjeant-at-Arms had done was not done by order of the House. These cavillers were, however, overruled, and the resolutions passed. For our own parts, we wish heartily that judgment could be taken in a Court of law on the legal merits of the question,—not on the insignificant matter which will, in all probability, alone be considered by the Court, the competence of the House to override all other Courts of Justice in relation to the management of its own affairs.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE WITHDRAWAL OF THE SUEZ-CANAL SCHEME.

"THEY that will not when they may, when they will they shall have nay," is likely to represent the predominant feeling in the commercial circles of London and the provinces with relation to the Suez Canal agreement, before many weeks are over. The Government were certainly right in withdrawing a scheme which was entered into for the especial benefit of large classes in this country from whom, in relation to their proposal, they had received so little encouragement. It is not the duty of a Government to insist on judging better for mercantile England than mercantile England can judge for itself; and as this agreement with M. de Lesseps was negotiated and conceived in the interests of the shipowners and the manufacturers, and was more or less repudiated by those shipowners and manufacturers,—though very much less, we believe, by the shipowners outside London than has been generally supposed,—the Government had nothing to do except to withdraw a proposal intended chiefly, if not solely, for their benefit. That the withdrawal of the scheme can have any effect but that of weakening the Government, it would be affectation to deny. In our belief, the fault is that of the country, and not that of the Government, who made, as we think, the very best arrangement in their power, and certainly an arrangement of the fulfilment of which M. de Lesseps was by no means ardently desirous, as we may see from the bland and airy complacency with which he releases the Government from any obligation to propose it to Parliament. But in a Parliamentary country, a Government loses strength for the time by any divergence between its own proposals and the wishes of the country, whether the blot be in the national wish or in the official proposal. It may regain the strength it has lost, and even more than the strength it has lost, if the country subsequently comes round to the views of the Government, and it becomes evident that the Government was right and the country wrong; but in the meantime, the Government remains in the position of one whose advice has been rejected by the people,—and a Government whose advice has been rejected by the people, even on a practical point of limited significance, can never be precisely in the position which Mr. Gladstone's Government occupied in the spring of 1880, and for many months at least after it came into power.

Still, granting this fully, it would have been impossible, we think, for any Government to have withdrawn, on the ground of its unpopularity, any proposal which it had made, with more dignity, tact, and simplicity than Mr. Gladstone displayed in his speech of Monday night. There was but one word in that speech the use of which, at that time and for that purpose, we regret. It was the use of the word 'temporary,' as well as 'exceptional,' in relation to our position in Egypt at the present moment. We should sincerely rejoice if Egypt could establish a government that could stand without our help, one that would secure to Egypt the prosperity and tranquillity which we desire for it, and which all Europe and all Asia must desire for it even more earnestly than for any other equally important country, because it commands the route between the one continent and the other. But there is no sign of such a government as yet, and while there is no such sign, it is a mistake, in our opinion, to fix the thoughts of men on the evacuation of Egypt by England, as if it were an event near at hand. As yet, nothing can be conceived more certain to ruin the benevolent views with which England went to Egypt than the recall of our troops from Egypt. "Temporary" is, of course, an ambiguous word. What is not possible now may be possible in three, or five, or ten years; but why suggest the prospect of their recall unnecessarily, at an inopportune moment, when it is most important to get done, for the benefit of the people of Egypt, things which never can be done without the presence of our troops there? Why fix the public mind on an event which, if it were unfortunately precipitated, would mean the total failure of our intervention in Egypt, and which, therefore, does mean, when used at the present time, a renewal of the hope of chaos to those whose interest it is to restore a state of chaos and to render a durable order and a vindication of popular rights the shadow of a dream? We can understand why Mr. Gladstone, in relinquishing a scheme which would certainly have enhanced our influence in Egypt and strengthened our position there, should not be disinclined to suggest to a Parliament which was so cold to that scheme the other alternative to an increase of English influence, the possibility of our retiring from Egypt altogether. But surely it should have been spoken of as the alternative to which the policy of the Opposition pointed, rather than as the alternative to which the policy of the Government at present points. In spite of the fact that we are not to be allowed to increase the influence of England over the Canal in the only way in which we can legitimately and honourably increase that influence, we are bound to improve the Government of Egypt, and to strike at the root of its oppressiveness, before we leave; and we can never do that efficiently, if we are always to be harping on the prospect that we may evacuate Egypt soon. Let us do what we went to Egypt to do, before we talk of the possibility of our leaving Egypt, a prospect which will only render everything that ought to be done more difficult to do, and everything that ought not to be done more difficult to resist. And yet, but for that one word "temporary," which seemed to discount dangerously a still distant future, Mr. Gladstone's speech was an ideal speech of a very difficult type. It confessed failure, without admitting, what he could not admit, deficiency or fault; it did full justice to the firmness and uprightness of the policy of the Government towards Egypt and France alike; and without vexatiously reiterating the opinion expressed by the Government as to M. de Lesseps' exclusive rights, it left no doubt that M. de Lesseps would not be harassed by any hostile use of the influence of the Government with the Khedive of Egypt, of a nature to prevent him from doing, or embarrass him in doing, what the Egyptian Courts would sustain him in doing.

And this is just what the Conservatives and Chambers of Commerce see with the greatest alarm. They have succeeded in defeating the Government proposal, but they have not succeeded in what they desired, that is, in compelling the Government to defeat the alternative plan of M. de Lesseps,—an alternative plan which is very much less to their liking than the plan which they have got rid of. They are now even more eager to prove that M. de Lesseps cannot do without a new concession what he professes his intention of doing, than they were to prevent the Government from coming to terms with him. They are no longer content with preventing any formal recognition of M. de Lesseps's monopoly by the Government; they are anxious to make short work of that monopoly, and even, if we understand them rightly, to see some English competitive scheme fairly set on foot, and protected against his interference. They are now even more in earnest in pressing on the extension of English influence over the future of the Canal, than they were last week in decrying as insufficient that moderate extension of it which the Government had secured for them. In brief, every one who endeavoured to defeat the Government scheme,—excepting the advocates of the international administration of the Canal,—were actuated by motives which will urge them in a still stronger form to oppose the proposed action of M. de Lesseps, if they can only see their way to doing it with any effect. The discontented shipowners and Chambers of Commerce wanted to assert British influence over the Canal much more strongly than the Government plan would assert it, and will have, instead, to see M. de Lesseps and France made supreme in the development of the traffic. The Conservatives wished to get the Government censured for virtually admitting the monopoly of M. de Lesseps, and they cannot be satisfied with anything short of a formal censure on that admission. All the force of the opposition to the scheme is pledged to oppose even more decisively the increase of influence on which M. de Lesseps is now counting. Unless, then, more is effected than has been effected by the withdrawal of the Government agreement, nothing to any purpose will have been effected at all. A false step has been made, unless a further step can be made. Sir Stafford Northcote feels this so keenly that he has proposed a halting resolution, discussed in another column, which means nothing except an attack on the Government, and, unfortunately for him, hardly means that. The Chambers of Commerce are all angry and discontented at the turn things have taken, for they wanted to spur the Government on, and they have only succeeded in pulling the Government up. The Government is no doubt the weaker for the check, but no one else is the stronger or the nearer to his end. This is what comes naturally of a grasping policy. If you will not take what you can get, and grasp at what you ought not to have, you may certainly succeed in making the rejected offer seem ludicrous; but you may also succeed in making those who showed a voracious appetite for more than they refused, still more ludicrous, as they stand looking hungrily at the meal so lately rejected with scorn, which, however, we suspect, that they would even now accept willingly enough.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE'S MOTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE usually contrives to take up a weak position, and the motion of which he has given notice for Monday next is no exception to that rule. He proposes to present a humble address to her Majesty, "Praying that in any negotiations or proceedings with reference to the Suez Canal Company to which her Majesty may be a party, she will, while respecting the undoubted rights of the Company with respect to their own concession, decline to recognise any claim on their part to such a monopoly as would exclude the possibility of competition on the part of other undertakings designed for the purpose of opening water communication between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea." In other words, Sir Stafford Northcote does not venture to invite the Crown to assert that the Suez Canal Company has no monopoly of the Canal route over the Isthmus of Suez for the term of their concession, still less to ask her Majesty to use her influence with the Government of Egypt to invite and authorise competition with the Suez Canal Company during the term of its concession, but only to beg her Majesty not to recognise the exclusive claims put forward on behalf of the present Company. As the present Company has never put forward any exclusive claims except as regards the Isthmus of Suez, and as Sir Stafford Northcote explained in his answer to Mr. Labouchere that he intended to include expressly the Isthmus of Suez in the area in which no exclusive claims were to be recognised, the debate will turn, we suppose, on whether we ought to entreat her Majesty not to recognise the exclusive claims of the Company as regards the Isthmus of Suez, or whether the House of Commons ought to take no steps at present in the matter, which is the ground taken by Mr. Norwood's amendment. That is an issue on which impartial men should not feel much doubt. It is conceivable that an impartial man might think it right to challenge at once the monopoly of M. de Lesseps, and to encourage competition with him; but that is not what Sir Stafford Northcote proposes to do. He proposes only to advise the Crown, if it should renew those negotiations,—which the Government say openly they do not intend to renew for a considerable time to come,—not to recognise a particular claim. No purpose in the world can be answered by preferring such a request as that. If M. de Lesseps is certainly wrong, it is only fair that his fond belief in his own monopoly should be dispelled at once; and then the right course to take is to urge the Government to dispel that belief. If the question is really doubtful, the proper course to take would be at once to clear up that doubt; and then Sir Stafford Northcote should ask for an investigation tending to clear up that doubt. But nothing can justify a mere invitation to the Government not to recognise a claim, which, on Sir Stafford Northcote's principle, they ought either to deny, or carefully to examine with the view of either accepting or denying it. The truth is that Sir Stafford Northcote is not easy enough in his own mind, and is perfectly aware that most of his followers are not easy enough in their own minds on the subject, to venture to ask the Crown to deny the monopoly of the Suez Canal Company, and to invite competitors to enter the field against them. We believe that the chief Members of the last Tory Government entertained precisely the same opinion as to the monopoly of the Suez Canal Company in the Isthmus of Suez as has been more or less expressed by the present Government, and that they would shrink from the thorough-going course of declaring to all the world that no monopoly exists, and that England ought to use her influence with the Government of Egypt to get it to sanction at least the principle of competition, in order that M. de Lesseps might be thereby squeezed into a more compliant mood. As they dare not do this, and still wish to hold a scourge over M. de Lesseps, they try to suggest doubts of the tenability of his monopoly, without asserting its untenability, and to throw discredit on the present Government for assuming what they do not dare themselves to deny. This is a weak course, which an impartial man free from prepossessions of party would never approve. If the monopoly is a fiction, it should be openly exposed. If it is a question, the question should be settled. But to instruct any honourable Government simply not to recognise a proprietary right which may deserve the fullest recognition, without instructing them to clear up the doubt, is to advocate a policy of innuendo towards the Company, a policy vacillating between conflict and cordiality, with the advantages of neither, and the weakness of both.

The Times characteristically tries to make out that the Government, in accepting Mr. Norwood's amendment, which declares that, "This House desires to maintain entire freedom of judgment in regard to all matters connected with the question of water communication between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea," have admitted that their recent negotiation was conducted on wholly wrong principles, which are now surrendered. Of course, it is not so in the least. As Mr. Gladstone distinctly said, the Government have nothing to recant as to the position they have taken up, and unquestionably they did negotiate on the assumption that M. de Lesseps had for the duration of his ninety-nine years a monopoly of the right to make a canal over the Isthmus of Suez. But it does not follow since these negotiations have fallen through, and are not at present to be renewed, that the House of Commons ought to be asked to back up the Government in that assumption. It is quite sufficient for the Canal Company that the present Government have acted on that assumption, and are not likely to challenge that assumption in the time to come. The Canal Company have nothing to fear, and know that they have nothing to fear, from any disposition on the part of the present Government to invade their claim. In the meantime, doubts have been expressed by certain eminent lawyers as to the legal validity of the monopoly, which it is not in the least the duty of the present Government to take any steps to dispel, so long as the negotiations are not to be renewed. Why should they gratuitously take up an abstract cause which bears upon no immediate question of the day, and so superfluously reassure M. de Lesseps as to make him even less disposed to yield to the representations of this country as regards the administration of his Canal, than he might possibly be, if he had even such qualms as Mr. Davey's and Mr. Underdown's legal opinions might suggest? Besides, the present Government might go out, and a new Government, which professes at heart to disbelieve in M. de Lesseps's monopoly, might come in. If that event happened, would it be seemly that a Government which had no immediate practical step in view necessitating a decision of the question, should have hampered its successor by persuading the House of Commons to pass an abstract resolution affirming the Liberal Administration to have been right in its legal view of the monopoly in question? Nothing could be more unseemly now that the negotiation with M. de Lesseps is suspended. The House of Commons ought not to be asked to pass a resolution in the air approving of an assumption made by the present Government, on which it has not acted, and at present does not intend to act. The position of M. de Lesseps is quite strong enough, as it is. He knows perfectly well that the present Government negotiated with him,—rightly negotiated, as we think,—on the assumption of his monopoly. If he knows, also, as, of course, he does, that they have been vehemently condemned by their opponents for making that assumption, and that it is barely possible that those opponents may succeed in turning out the Government and establishing a new Administration which will be disposed, in a vacillating sort of way, to challenge his monopoly, that knowledge will do him no harm. It will, perhaps, make him only the more anxious to deal fairly by English commerce and English political influence, and not to stimulate the English passion for competition with him; and, so far, it will do him good. It would be a most superfluous and unmeaning act of championship to commit the House of Commons to a particular view of his claims, however sound, without any necessity for doing so, and would, indeed, hardly be fair to the Opposition, in the event of their succeeding in expelling the existing Administration from office.

However, Sir Stafford Northcote's motion will certainly bring him no fame. Of course, he will be defeated; but it is not on that account that he will be the worse for proposing it. He will be defeated in an attempt to throw dust in the eyes of the country. He will not say, and dare not say, that if he could form an Administration he would at once encourage English competition with the French Company in possession. He knows perfectly well that such a course would not only embroil us with France, but lower our honour in the eyes of Europe. He wants to get all the advantages with English commerce of disputing M. de Lesseps' claims, without the discredit of publicly attempting to oust M. de Lesseps from the position in which, as Sir Stafford Northcote well knows, he is impregably established. As usual, Sir Stafford Northcote plays the part of Mr. Facing-both-Ways. He is fishing for commercial support, without being willing to hazard French hostility and European condemnation. He is taking a course that is both weak and tricky. And, therefore, his defeat will discredit him.

THE DEPRIVATION OF MR. MACKONOCHE.

NEVER was engineer hoist with his own petard more effectually than the Bishops have been with their pet handiwork, the Public Worship Regulation Act. They went to Parliament to ask for increased power to regulate the conduct of their clergy, and they got the Public Worship Regulation Act. They assured us at the time that this potent instrument would enable them to settle all controversies relating to public worship speedily and inexpensively, and led us to expect that peace and quietness would soon be restored throughout the Church by the suppression of Ritualism. In these anticipations, they found a powerful ally in the Prime Minister of the day. He supported the Bill, on the ground that its object was "to put down Ritualism;" and in the Queen's Speech on the Prorogation of Parliament he described in the following language the happy effect of passing it into law:—"It will tend to prevent or allay the unhappy controversies which sometimes arise from the difficulty experienced in obtaining an early decision on doubtful points of law, and a definitive interpretation of the authorised forms of public worship. Such controversies, even when they occur between persons loyally desirous to conform to the doctrine and discipline of the Established Church, beget serious evils, and their speedy termination by competent authority is a matter of great importance to the interests of religion."

Such were the sanguine expectations of the authors and promoters of the Public Worship Regulation Act. How have they been fulfilled? The Act is nine years old, and in the interval Ritualism has increased widely under the stimulus which persecution rarely fails to supply. To-day the attempt to put it down is a much more formidable task than it was before the Bishops forged their "short and easy method" with the Ritualists. The Act was intended to obviate "the difficulty experienced in obtaining an early decision on doubtful points of law;" and it has achieved its purpose by depriving Mr. Mackonochie, after nine years of tedious and irritating litigation. Nor is it by any means certain that Mr. Mackonochie is finally disposed of. He has disobeyed Lord Penzance's sentence, and will doubtless continue to disobey it. That means contempt of Court, and the punishment for contempt of Court is imprisonment. Is Mr. Mackonochie to be imprisoned? If so, the only persons who will have good cause to rejoice will be the Ritualists. Mr. Mackonochie in prison will make more converts to their cause than a score of Mackonochies at large. For the case of Mr. Mackonochie is very different from the case of Mr. Green. Both, indeed, have been assailed in violation of the spirit and intention even of the Public Worship Regulation Act, which aimed at redressing the wrongs of "aggrieved parishioners." In Mr. Green's parish, and in Mr. Mackonochie's, no aggrieved parishioners could be found; so that, in order to put the Act in motion, it was necessary to create qualified prosecutors by the importation of outsiders. So far, the two cases are alike; but there is one important difference. It was Mr. Green's own Bishop, on the advice of his Metropolitan, who delivered him over to his prosecutors. Mr. Mackonochie's own Bishop, on the contrary, on the initiative of his Metropolitan, and backed by a remarkable expression of public approval, tried to save Mr. Mackonochie from his prosecutors. Mr. Mackonochie resigned his living on the advice of the late Archbishop Tait, and without any promise whatever of other preferment. And before he resigned, he yielded obedience to the only demand which his diocesan made upon him. In other words, Mr. Mackonochie, at the recommendation of the late Primate, anticipated the sentence of Lord Penzance, by depriving himself of the only preferment which he then held. And this he did, as has been publicly stated, without any understanding whatever as to any other preferment. He may therefore be supposed to have morally purged himself of his legal offence. His own Bishop must certainly have been of that opinion, as he instituted him soon afterwards to another living in his diocese. It may be thought by some that the resignation of his living by Mr. Mackonochie was no great hardship, since he was so speedily instituted to another. But it must be remembered that, from a worldly point of view, neither the living which he vacated nor that to which he was subsequently presented offers any attraction. The neighbourhood in both cases is most uninviting, the work hard, unceasing, and in many ways repulsive; and the net income is probably less than Mr. Mackonochie would receive in an ordinary curacy. In no sense, therefore, is Mr. Mackonochie's deprivation a worldly loss to himself. But to a man of his character and temperament it could have been no light sacrifice to have severed his connection with the congregation which he had gathered round him in the course of twenty years of self-denying labour. It is clear from the correspondence which led to his resignation that both the Bishop of London and Archbishop Tait did believe that in resigning St. Alban's Mr. Mackonochie was making a very great sacrifice indeed,—a sacrifice which might well be thought a sufficient punishment for his offence. Yet his prosecutors have pursued him to his new living, as if he had endured no punishment at all; and his own Bishop appears to have no power, so far, to shield him from their vindictiveness. What a satire on the increased powers for dealing with their clergy which the Bishops demanded and got in the Public Worship Regulation Act! Once they put the Act in motion, as Mr. Gladstone warned them at the time, they become powerless, however anxious, to stop the mischief. The Act, too, was to put an end to controversy, and restore peace to the Church; yet the only dioceses where peace and good-will have reigned are the dioceses where Bishops have been prudent enough to make the Act a dead-letter.

We do not greatly blame Lord Penzance for his sentence on Mr. Mackonochie. If, indeed, he had been desirous to give effect to the dying wish of Archbishop Tait he would have found no legal obstacle in his way. It is peremptorily laid down by the Twenty-second Canon that the Bishop alone has the power to pass a sentence of deprivation. And although the Dean of Arches is legally entitled to do so, he evidently inherits that power as a survival of the time when he was merely the Archbishop's delegate. It evidently never was intended to give him power of deprivation contrary to the declared wishes both of the Diocesan and the Metropolitan of the Province. But this is what Lord Penzance has done. He admits that a less severe sentence was in his discretion. He might have passed a sentence of suspension; nor is it a valid objection that the previous suspension had not been enforced by the prosecutors, who shrank from the odium of imprisoning Mr. Mackonochie. We think, however, that the Court of Appeal is more to blame than Lord Penzance. He declined to grant the request of the prosecutors to pass a further sentence on Mr. Mackonochie, till his prosecutors had exacted obedience to the previous sentence by the imprisonment of their victim. But the Court of Appeal ordered him to pass an additional sentence. This appears to us to have been a grave error. A Royal Commission is now inquiring into the working of the present Ecclesiastical judicature, and their report is ready for publication. It seems a great hardship that in the interval the generous and well-meant effort of the late Primate and the Bishop of London to restore peace to the Church should have been upset by the ill-advised decision of the Court of Appeal,—a Court which is not likely to survive for long the report of the Ecclesiastical Courts' Commission.

But what is to be the result of the sentence on Mr. Mackonochie? His imprisonment for disobeying the sentence, under the special circumstances of the case, would hardly be possible; and we doubt whether even the malignity of the Church Association is equal to that display of temerity. The alternative is that he will go on quietly for six months, unless the Bishop or patrons intervene, which they are hardly likely to do. At the end of six months the presentation to the living lapses to the Bishop. But suppose the Bishop declines to present? Will the Church Association venture to prosecute him? Mr. Mackonochie's pertinacity has been so successful hitherto, that it would be rash to assume that he will not even yet baffle the animosity of his persecutors.

THE END OF THE CHANNEL TUNNEL.

NOTHING is certain now-a-days,—therefore we will not say that we have heard the last of the Channel Tunnel. But it seems safe to predict that we have heard the last of it for some time to come. The revolving years may one day bring to light a second Sir Edward Watkin, and when this blessed revelation has been vouchsafed to man, it may turn out that part of the price to be paid for it is another plan for making the invasion of England easier. But this can hardly happen just yet. The controversy of the last two years has put the matter in a very clear light, and the latest detailed examination of the arguments for and against the scheme is excellently suited to build up and sustain a working conviction unfavourable to the Tunnel. The document we have in view is the Draft Report submitted to the Joint Committee by its Chairman. It is true, Lord Lansdowne did not himself intend his report to have the effect here attributed to it. He meant to argue, and wrote in the full belief that he was arguing, in favour of a Channel Tunnel. It is the guilelessness of this conviction that gives its value to the draft. What must not be the force of the reasoning against the project, if the reasoning for it is sufficient to show that it ought never to be sanctioned?

Lord Lansdowne begins by inverting the usual order of the considerations which present themselves in connection with the Tunnel. Most people would first have asked,—Is it safe? and then, having satisfied themselves that it was safe, would have gone on to consider whether it would be profitable. Lord Lansdowne shows that he is entirely free from that contempt for trade which is so often, and in modern times so mistakenly, attributed to aristocracies. His first inquiry is,—Will it be profitable? The question of its safety is relegated to the second place. Consequently, by the time he comes to the question of safety, his imagination has been fired by the pictures presented to it by successive traffic-managers. He has mused so much on the trains—to the number, perhaps, of four in each hour—which would bring the wealth of the world to our doors, that he is scarcely qualified to look at the other side. He makes a gallant effort to do so. He sets out painfully and conscientiously the Military arguments against the Tunnel, but when he has set them in array, they seem to him to have no real weight. Yet they are there, nevertheless, and we shall be surprised if, to cooler minds, they do not convey a conclusion very different from that which Lord Lansdowne founds on them.

"We share," he says, "with the Military witnesses, their opinion that the existence of a Tunnel under the Channel would in some respects modify the conditions under which the defence of this country would have to be undertaken. . . . We agree with them in believing that its possession, either during the progress of operations, or during an occupation of English soil, would be highly advantageous to the invading force, and possibly disastrous to the invaded nation." Strange to say, Lord Lansdowne is prepared to run this risk. He is aware that many of the highest Military authorities are of opinion that the conditions under which the defence of the country must be undertaken after the Tunnel has been made, will be very much less favourable than those under which it would be undertaken if there is no such Tunnel, but he is not in the least disturbed by this knowledge. Other authorities think differently, and Lord Lansdowne is seemingly quite content that the safety of England should depend on the accidental correctness of one of two conflicting opinions. He is in the position of a man who, while protesting that nothing will induce him to risk his life in mountaineering, undertakes an ascent which the majority of the most experienced guides tell him is very likely to be fatal. He quotes, for example, the words of Sir Archibald Alison,—"I am not inclined to fear it as much as I know many military men of great experience do." Sir Archibald Alison is working out a problem in military science, and this is the solution he arrives at. But Lord Lansdowne had to consider whether he shall accept this solution as conclusive, in face of the fact that "many military men of great experience" have arrived at the opposite solution. Surely, in presence of this difference, it is but commonly prudent to take the safer course of the two. If Sir Archibald Alison is wrong, the Tunnel would give us money, and deprive us of what is of infinitely more importance than money. If Lord Wolesey is wrong, the absence of the Tunnel will at worst make us somewhat less rich. How any man can, in cold-blood, advise a great nation to barter certain profit against a contingent insecurity, is beyond our comprehension.

Lord Lansdowne dismisses the hundred and more cases in which hostilities have begun without a previous declaration of war, with the remark that in a large majority of these cases "hostilities, though not preceded by formal warning, addressed to the Power against which they are directed, nevertheless took place at times when, owing to international complications, the continuance of a state of peace could not have been expected." To reason in this way is to forget how differently things look after and before they have happened. When war has once begun, it is easy to see how events had been leading up to it. It is not equally easy to do this when all hopes of maintaining peace have not been given up. "The Franco-German war," says Lord Lansdowne, "broke out with unexpected rapidity, but not so suddenly that either party possessing a single weak point, like the Channel Tunnel, would not have had ample time to place all its defences in working order." Surely a more unfortunate instance could not have been picked out. At least once in the week that preceded the declaration of war, there was an apparent revolution in the intentions of the two Powers. The storm seemed to have completely blown over within four-and-twenty hours of the moment when it burst. There is one most important consideration applying to this part of the subject to which Lord Lansdowne pays no attention. When the relations between two countries are at all strained, any display of distrust or alarm on the part of one of them may hurry the other into war. Each means to fight, if the other means it, and only if the other means it; and each, therefore, is closely watching the other, to see if there is anything in his action which indicates such an intention. Naturally, therefore, each is unwilling to do anything which will make it appear that he accepts war as probable. Now, the destruction, even the temporary destruction, of the Channel Tunnel would make this appear in the most startling and suggestive fashion. There would be no possibility of explaining it away. The result would naturally be that the English Government would be justly unwilling to do anything that, by disclosing its own conviction that war was inevitable, might lead the French Government to show that they, at least, had no wish to avoid it. Thus the very existence of "international complications" making a continuance of peace improbable, might indispose a Government to take the one step which would make the continuance of peace impossible. Supposing that the Tunnel were already in working order, would Lord Lansdowne have had the Government blow it up on the afternoon that the news arrived from Tamatave? We feel sure that he would not have advised this. Yet incidents of no more apparent importance than this have often been looked back to as marking the beginning of a time "when, owing to international complications, the continuance of a state of peace could not have been expected." When they happened, they seemed to wear a quite different aspect. They were mole-hills, out of which no wise Government would manufacture a mountain. Afterwards, they have been recognised as mountains, which an unsuspecting Government mistook for mole-hills. At what precise point between these two extremes would the destruction of the Channel Tunnel seem a precaution implying no distrust, and so conveying no offence?

THE PARCELS POST.

ON Wednesday next, the Parcels Post will come into operation. It will be rather difficult for most persons to realise at first that they can send a parcel of substantial weight to any place in the United Kingdom by merely placing a few stamps upon it, and taking it to the nearest Post Office. The incompetence or perversity of the Railway Companies has left parcels traffic in such a condition that private persons avoid sending parcels altogether, if they can. When the necessity arises, they make up their minds that they will have to pay an extravagant price, and are only too thankful if they find they can pay it all at one end, and can ensure the actual delivery of the parcel without imposing a tax of an unknown amount on the recipient. But in very many cases, such a state of assurance is out of the question. The parcel cannot be delivered at all, or will be finally handed over for delivery to some local carrier, of whom the sender has no knowledge, and over whose movements and charges he has no control. Even when the journey is between towns, if more than one Railway Company engages in the conveyance, it is often found that no through rate exists, and that the parcel is practically charged for two journeys,—one at each end. The late Professor Jevons, two or three years ago, applied his keen powers of analysis to the rates for parcels charged by the leading Companies, and came to the conclusion that it was impossible for any one who was not a Railway manager to understand them. Some reduction of rates has recently been made, in view of the Post-Office competition; but this is only of partial application, and it is certain that the general public are as much in the dark on the subject as ever. It is a notable instance of the danger to the public interests of leaving to trading corporations, huge enough to be monopolists, a discretion to charge the public as they please, in the confidence that their own interests will protect the public convenience. Had the rates for small parcels been regulated like those for goods, the anomalies of the Companies' tariffs would certainly have been less glaring. However, possibly there would then have been a less imperative demand for the Parcels Post, and it is doubtful whether the most enlightened Railway management could ever have done for us what the Post Office may be expected to do.

The limit of weight by the new Post is 7 lb. This is slightly more than the maximum of the International Parcels Post,—3 kilogrammes, or about 6½ lb. On the other hand, the internal Parcels Posts of many countries—for example, of Germany, where the system is most perfect, and of Switzerland—recognise no limit of weight, heavy trunks and goods being transmissible. It is obvious, however, that when great weights are dealt with, the conditions of the service are necessarily altered. It becomes then a serious question whether uniformity of charge for all distances can be maintained; in Germany, it is not. No one, therefore, will be disposed to quarrel with Mr. Fawcett for fixing, at the outset, a very moderate maximum, while they will be grateful that it is fixed sufficiently high to admit of harmonious working with the general Continental system. The dimensions, again, are necessarily limited. A parcel of feathers might reach a portentous size, while keeping within the prescribed weight; and one such parcel might interfere with the convenient delivery of a whole mail. The dimensions adopted are very simple, and fairly elastic. Parcels must not be more than 3 ft. 6 in. in length, or 6 ft. in length and girth combined. This mode of measurement is highly convenient. As the official notices tell us, all that has to be done is to get a piece of tape 6 ft. long, and to mark upon it the length of 3 ft. 6 in. The first step in testing a parcel will be to apply the smaller measurement to the greatest dimension of the parcel. If this is found not to overstep the mark, the condition as to length is satisfied. The residue of the tape not consumed in measuring the actual length will then be available for testing the girth. If it will go round the parcel, the second condition is complied with. Thus, if the parcel only measures three feet in length, there will be three feet of tape left to go round it at its thickest part; if its largest dimension is only 18 in., it may measure 4 ft. 6 in. in the round. Simplicity of measurement is as important as convenience of dimensions at starting, and no more simple plan than that adopted could well have been hit upon.

The Post Office does not propose to adopt any machinery for the posting of parcels analogous to letter-boxes. Parcels are to be posted by being handed in at a post office. Moreover, the sender is to see that his parcel is accepted, as being within the limits of weight and dimensions, and properly stamped. If it does not comply with the regulations, it will not apparently be forwarded, there being no reference in the official notices to any collection of deficient postage from the addressee, as in the case of letters. The rates of postage have been often quoted. They are,—For 1 lb., 3d.; 3 lb., 6d.; 5 lb., 9d.; 7 lb., 1s. The present letter-rate, it will be remembered, is reasonable enough up to 12 oz., but the luckless individual whose letter is found to exceed that weight is charged 1s. 1d.,—1d. an ounce. A letter of 1 lb. weight, therefore, costs 1s. 4d., whereas a parcel of the same weight will be 3d. With the book-rate, again, the new scale compares favourably. Books can be sent, in open wrappers, at ½d. for every 2 oz., or 4d. a pound. A parcel of books, under the new rates, will be sent for 1d. less, and may be completely enclosed, and, if the sender likes, sealed. A book of 3 lb. at the present rates costs 1s., under the new tariff it may be sent for 6d., and so on. On the other hand, it must be remembered that the Post Office has never guaranteed that parcels will go with the same speed as letters. The delivery will be certain, and we may be sure there will be no unnecessary delay. But it may obviously be impossible to send a considerable weight of parcels by the very rapid trains, such as the Limited Scotch and the Irish mails. For books and heavy packets of letters and papers, therefore, the choice will be between cheapness of rate and extra speed.

Only the Inland Parcels Post commences next Wednesday. It will not be possible at present to send parcels to the Continent. It is to be hoped that it may not be long before Mr. Fawcett completes the service, by this most necessary supplement; but when it is considered that some 15,000 postmasters, scattered throughout the country, many of them men of a very limited range of experience, have to master an elaborate set of new Rules in order to ensure the smooth working of the Post, it will probably be thought prudent to proceed by steps. The Post will, however, extend to the most remote districts of Ireland and Scotland, as well as to the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man. It is not improbable that Scotland will make a large contribution in the shape of grouse before the Post is a month old, for game, and even fish, may be sent, if properly packed. In Ireland, it is very possible that the effect of the Post may be more felt than that of some directly remedial measures. Dairy produce lends itself easily to transmission in small quantities, and peasant-farmers may find that by the expenditure of a shilling in postage, they are enabled to save middlemen's profits of two or three times as much. But, indeed, this is only a particular instance of what may reasonably be expected throughout the country. Professor Jevons, if we recollect rightly, considered that the operation of the Post would be akin to that of Free-trade,—it would enable goods produced where the conditions are most favourable to be distributed with an ease hitherto unknown. He had in view, no doubt, a much more extended Post than that which is about to commence. But, in its degree, the new Post will have the effect suggested. It will place dwellers in rural districts in direct communication with the large centres of industry. A person remote from a town will be able to obtain, with an ease and certainty hitherto unknown, and at an ascertained expense, small packets of goods from the large distributing establishments of London and the bigger provincial centres. Indeed, a closer competition between the towns will be promoted, for the postal charge being uniform, it will be as easy for a person living twenty miles from Manchester to obtain a parcel from London as from that town. Whether it will be detrimental to the interests of rural tradesmen remains to be seen. We are inclined to think not, for, except in articles of food, there is no rural trade at present. The wants of a village and the scattered houses and farms around it are not such as to make village shops profitable undertakings. The difference will rather be that persons will be able by the new Post to get things which they must now go without, or must obtain only when opportunity serves. Living in the country will be made more pleasant, and anything which has that effect in England must be hailed as a blessing. Whatever its precise effects, there are no two opinions upon the advantages which will be derived from the new Post, and its working in its early stages and its subsequent development will be watched with keen interest.

COAL AS A FACTOR IN WAR.

IT is not too much to say that the higher strategy of modern Naval warfare must be based on Coal supply, and that the sharp limitations under which fighting-ships now labour will not be fully realised till we have ourselves been at war with a great Naval Power. Steam has introduced changes which operate over a far wider area than that of mere Fleet actions, supposing such actions to be now-a-days practicable in the old sense. To direct Naval operations in distant seas with success and certainty, we have to depend on a secured coal supply for our war-ships, and a Naval Intelligence Department able to tell us exactly what our possible enemies can do. Knowing the coal resources of the principal ports of the world and the coal endurance of foreign ships, it should be possible to lay down tolerably certain limits to the operations of an enemy, since, if neutrality laws are observed with any degree of strictness, it is only subject to certain political combinations that certain ships can be present at all in certain places. Thus conditions more or less hard and fast are introduced which will rule the course of a great Naval war. It is true that a large number of iron-clads are fair or good sailers, and reserving their coal-bunkers for emergencies, can sail round the world; but Naval combinations cannot be made with certainty, nor can the operations of an enemy's cruisers be seriously hampered, still less prevented, without the continuous use of steam. The nation which can count upon that use, therefore, wields an enormous power. Thus coaling stations have become strategical points of vast importance, bringing to bear on Naval war much the same influence which well-placed and well-found fortresses exert on land. But a land fortress is not the absolute source of the mobility of an army, though it may greatly facilitate the movements of a campaign. Moreover, a fortress may in a sense be extemporised, if time allows, as at Plevna. A coaling station, however, supplies the actual motive-power of a Navy, and cannot well be improvised in war-time. Bound up with the question of coaling stations there is that of protected ports, which our vast and scattered Mercantile Marine will require in time of need. At the outbreak of war, the sailing ships, and perhaps the slower steamers, will have to lie up till the storm blows over. They must have protection against armed merchant steamers and fast cruisers, which will prove far more dangerous to trade than the larger ironclads. Defended harbours and coaling stations are therefore required, both as secure ports along great trade routes, and as the possible centres of Naval action in distant seas. Steam has, in fact, changed the relative values of numerous widely-dispersed scraps of territory, and given a military importance to far-away islands. Thus, Sierra Leone, as the first British harbour between Gibraltar and the Cape, acquires considerable value; while in view of the Panama Canal, the French acquisition of Tahiti has a military significance. The annexation policy on which France appears to have embarked may, indeed, prove to be intimately connected with her exertions in shipbuilding. To become a great Naval Power, it is necessary to be much more than the possessor of a great Navy. We may yet see a coral island fortified, and the Chagos or the Cocos group may become a political as well as a geographical expression. Holding half the points of vantage of the world, we have the possibilities of a strategical position of immense strength, both offensive and defensive; but the basis of that strength lies in a well ordered and well apportioned system of fortification.

The importance of the Royal Commission on the defence of British commerce, which finished its labours last year, can hardly be over-rated. Appointed to inquire into the whole question of coaling stations and harbours abroad, to decide which we should be prepared to defend, and how to defend them, it has doubtless thoroughly threshed out the subject and placed clear issues before the Government. It is to be hoped that the subject will not be allowed to drop quietly till a national emergency arises, but that we shall take steps in time to secure the full offensive and defensive power of our costly Fleet. It is a common mistake to assume that the country grudges military expenditure. We are constantly told, for example, that the Army is starved, and that if only a little more money were forthcoming, everything would be well. The fact is that there is an unexpressed feeling of uncertainty—hardly amounting, at present, to want of confidence—as to our whole Military administration. The country has a vague idea that, somehow or other, increased Estimates would not unnecessarily produce increased efficiency. This feeling is not wholly unnatural, and is produced in several ways. Officers are not greatly prone to silence on what they believe to be administrative shortcomings, and even the last-joined subalterns will express their opinions with particular directness. There are even those who see in the rapid and complete success of the Egyptian Expedition only a text on which to base a sweeping condemnation of our whole Military system. The lay mind is left in some considerable perplexity, which the Military papers—journals which combine the minimum of military information with the maximum of querulous criticism—are not likely to reduce. And then, again, it must be confessed that there have been some costly blunders, which the country resents, though it tolerates them with wonderful patience. In 1860, we adopted breech-loading guns on Armstrong's principle for our Field Artillery. This particular system not proving altogether satisfactory, breech-loaders were condemned, in bold defiance of the experience of all Europe, matured on numerous battle-fields. Having, then, deliberately rearmed our Artillery with muzzle-loaders, we are now nearly ready for a third change, and a return to the breech-loading principle is a mere matter of time. But all this is a bagatelle, compared to the monstrous error committed with regard to heavy guns, for which no one has yet been blamed, not to say hanged. The breech-loading principle—scarcely tried—was hastily condemned, as too complicated and delicate. It might perhaps, so we were told, answer for fortress guns, but it was certainly unsuited for the Navy. Yet the difficulty of handling very heavy muzzle-loaders on board ship, together with other causes, is now bringing about a complete change of front. The cost involved in all these sweeping changes of policy and the complication of matériel entailed will never be thoroughly known, while the immediate result is that we have unquestionably lost ground in a race in which we have a right to expect to be first.

The country has already spent more millions on fortifications than it knows, and the return is not entirely satisfactory.

Some of our forts are badly placed. Others are good barracks, where barracks are not needed. Most of them have little or no adaptability, as if their designers considered that finality in the power of artillery had been reached some years ago. If, therefore, there should prove to be some apparent reluctance to grant the money needed to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission, it will be capable of explanation on other grounds than mere parsimony in military matters. The real efficiency of the measures taken, and to a great extent their cost, will ultimately depend on technical details to be decided upon by the Inspector-General of Fortifications, and Sir A. Clarke may be fully trusted not to approach the question with the narrow views of the professional doctrinaire. The matter is one of the utmost importance, and the issues should be clearly placed before the country. Without secured coaling stations, we cannot hope to defend our vast trade in war-time. Countries which have, comparatively speaking, no war navies, can fit out ships which will be far more destructive than the 'Alabama,' and these ships must be met and driven from the seas by our own cruisers and armed mercantile steamers, operating freely from dispersed and distant bases. Moreover, we must hold fast the power of making the weight of our Navy felt in distant seas. Should the commerce of England be once seriously crippled, and her carrying trade driven under other flags, the result might, in the long-run, prove as disastrous as a successful invasion.

M. FERDINAND DE LESSEPS.

AS Paris has been fitly termed "le paradis de l'homme moyen sensuel," so may M. F. de Lesseps be considered as the Adam of the terrestrial Eden. All that Paris longs for, wealth, notoriety, power, he possesses in fullest measure. Yet more, his happiness in private life is undoubted, and the success of the Suez Canal promises him fame after death. Health, wealth, happiness, popularity in the present, and fame in the future, what more can man desire? The question suggests itself, what manner of man is he who has attained such eminence of good-fortune? What gift, or combination of gifts, has achieved such results? This question we have set ourselves to answer, and the reasons for his success shall be sought in the history of his life, and if needs be, in the peculiarities of his time. One word to avoid disappointment. It does not come within our design to determine the moral worth of his rights and privileges, or of those of the shareholders whom he represents. A few words, however, may be said about his father, Count Mathieu de Lesseps, who in 1803 was sent by Bonaparte to Egypt as French diplomatic agent. In this capacity he was commissioned by the Emperor to seek out an able Turkish chief capable of ruling at Cairo. Count Mathieu de Lesseps selected, as his son tells us, "a man who could neither read nor write, an almost unknown Macedonian," to fill the post. The choice bore testimony to the insight of Count Mathieu. Mehemet Ali's ability and unscrupulousness, his friendship for France and hatred of England, have become historical. When M. de Lesseps, as Chargé d'Affaires, died at Tunis, in 1832, he had already educated his son in his own profession.

Ferdinand de Lesseps was born at Versailles on November 10th, 1805; he passed through the Lycée Henri IV. at Paris, and when nearly twenty years of age went to Lisbon as Attaché. From Lisbon he went to Tunis as élève Consul, and learnt, we may presume, to dislike the English, and to nourish the dream of a French empire in Egypt. As a man of twenty-six, he went as Vice-Consul to Alexandria. The next eight years he spent in Egypt, and some incidents of his life in this period must be mentioned. He there married a Mdle. Delamalle, who became the mother of his two eldest sons, Charles and Victor. There, too, during the plague at Alexandria, he showed courage, and was decorated by M. Thiers. Yet these things become unimportant, when we remember that it was during this period that he won the friendship of Mohammed Said, son of Mehemet Ali. In 1838, M. Thiers rewarded M. de Lesseps' capacity and energy in extending French influence by making him Consul-General at Cairo, where, as we are told, he played a prominent part in the intrigues which ended in the bombardment of Acre by a British Fleet, and in the dismissal of Thiers by Louis Philippe. In the first game, Palmerston had checkmated M. F. de Lesseps, who was transferred to Barcelona, without, however, losing his grade. It is not necessary to tell how Lamartine came to advance him to Madrid, or how he was supplanted there by Prince Napoleon. All the world knows, too, how Louis Napoleon sent him to Rome when the Revolution broke out in that city, with instructions to support the Revolutionists, making him, at the same time, the bearer of a letter to General Oudinot, wherein the Prince-President instructed the General to suppress the revolt. M. de Lesseps took the joke badly, wrote a pamphlet in his own defence, and was punished by being placed on the Retired List without pay. In this way his career as a diplomatist came to an end in 1849-50.

What seemed to be utter ruin was turned by his energy into a piece of good-fortune. On one of his early voyages to Egypt, he had been detained in quarantine before Alexandria. To while away time, he sent to his colleague of the French Consulate for some books. Among them he found the report of Lepère, the engineer, upon the feasibility of crossing the Isthmus in some rapid way. From that day he revolved the question in his mind, and in his four years of retirement (1850-54) in Berry he matured his plan.

In 1854 Mohammed Said, the friend of M. de Lesseps' youth, was proclaimed Viceroy of Egypt. On hearing the news, M. de Lesseps embarked for Egypt, in order to obtain the Viceroy's consent to the great undertaking. His reception was all he could wish,—he was treated by the Viceroy as a brother; but the "promoter" had not forgotten his training in diplomacy, and awaited "a favourable moment" for presenting his plan. On November 13th, 1854, at five o'clock in the morning, he sees a magnificent rainbow stretching from east to west; "his heart beats violently," he accepts "the symbol of alliance," and on the same day unfolds his design. Mohammed Said likes the project, and promises support. The act of concession of Mohammed Said to his great friend, Ferdinand de Lesseps, is dated November 30th, 1854. Scarcely was the signature dry before Lesseps returned to Paris, called together an International Scientific Committee, which he transported to Egypt, and which, asserting the practicability of the scheme, decided upon the route of the future Canal. The cost of these proceedings, some £20,000, was borne by the Viceroy.

Before the preliminary investigations were completed, England opposed the scheme; Lord Palmerston acted on the Porte through Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, and the Porte hesitated to ratify the concession. Forgetting all old grudges, Lesseps hastened to Paris and implored the Emperor's assistance. Napoleon replied:—"Strengthen your position, and you shall be supported." Here it must be remembered that the Empress Eugénie was the cousin of M. de Lesseps.

The next years were spent in travelling all night and holding conferences by day, in forming a Company and gaining strength by obtaining eight millions of money. The outcome of the Crimean war increased French influence, but it was not till after the peace, concluded at Villafranca in 1859, that Napoleon felt strong enough to use his power in favour of M. de Lesseps. Then the work went rapidly on till, in 1862, the Mediterranean entered Lake Timsah. Two months later, Mohammed Said died, and Ismail took his place. At once M. de Lesseps named a town Ismaila, to propitiate the new Pasha; but the bribe was not large enough, and the English were still powerful, so the "promoter" appealed once more to Napoleon. The Emperor, in 1864, decided that the Egyptian Government should pay the Company nearly three and a half millions of pounds by way of indemnity,—first, for refusing any longer to furnish forced labour; second, for the retrocession of some arable lands; third, for the cession of the Sweetwater Canal. On November 17th, 1869, the Canal was declared open, before the Khedive, the Empress Eugénie, the Emperor of Austria, and the Crown Prince of Prussia.

England was beaten; and while M. de Lesseps established his private fortune, he realised the Napoleonic legend, and made France a Power in the East. Left a widower in 1854, M. de Lesseps married again, a Mdlle. de Bragard, who has since borne him eight children. The next nine years were spent chiefly in Paris, at his house, Rue St. Florentin. They were years of quiet happiness. Almost any day he could be seen riding or driving with his young children in the Bois, when no laugh rang more merrily than that of the septuagenarian. How he promoted the Panama Canal Company, how he behaved lately in Egypt, and in the still more recent negotiations with the English Government, is so well known as to need no mention.

In this bare sketch of M. de Lesseps' life the man can be seen. Let us first take race characteristics. Vain and irascible his quarrel with Napoleon, and his pamphlet, "Ma Mission à Rome en 1849," show him to be; he is also superstitious, as is evidenced by his frequent references to the rainbow as the

"symbol of alliance." Nor are the good qualities of the Gaul lacking in him; he is quick-witted, affable, and of joyous nature, neither capable of keeping a grudge nor of nursing wrath. One would say, looking at him, at his brown, quick-glancing eyes, and heavy, square-cut chin, this is a ready man of some tenacity of purpose. But such qualities, even when backed by a long training in diplomacy, are not, one would think, rare enough to merit the position M. de Lesseps has secured. That circumstances have aided him is certain, yet it is certain also that the stream furthers most those who swim with it. It is indeed as the creature of his age, as a growth peculiar to a certain mental atmosphere, that M. F. de Lesseps really deserves attention. For this man makes a merit of his egotism. We are told that he cannot understand "narrow, unintelligent selfishness;" and that "he abhors only bigots, drunkards, thieves." Exactly,—the selfishness of the drunkard and the thief is unintelligent, as is the unselfishness of the bigot. M. de Lesseps' patriotism is ardent, he has given proofs of it again and again; he pushes it to the utmost limit to which his enlightened self-interest allows him to push a mere sentiment. Both as egotist and as patriot, M. de Lesseps bodies forth the age. Do not be deceived by his professions! The egotist, now as in the past, insists upon "the interests of universal commerce," just as aforetime the sceptic was always ready with a text from Bible or Koran to commend his scheme to the vulgar. Wise in his day and generation is M. F. de Lesseps! Look a little more closely still,—here is the figure and the reflected image! The age is sceptical of the supernatural, and materialist; so is M. de Lesseps. The age boasts of its tolerance; it is democratic; and M. de Lesseps tells us "that men, like horses, are only wicked when afraid!" His energy, his tact, his indomitable perseverance, his courage, are all tainted with selfishness. And this selfishness is of the senses, is sensuous and luxurious.

"Put money in thy purse." Iago's phrase may be taken as the device of M. F. de Lesseps. Here we reach his morality, which is, too, the common morality of his time. "His creed," says a recent panegrist, "is a large one,—that of development and liberty; it includes encouragement to competition, and the just reward of the labourer." Surely a well-sounding and convenient creed! It allowed M. F. de Lesseps to smile at the sufferings of the wretched Fellaheen dying under the lash! How many thousands perished miserably to enrich one man! The guilt of this, and the shame of it, M. de Lesseps, beyond doubt, must bear. Too much liberty here, it seems. Why, when Ismail broke his "contract," or rather the "contract," made by Said, to supply forced labour, did not M. de Lesseps exact an indemnification? This is the man who now stands upon his rights, and demands justice; it were a pity not to satisfy his demand to the very uttermost. Yet in all this, we recognise a feature of the age, an age in which Factory and Land Acts were required for the protection of the helpless, even in Christian England! The biography of M. F. de Lesseps, if well written, would be an almost perfect expression of the time. Almost perfect, we say, for our age has not only produced such captains of industry as is Ferdinand de Lesseps, but also many high-priests of science, many truth-lovers in literature, many devotees of faith; and one of these idealists would have to be portrayed as a set-off to this realist. The age is impatient of such an artistic necessity; it prefers Sancho Panza to Don Quixote, yet, already the knights are scarce enough, and the squires numerous beyond counting.

THE FUTURE LIFE.

A REMARK contained in the interesting letter written by the author of "Natural Religion," and communicated to these columns by his permission, to the effect that we ought to believe in the future life, but to think of it as little as possible, must have roused much speculation in many minds as to the widely differing mental attitude possible towards a matter of absolutely common interest. If the future life concerns one of us, it concerns all; one person cannot be more or less interested than another in what, if it have any meaning, is simply the larger part of the existence of every one. And yet a thinker who has much influence on his generation, in speaking of it as something that we are tempted to think of too much, reverses the ordinary view not only of those who believe in it (as we understand him to do), but even of those who are not inclined towards any spiritual belief. At least, the letter recalled to the mind of one of its readers a remark of Hume's on the strangeness of the fact that, believing in a future life, men think of it so little. It is not, he says, that men take no interest in what is to happen after their own death; the arrangements which are only then to come into effect occupy much of their attention. What is strange is that that part of the future which concerns themselves is the part which fails to engage their thoughts. The passage does not strike us as a mere sarcastic way of saying that the belief in a future life is unreal. Eighteenth-century unbelief was a very different thing from that of our own day (we speak of English thought), as eighteenth-century belief was also. There was a great deal more violent language used against unbelievers than there is now, but there was not the same profound cleft between the two parties. It is difficult to realise the great difference that there is in the very same statement, according as it has a different background. "Christianity is a mere superstition," meant to the men of that day,—Christianity is an invention of priests, a fruit of the cunningly-devised alliance between the Church and the Throne, one of a set of beliefs (in the memorable language of Gibbon) "to the multitude equally true, to the philosopher equally false, to the legislator equally useful." In our own day, the same words mean simply that Christianity is a belief opposed to the conclusions arrived at by the student of the material universe. It is as an opponent, not of democratic sentiment, but of the system of reasoned belief concerning all that we can see, and hear, and touch, that Christianity is attacked by its present enemies. We are, of course, not conceding that Christianity is an opponent of either of these things, but merely observing on the contrasted aspects it has taken in the past, and does take in the present, towards those who regard it as false, especially with regard to its doctrine of immortality. The disbelief that takes its rise in any theories whatever concerning the human world is not necessarily opposed to the belief in a spiritual world, as is the disbelief that arises from speculations into the world of things. It is not any difficulty in the evidences for the resurrection of Christ, it is the effort needed for believing that what we love survives, when what we have embraced is hidden away beneath the turf, that makes it hard, in our time, to believe in a Future Life.

And then, too, there is another aspect of the same change which is worth remembering, and which must have been recalled to every reader by the letter which forms our text. The writer spoke, with a frankness which we greatly admire, of the fashionable opinion of the day, meaning opinion hostile to Christianity. It would not have been natural to speak thus of any form of unbelief before our own time, in our own country. The change is more important than it seems with regard to the nature of unbelief. In the eighteenth century orthodoxy was a characteristic of certain views about the spiritual universe, and now it is the characteristic of certain views about the material universe. "Right opinion," the opinion, that is, of people who have the ear of the public, is to be sought for among men of science, not among divines. Health has taken the place of "salvation;" the doctor has supplanted the priest. Of course this is another way of saying that the future life has ceased to be an object of general contemplation. Any reference to it now has a distinctly religious character, whereas, in former days, it used to be a part of the ordinary dialect of secular mankind about accepted fact, and to find its place in conventional statements which merely undertook to echo the assumptions of ordinary people. Hence has arisen a different feeling about immortality, in those who do not deny it. Whatever makes most people think the future life a delusion will make some people, not agreeing with them, still consider it an undesirable subject of contemplation. The mere desire to be in sympathy with the general current of cultivated feeling settles to some extent even what people will believe, and what they will think about is settled by it, of course, to a much greater extent. We are not inquiring whether it is right or wrong that this should be so; the fact, at least, is unquestionable.

But there must surely be more than this to say for a precept that is given us by such a thinker as the writer of the letter which has occasioned these remarks. In a certain sense, we might even extend the scope of his advice. To occupy the mind with what is future, in the sense that it is not yet present with us in any form—for a schoolboy, for instance, to think what he will say when he gets into Parliament, or for a school-girl to mix anticipations of her future household with her study of the French verbs—is nothing but a waste of time. Children like playing at being grown up, and as long as it is only play, there is no harm in it; but a wise parent would discourage any form of such play that seemed transforming itself into a series of dreams, bringing in impatience of the restrictions of the nursery and the schoolroom; it is, in fact, only a play for children, and ceases to be healthful when it becomes a dream for youth. And if anything like this be a temptation with regard to the childhood of our race, we should fully agree that here, too, the mistake would be equally great. But is it? Does any one occupy himself or herself with thoughts of some experience that is to begin when this school-time of our life is left behind? We have never met with such a man or woman. Unquestionably there are many to whom the question,—Is this life the school-time of our race? is the most interesting question in the world. But it is wrong to call this a speculation concerning a future life. It is an inquiry concerning the nature of this life that now is. The difference between those who believe in immortality and those who deny it is not a difference as to something that is to begin by-and-by, and leave the present common ground. It is a question of the same kind as that between two people who should assert, the one that a statue was made of snow, and the other that it was made of marble. Something that happens by-and-by will decide which of the two is right, but their difference concerns that which exists at the moment.

But we may say, in a more special sense than this, that the question of Immortality concerns not the future, but the present. It is only by a great concession to the egotism of human nature that the life of the immensely larger number of men and women that have ever lived is spoken of as the future life, just because it is not the life of those who speak and hear. In the deepest sense, it is not a future life to any one. But in no sense is it a future life to most people. The greater number of men and women know by experience what that life is which lies beyond what we call death. A small minority—and a continually decreasing minority—of the great names that stir the world's sympathies, point out those who are still visible among men. The voice of fame is mainly concerned with those who inhabit the invisible world, which, though we call it future, has its long past, just as the present has. And as we advance in life, the voice of affection is so likewise. The structure of human relation which we are building up with every hour of life's best activities here belongs, as life draws near its evening, more and more to the unseen world. One whole domain of affection has no longer any exercise. The sheltering love which greeted us on our arrival here has long since taken flight, and the part of our nature which found its exercise in response has none now within the limits of what is visible and audible. But, indeed, when we come into sight of our goal, this may be said of a large part of the whole exercise of the affections, nay, of feelings wider than what we commonly understand by the affections. Every variety of feeling that can bind one human being to another finds its object in that hidden world. There is the companionship that has attracted us like warmth or light; there, too, that which we should have avoided, but for some feeling of gratitude or duty, the love which was all enjoyment revives as the eye turns backward; and so does the love that was chiefly pain. There are beings whom we have wronged, and whose forgiveness we long to implore; there, too, are those who have wronged us, and whose memory still brings with it the sense of injury, however dimmed and softened. There is the pleasant comrade of an idle hour, moving in us a sense of unnaturalness in thinking of intercourse with him apart from the incidents of social intercourse on earth; and there is the companion of our most earnest aspirations, with whom intercourse was too precious to be spent on anything but the deepest and most permanent of our desires and our speculations. There some worthy bore, whose image seems to bring back a half-humorous blending of affection and tedium, keeps company with the most intolerant of his antagonists; the images of those to whom we could give nothing better than mild endurance blend with others which make us speculate on the one-sidedness of attraction from its negative pole. There is no feeling that does not revive as we remember the dead, except those frivolous impulses of distaste or attraction which the mere lapse of time would have rendered it equally impossible to revive, or almost remember, and which are more rapidly, but not more certainly, extinguished by death. Perhaps we hide from ourselves this immense variety of feeling by a certain conventional dialect about those who are gone.

"Why do we never name them, or but in voices low,

asks a writer whose verse expresses the various shades of social relation with peculiar happiness; and whatever the cause of this conventional silence, its result is obvious. The monotony of dialect conceals from us the variety of feeling. We are supposed, for instance, to feel only self-reproach when we remember a quarrel with a person who is dead, though every one who is honest with himself knows that it may be just as difficult to forgive the dead as the living; and that even when we are conscious of wrong towards those who are gone, we are conscious, too, of all that made the right course difficult, and, as it seemed at times, almost impossible. We are not urging that this reticence is a bad thing; we are merely pointing out that the habit of speaking in one tone of the dead, and in many of the living, tends to conceal from us that the world of human relation is just as large, whether its hemisphere is dipped in day or night.

Now, what we mean, when we ask if there is a Future Life—or at least a part of what we mean—is the question whether this whole world of human relation, and by far the most distinct phase of human relation, is or is not a reality. As an old man turns backward to some loved playmate, snatched away in infancy, whose very existence is unknown now to any one living but himself, does he turn towards some real inhabitant of the world of human affection, or to a mere image, void of all reality except that which he bestows upon it in the act of recollection? As some widow turns for awhile from the society of her children that she may revive the fading image of one towards whom her heart still goes out with a sense of unchanging need, is she turning from actual claimants on her affection to a mere phantom? It is unreasonable that such a question should be thought merely speculative. It is impractical, if all that we do is done by our hands. But to assert this is to decide the question. If the unseen world be real, we are never more active than when we turn in thought to the mingled memory and anticipation that centres in some tomb that hides all that is earthly of the one we loved best. If, indeed, nothing exists but what we can see, or touch, or hear, then nothing is done but what can be represented to the eye or ear, or weighed in the balance. But why deny the first belief, and accept the second? Why break up a consistent scheme of negation into halves, according as it deals with the intellect or the will, and make room for the influence of a denial which you have rejected? The compromise leaves the mind in a condition of unstable equilibrium; every touch of suggestion must cause one who is trying to retain it to believe less, or feel more.

It may sound strange to call this compromise an influence of the new orthodoxy, but we believe it to be true. When orthodoxy was spiritual, the terror of an endless Hell was sometimes brought forward as a reason for acting as if one believed in it, whether one did or not. Supposing we are mistaken in our belief, it was argued on the part of the orthodox, how shall we be the worse in the future? Supposing you are mistaken in your unbelief, how terribly you will be the worse! Had you not better live as if our opinion were true? As this argument was summed up in the pages of the Gentleman's Magazine,—

“With all your deep learning, pray who is most wise,
We who follow Christ's doctrine, or you who despise?
Since this, Sir, as fact, is allowed by your crew,
We are safe, though it's false; you are damned, if it's true!”

Unbelievers were urged to act and speak with Christians, if they could not believe with them, and no doubt they very often did so, as far as the writer of this scrap of doggerel was a specimen of Christianity. Now, the argument is precisely reversed. This world, it is urged, may be all; you cannot be sure that your faith is not a delusion. Which is the wiser, in any case, he who spends his energies on the world we are sure of, or he who occupies himself with what may never come, and what, if it does come, you now fully admit will be best met by those who have made the best of its preliminary? Why give any thought to what is, after all, as things are now, a mere opinion? Such an argument has, it cannot be denied, a great power. It had great power in the past, when the terror of an endless Hell, if it could never have been with the majority of human beings anything but an uneasy doubt, fortified, however, by a good deal that went on under their own eyes, still remained an assumption practically accepted, not only by the religious world (indeed, it was only in the religious world here and there that a doubt was whispered), but also by the whole secular dialect of reference and suggestion,—an assumption bearing down all protest with the weight of a general consent to take it for granted which it required enormous courage and strength to deny. And now all this weight of assumption—a far mightier agent for producing belief than any amount of argument—is gone over to a view which, though we speak of it as the opposite, has many of the same results. On both views this world remains our only chance throughout eternity, on both views it might be urged with equal plausibleness that it is best to act on the hypothesis in which error would practically be most disastrous. And though we, who believe in immortality, consider that those will do the best for this life who treat it as part of something larger than itself, who are encouraged in all failure by the thought of an infinite future in which no effort is wasted, and can set to work for their kind at any hour in their day with the sense of beginning something that death will not interrupt, still, we must remember that practically it is almost the same thing to believe this life to be part of a larger whole, and to think that we shall do its special work best on that hypothesis. An opposite belief, we see, leads people to find a “moral tonic” in a dogma which would seem more productive of the indolence of despair. And just as in former days there was a temptation to speak and even to feel with the majority, apart from all real conviction, so there is now. There may be a future in which the whole of our being shall find its scope; but suppose there is none, we shall have wasted our time in thinking of it, and in the meantime we had better live as if this life, of which we are certain, were the only life. To reason thus is natural, from many points of view most reasonable, certainly very easy, under the circumstances of the day. But it is natural only because we are all tempted to doubt what others disbelieve, and it is a mistake to regard this argument as anything but an expression of that doubt. Belief is the mental act by which we determine to deal with certain objects of thought as realities, and to live as if life on this earth were the whole of life is simply to begin to believe that it is the whole. Those who differ in this belief gain nothing by a common consent that to make the best of this life is the best preparation for whatever is to follow it, for they mean different things by the same words. They will no more agree upon what the best of life is than they will on its duration; their view of its highest aim will vary with their belief as to its permanence. Doubtless, they will have most aims in common—all human beings have that—but the key-note of character is given by the aim that is preferred, and a wide common ground will disappear, if the dominant aim be different on the two sides. And this will in many cases be not only different, but contrary. Those dim stirrings of a larger life that are music to one who finds in them a promise, disturb him who feels them illusory as mere jarring vibration; the desire of the one must always be to approach their source,—of the other, to recede from it. A sense of participation in things Eternal will always be a dividing, where it is not a uniting influence; and its influence pervades the whole of our being, appearing to those who reject it as that want of symmetry necessarily characteristic of a fragment that is judged as a whole, and causing those who accept it to recoil, in many unexpected directions, from that narrowness which all must find in a supposed whole which they regard as a fragment. For that “correlation of growth” so mysteriously discernible in the visible world is but a faint shadow of the law by which our whole spiritual being is moulded in harmony with our convictions. Our spirit is more a unity than even our bodily organism, and that which affects its deepest part, affects the whole.

HOLIDAY WORK.

PROBABLY one reason why the holiday-taking Classes so often do not enjoy their holidays as much as they expected, is that they take with them no genuine holiday work, into which they can throw themselves with something of the mixed feeling of their working-days and their holidays. Of course, we do not mean that they should take with them the arrears of professional work,—a sure plan for spoiling the holiday, though now and then a man may be unfortunate enough to be compelled so to spoil it. What we mean is that a holiday is often less enjoyed and less enjoyable for the want of the refreshment of enjoyable work, and that every man should have, if he can, work which it is a positive pleasure for him to set about, as well as work which he does mainly because it is the regular duty of his life to do it, and to do it well. If we were asked to give specimens of what we mean by holiday work, we should instance, for example, Lewis Carroll's “Alice in Wonderland,” Mr. Kingsley's “Water-babies,” Matthew Arnold's “Friendship's Garland,” Mr. Kinglake's “Eothen,” Mr. Frederick Pollock's “Leading Cases in Verse,” and Mr.

Courthope's "Paradise of Birds." Of course, we do not mean to assert that any or all of these books were actually written during a holiday. The notes for "Eothen" certainly must have been, but very likely not the book itself. Nevertheless, these are all books of which we should certainly say, Here the writer was writing out of the overflow of his spirits, and not out of the sustained sense of professional purpose, just as Cowper was when he wrote "John Gilpin," and Canning when he wrote "The Needy Knife-grinder" and "The University of Göttingen." We believe that almost all men have their appropriate holiday work, though with some it takes the form of amateur work to which they do not usually devote themselves, like art or science for the man of business; while with some it takes the form of a literary task more or less distinct from that to which they ordinarily devote themselves, and better marked by the exuberance of a mind at ease and leisure. And the distinctive mark of this holiday work is a certain freshness in the conception of it, a certain evidence of buoyancy and enjoyment which you do not see in the ordinary undertakings of the same person, though these ordinary undertakings may of course be ten times as important and valuable. But whatever the work be, this is certain,—that if there be anything whatever of genuine labour to which a man turns with a sense of relief and release from his ordinary occupation, he will enhance the pleasure of holiday-making twofold by dispatching a fair portion of it during his formal holidays.

It is quite a mistake to suppose that nothing of the nature of work should be allowed to haunt the mind on a holiday. The only result of that is that holiday-making itself is very apt to become a laborious piece of pleasure-seeking. It is quite true, of course, that you should not, if you can help it, take task-work on a holiday. But it is quite as true that if there is anything requiring some effort and method and care, in which, nevertheless, the mind finds a fresh spring of buoyancy,—such as many men, for instance, who are not musicians by profession, find in music, and many more find in art,—the holiday will be twice as enjoyable if some distinct and recognisable progress can be made in that province. It is not pains, effort, and care which fatigue the mind, but pains, effort, and care expended on the same class of subjects on which they are day by day regularly expended. Devote a moderate portion of pains, effort, and care to other than the regular subjects,—to subjects with which no sense of worry, routine, and fag is associated,—and you will find that the pains, effort, and care so directed increase the sense of elasticity and buoyancy in your holiday, instead of diminishing it. Pleasure-seeking unadulterated is, after all, a very wearisome occupation. As Sir Cornwall Lewis once said, "Life would be very tolerable, but for its amusements," and certainly many of the classes who give most time to amusements also find them turn to dust and ashes in experience, chiefly because they do not take care to diversify them with methodical efforts directed to some object which inspires keen interest, though interest of that kind which relaxes the dominant strain of daily life. The man of business who has a turn for literature or art should be a literary man or an artist in his holiday; while the literary man or artist should turn his attention to natural science or antiquarian research, or at least to some outlying province of his own pursuit, the prosecution of which may be compatible with the ardour of a generally repressed and restrained interest. No doubt, such a course would involve some change of plan in relation to holidays, some considerable breaks in the constant rush of travel, some contrivance for interleaving at least frequent mornings of quiet with the whirl of exhausting excitements. But that is precisely what gives a keener flavour to the air of change itself; for otherwise, even the change becomes wearisome and monotonous, and loses all the air of vividness and sharp distinction. Travel continued and prolonged, without intervals of close attention concentrated on coherent subjects, becomes a mere moving kaleidoscope of scenes, in which, though the variation of order is infinite, the elements seem too much the same to command your interest. But when travel is diversified by some steady pursuit in which you exert your trained powers, though with a sense of freedom and enjoyment belonging to a new line of direction, you renew enough of the tension of purpose belonging to daily life to renovate constantly the delight in leisure, without renewing any of the anxiety and responsibility of professional undertakings. There is, we are sure, more real waste of life in holiday-making than in almost any other pursuit of equal duration; and this not in the least because holiday-making is overdone, but because it is ill-done. The general idea is that a hardworked man cannot make the change from his ordinary life too complete; nor can he, if the change is really felt and stimulating to the last. But the defect of ordinary holiday-making is that the change soon palls, because the constancy of change is itself monotonous and exhausting, and instead of feeding the exhausted stores of energy, becomes a toil and an oppression of a new kind. The true change is the change which keeps the sense of change ever fresh,—which gives you some gauge of the magnitude of the renovation, instead of substituting for work a friction more wasting than professional anxiety itself. The only way to achieve this is to discover an exercise for those faculties of the mind ordinarily employed, which shall combine exercise with recreation; just as it is refreshing for the bicyclist to ride on horseback, and for the pedestrian to row, and for the vocalist to play. Such varieties of work recruit the springs of pleasure, and give a crispness to mere holiday-making, which it soon loses if it runs on for weeks as holiday-making, and nothing else.

Mr. Browning tells us that the greatest artists have always sought to express their most special and intense passion in some peculiar manner not in the ordinary sense characteristic of their genius,—that Rafael made for her he loved a century of sonnets, with the silver-pointed pencil with which he was otherwise wont to draw Madonnas; that Dante, for the sake of Beatrice, exchanged his pen for the painter's pencil, and strove to paint an angel; and that he himself, who usually blows through bronze, might for once, in writing to her whom he loved best, be allowed to breathe through silver, just to distinguish, as it were, the special holiday which he thus gave his heart. Something of the same kind may be said of the holidays of the brain. There is work for the brain which, instead of being exhausting work, is renovating work,—and not only renovating work, but work that renovates the spirit of enjoyment. It is not, of course, always in frolic even of the intellect, that men find most rest and most power to renew the fountains of pleasure. Most men have a hobby of some sort, for which they can find scant time in ordinary professional duty, and to which they may well devote a substantial part of their leisure, with the certainty of enjoying twice as much the remainder of that leisure. That is their true holiday work, and if they can but make time for that, while they are doing what is too often falsely called enjoying themselves, they will certainly relish their enjoyment as they never relished it while they banished every notion except that of mere enjoyment from their intervals of rest. A trained mind cannot obtain real rest, except with some steady exercise of its trained powers; and if this were but understood, we should have not only a great many more enjoyable holidays, but at least a few more masterpieces of a frolic kind, like the mathematician's "Alice in Wonderland," and the poet's satirical "Friendship's Garland."

* * * ERRATUM.—In the article on "The Set-offs against Modern Science," last week, we wrote, by a slip of the pen, "Mr. Douglas Galton," in place of "Mr. Francis Galton," who is the author of the book on Inquiries into Human Faculty, reviewed by Mr. Grant Allen, to which reference was made.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE CONDITION OF EGYPT.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—To those of us in Egypt who have the interests of the country at heart, it was a pleasure to read your excellent article of June 16th on the execution of Suleiman Sami. We feel grateful to you for your severe rebuke to Lord Randolph Churchill. His reckless, flippant impertinence, in accusing the Khedive of grave crimes for which there is not the faintest proof, is exasperating in the extreme. The Tory party pride themselves on their foreign policy. I trust we are not to take this as a specimen of it. But your article contained more than this. You insist on our responsibility for righteous government in Egypt, and it is on this point I now take the liberty of addressing you.

Lord Dufferin's famous despatch contained little of practical value, to those who knew not how to read between the lines. It sketched out a fair path of progress and justice to Egypt. It left unsaid, but yet implied, the motive-power that was to keep the machine moving. Now, somehow, we all feel here that since Lord Dufferin left us, the electric current has become perceptibly fainter. None of us doubt that so loyal a gentleman as Sir E. Malet is carrying out the instructions he receives from home, and the events of last year prove his capacity; but yet something is wanting, and unless Major Baring comes out prepared to supply that something, things will be little better in Egypt than they were two years ago; and English gentlemen will find the service of Egypt not one in which they can continue with self-respect. English police officers are already beginning to resign, and to complain that as long as they are under the orders of Egyptian prefects, they can do no good here. An accomplished English jurist has been for months in Cairo, doing nothing. Sent out to frame a code of Criminal Procedure, he found one already framed on the French model, of which he disapproved. Asked to become Procureur-Général, he awaits the formation of the Courts over which he is to watch. The sites of these Courts have been determined. The Belgian Judges, some eight or nine in number, who are to preside over some of them have been in Cairo for a month. But the Courts are unbuilt and undesigned, and Sir Benson Maxwell and the Belgian gentlemen might just as well be in their native lands.

For the improvement of the Soudan, Lord Dufferin strongly urged the construction of a railway from Berber, on the Nile, to Souakim, on the Red Sea. The scheme is cut and dry. Mr. Lee Smith, an engineer well known and respected here, as in India, has laid his plan before the Government. A Commission has approved of it. There is no difficulty about money. But Cherif Pasha, with the deliberate insouciance of a Turkish gentleman (and he is a gentleman), refuses to take action, and Mr. Lee Smith has gone home disgusted. And even now before our eyes things are happening which we are not used to approve of in England. Last January, Sir E. Malet assured Lord Granville "that the religious liberties of the Egyptian people are secure under the present Khedive." Last month, an intelligent young Mahomedan in Cairo embraced Christianity, a convert of the American Missionaries. He was promptly taken before the native judge, and on his refusal to retract, his wife was divorced from him, and he was thrown into prison. On Sir E. Malet interfering, he was told it was all for the man's own good, that his life would not be safe in Cairo,—in Cairo, garrisoned by British soldiers, patrolled by the new police, commanded by British officers! The unhappy convert has been sent out of the country, to Cyprus. Is this religious liberty? For a Mussulman to desert his faith is, I am told, a capital crime. It may have been once so, in Delhi. It is not now, and why should it be, while our troops remain, in Cairo? A small war is going on, as you are aware, in the Soudan. I am not going to question its being the righteous suppression of a rebellion. But it is not a pleasant sight to see droves of hundreds of men, many of them old and grey, swept in from the villages in chains, accompanied by wailing women,—conscripts being sent to the dreaded Soudan.

People at home ask, "Are the English popular in Egypt?" I cannot say I witness any signs of unpopularity, and a very small act of civility will call forth a kindly smile from the Egyptian Fellah, as from the Hindu ryot. But why should we be popular? We shot them down in battle last year. What have we given them in return now? Arabi promised to exterminate their Greek money-lenders, vampires that flourish in every village. We protect them with our police. And should they transgress the law, the Fellah knows he cannot sue them in the native Courts where they sue him, and that he has little redress to expect from their Consul. The Crédit Foncier, which was to help the fellah out of the clutches of these money-lenders, seems in no hurry to begin action. The new Courts, as I have said, are in no hurry to open. The Egyptian sees the corvée going on as of yore, the conscription going on as of yore. When he is burdened with taxation, he sees the only man untaxed is the European who has come to suck his life-blood. Why should he like the English? Perhaps we shall never be popular here. A clever Frenchman said of us in India, "Les Anglais sont justes, mais pas bons." I hope in Egypt he could say even so much in our favour. But is it just to make this poverty-stricken land pay £1 per week for every English soldier serving in it, besides heavy bills for transport, for barrack repairs, for ordnance stores, &c.? Have we added to the strength of our Army elsewhere an officer and a soldier, for every one detached to serve here? If not, are we not reducing our Army Estimates at the cost of Egypt? She may well sue in forma pauperis. For pity's sake, is this righteous, not to say generous? The Germans laugh at our long list of Generals. Do we require five for our little force here?

Sir E. Malet has found a residence in Cairo quite befitting Her Majesty's Agent, for which he pays, I believe, £300 a year. Is it fair to make Egypt pay £1,000 a year for a house taken up for the English Commander of the Army?—a little matter, but it does not look well. We complain of the foreign jealousies that have required a dual control in all departments here, but are we quite free from it ourselves? The English Commissioner of the Daira Sanieh retired lately. Could we not have trusted its administration to the French or Egyptian Commissioners? Or, if it was necessary to burden the revenues with another highly-paid official, have we done our best for Egypt in choosing him from among our Italian Consuls? Would it not have been better to have gone to the Indian Civil Service, where scores of good men are to be found, trained all their days to this very work?

The Commissioners of the Daira and State Domains have certainly large interests to look after. Besides these, there are four gentlemen in Cairo in charge of the Public Debt Office,—an Englishman, a Frenchman, an Austrian, and an Italian. I would appeal to them, if one good Treasury clerk would not do all their work as well as they can? Surely enough, and more than enough, has been done for the European Bondholder? I plead in the interests of Egypt and the Egyptian. And their interests, I assert, will best be furthered by a strong English protection,—if you like, control. But if we undertake such a control, with the eyes of all Europe upon us, we must, first of all, be above suspicion ourselves. We must be both just and good. Is this too much to expect from England?—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE SUEZ CANAL.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—As the action of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce has been specially commented on by you, it may be of interest to state that the minority who voted against the "very mild resolution" included more shipowners, representing a much larger amount of steam tonnage, than the majority, composed of general traders, by whom it was passed. Not that any reasoning shipowner fails to recognise that the question of rates concerns the producer and consumer of goods passing through the Canal, even more than it does the carrier.

I merely wish to remove any impression that the shipowners of Liverpool are, as a body, hostile to the arrangement which was proposed to have been made by the Government, or share in the general outcry—put down to the shipowners throughout the country—in consequence of which the arrangement has unfortunately been abandoned.

No shipowner objects to local or port charges, where all alike have to bear the same, in proportion to the tonnage of the vessels. What he particularly desires is the better management and control of the Canal, and he was unable to see that this matter had been sufficiently considered, and would be put on a satisfactory footing, by the Government proposals.—I am, Sir, &c.,

A SHIPOWNER.

THE DEFEATED ENNERDALE RAILWAY BILL.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The defeat of the Ennerdale Railway Bill, to which your article alluded last week, has caused no small amount of vexation at the event to the friends of its promoters in the coal and iron district of the Cumberland seaboard. That disappointment finds expression in the local Press. This is as natural as it is complimentary to those who are unremitting in their efforts to defend the valleys of Lakeland from the hands of the speculative few, for the good of the nation's many hand-and-brain-workers, who need these valleys unexploited; or, again, to those who are determined to see that Parliament shall not give powers to promoters of railway companies, to cut up their very limited area of natural beauty, without having full information of the actual state of the case, or the actual needs of the neighbourhood.

My object in writing to you is to show, by a quotation from a leader in one of the Whitehaven papers of last Saturday, what educated Whitehaven feeling is, and to urge upon all friends of an English Lakeland unexploited to rally round the Permanent Lake District Defence Society, which already counts among its members names of national weight and power in every department of English public life, and can fairly be called a "National Society for the Defence of the English Lakes and Vales." "Parliament," says the inspired Cumberland Times, "is at present on the side of the dilettante and the sentimentalists, who affect to see deformity in the noblest of all human handiwork; but the time is coming, nevertheless, when railways will penetrate the inner beauties of the Lake District, into more secluded nooks than Ennerdale, and will be regarded by the toiling millions as an inestimable boon!"

Is it the railway along Ennerdale Water, or the shaft and pumping gear up Deep Ghyll, or the girder bridge that was to span the River Liza, or the vast débris-heaps proposed between High and Low Beck, that is "the noblest of all human handiwork"? Whatever it be, till men have learned, as your article puts it, that England's truest wealth does not consist in the amount of coal and iron she can drag to bank, we may look out for little rest from the active enterprise of the mining engineers, who have marked "the inner beauties of the Lake District" for their own; and we must close our ranks, and call for recruits to help us, in time of attack, to keep the Dales as God gave them,—for England's rest and refreshment, and the rearing of a noble peasantry.—I am, Sir, &c., H. D. RAWNSLEY, Hon. Sec. to the Permanent Lake District Defence Society.

THE LIBERAL DAILY PRESS.

SIR,—Referring to your very just reflections on the extraordinary line taken by the Daily News relative to the Suez-Canal question, allow me to give an instance or two of the oscillation of opinion indicated in the two leading articles of that paper on Saturday, July 14th, and Monday, July 16th. On Saturday, the leader remarked thus,—“M. de Lesseps could scarcely make his second Canal without British money,” &c. Again,—“He cannot make it at all, without English co-operation.” Again,—“There is no reason, as it seems to us, in spite of Mr. Childers's ingenious answer to the deputation from the Chambers of Commerce, why the agreement should not be reconsidered, nor why M. de Lesseps himself should not consent to terms which will be regarded as fair by the country which finds the money for the extension, and gives nearly all the trade which renders the undertaking profitable. He cannot do without England, and England has no desire to do without him.” Sunday brought other reflections, and the leader of Monday, generally moderated in tone, states:—“It is by no means certain that M. de Lesseps would have difficulty in obtaining the loan necessary for the construction of a second canal independently of England. Even France itself, now that its feeling is aroused on the matter, might contribute the whole of it.”

Constant readers of the Daily News are by no means unaccustomed to these sudden alternations of policy shown by its leaders. On the Irish question, similar perturbations have been exhibited. On the Egyptian policy, our accommodating journal quickly passed from the attitude of Sir Wilfrid Lawson to that of cordial support of the war. It would be a mistake to view this affection very gravely, or to imagine that anything more than the surface of the opinion of the country is touched, even by the Daily News. It has happened, on one or two important occasions, to have followed the strong current of national feeling, and to have echoed that sentiment with no very marked ability. The sources of those movements lay far beyond the influence of the Daily News, and would have done their work, whatever its attitude might have been. The obligation of the Liberal Party to the Daily News is by no means great; the indebtedness of the Daily News to Liberal opinion is inestimable. Surely it is not too much for earnest Liberals to expect that if they cannot find, in the only leading Liberal newspaper of the city, undeviating loyalty to the Government, it at least should present the grounds of its difference with some signs of consistency and force.

The constituencies have of late shown the vigour and the intelligence of their patriotism by requiring their representatives in Parliament to do justice to their convictions by supporting the Ministry at critical divisions. To exercise healthy influence of that kind, and to be contented with a journalism that claims absolute licence of support or hostility in the day of battle, is not the wisest policy. To have to read the articles of the Standard to find a fair discussion of the procedure of the Administration is rather humiliating to a party abounding with journalistic talent and political sagacity. Is it not time this question received the earnest attention of men of light and leading in the party?—I am, &c.,

“PEREANT QUI ANTE NOS.”

SIR,—In justice to a much-despised class, whose only consolations are their integrity and their banker's balance (I mean the fictionists), will you give me audience for a word or two, rising out of your article on the claims of Science? She has it all her own way certainly, just now; and her admirers daily chorus that the humanities are played out. The stout old Times, in its recurring fits of gloom, tells us ever and again that there are no novelists, no painters, no dramatists, and no orators left in England; only men of science and Times reporters. One well-informed man ("scholar" used to sound so much rounder) proves perhaps in the Nineteenth Century, himself elsewhere unheard of, that novel-writing is a lost art. Another, allowed to speculate between the yellow covers of the Cornhill upon the ultimate destiny of his little person, and believing himself an author in consequence, states (absolutely), "That no man who has written an acted play of late years would probably call himself a literary man." When I read this article, now a few years since, I thought of Lytton, Jerrold, Knowles, Shirley Brooks (to speak only of men gone), and wondered, not what they were, but what they would have called themselves,—metaphysicians, may be. And in the last number of the Fortnightly Review, Mr. W. L. Courtney, by profession, a distinguished Oxford examiner, and therefore to be listened to, asserts as broadly, à propos of nothing in particular, that the professed English playwrights "borrow their literary matter without acknowledgment." This is a sufficiently sweeping charge against a body of English gentlemen, and I am not aware myself of a single dramatist of any position or repute to whom it applies at all. But Mr. Courtney writes for the Fortnightly, and knows all about it by the modern instinct.

So fast is science disposing of the humanities, that they can only hope that, like the violets, they may have their turn again when the weather changes. Meantime, thanks to the material consolation to which I ventured to allude at starting, they may reflect with some inward amusement that the big world is, perhaps, not so entirely occupied in this long and much-advertised run of Much Ado About Nothing (not of the Lyceum) as the performers and their friends would have it. At all events, give us of our own:—

"In this mighty, wise, utilitarian age,
Oh, leave to Fancy still her little, tiny stage!"

Science has robbed us of all except our frivolity, and does she want that, too? Surely she, at all events, should be above "borrowing her literary matter without acknowledgment." Yet, from your article of which I spoke, I learn that in his new book Mr. Galton "notes the absence of any marked answer to the daily prayer that the nobility may 'be endued with grace, wisdom, and understanding.'" Before Science finally adopts this as an argument against revealed religion, will you allow me to call the attention of your readers to a passage from my novel, "Faucit of Balliol"?—

"I don't know what I should do without religion, and without the comfort of dear Mr. Birmingham Pope's prayers. He always dresses so beautifully, that I'm sure they are always answered."—"Always?" said Lestrangle. "Surely he prays every day, and as fervently as for everything else, that all the nobility may be endued with grace, wisdom, and understanding. That prayer has not been answered yet,—at least, to the full extent," he added, glancing at Pentonville."

This is but a humble jest. But in this instance, fiction claims the priority from Science.—I am, Sir, &c.,

WALT WHITMAN'S PROSE WORKS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—As your review of Walt Whitman's "Specimen Days and Collect" in last Saturday's issue may lead some to suppose that there are two editions of this work, we think it right to state that there is but one British edition which is published by us, and for which Messrs. Trübner and Co. are one of our London agents. We may add that this edition, besides being the only one, is also published with the sanction and under the revision of the author.—We are, Sir, &c.,

RONSARD AND TENNYSON.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—If a very curious parallel in one of Ronsard's poems, to part of the song in Mr. Tennyson's "The Miller's Daughter" has not been noticed before, I think you may consider it worth while to print the lines. In this case, it is fortunately impossible to consider the English counterpart a plagiarism.

I quote from the edition of Ronsard printed at Lyons, by Thomas Soubron, in 1592, Vol. II, p. 292 (Ode xxvi. of the Fourth Book of the "Odes") :—

"Je voudrais estre le riban
Qui serre ta belle poitrine :
Je voudrais estre le carquan
Qui orne ta gorge yuoirine.
Je voudrais estre tout autour
Le coral qui tes léures touche,
Afin de baiser nuict et iour
Tes belles léures et ta bouche."

A MISTAKEN ASCRIPTION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your issue for June 23rd, p. 809, you fall into the natural error of supposing the late William Lloyd Garrison to have been the author of the sonnet "with which he concluded his memorable manifesto in the first number of the Liberator,"—"Oppression! I have seen thee face to face," &c. Not a few of his readers shared this error at the time, although the sonnet was printed with quotation marks. The editor took the first opportunity to disclaim the authorship imputed to him, in favour of Thomas Pringle, the Scottish poet, who was, I believe, one of the founders of Blackwood, and Secretary of the London Society for the Abolition of Slavery throughout the British Dominions.

It is true, my father had written sonnets, witness two, "The Guiltless Prisoner" and "Freedom of the Mind," composed the year before (1830), while he was confined in Baltimore jail, for "libelling" a townsman engaged in the domestic slave-trade. And in 1843 his published verse was sufficiently voluminous to warrant a little collection, "Sonnets and Other Poems, by William Lloyd Garrison" (Boston).—I am, Sir, &c.,

DR. MAUDSLEY ON BODY AND WILL.*

DR. MAUDSLEY'S book is certainly not one of which an intelligent critic of any school would say, as he anticipates in a somewhat contemptuous preface, that it is "a weak intrusion into the high domains of high mental philosophy." There is nothing weak about it, though there is plenty of narrowness, and also of that apparent satisfaction in repeating over and over again the very same one-sided statement of facts of which he accuses,—no doubt more or less justly,—his chief opponents. We cordially agree with Dr. Maudsley that it is "not enough to think and talk about abstract minds and their qualities, when you have to do with concrete minds, that must be observed, studied, and managed." But it is precisely of his deficient appreciation of the facts as we know them,—and as we know them not on what he calls "the barren heights of speculation," but in "the places in which men live and move and have their being," that we complain in the treatise before us.

Dr. Maudsley begins almost at once by over-painting and, indeed, wholly travestying the view of those with whom the battle has really to be fought. It is certainly not to be fought with believers in "freedom as absolute and perfect in man," or with believers in a human will that is "itself an inexhaustible source of self-procreating energy" (page 7), still less with those who contend that freedom, even where freedom exists, must be "motiveless and hap-hazard" (page 9). All these pictures of his opponents' case are, for the purposes of sane controversy, fancy pictures. We do not say that Dr. Maudsley could not find in any of the idealist school expressions which might be construed as meaning something almost as extravagant and absurd. All we say is that persons who use language of that kind are not the foes from whom Dr. Maudsley has anything to fear, and that is, perhaps, the reason why he dwells on such statements—without, however, justifying them even by quotation—with so much obvious pleasure. There is nothing commoner with a controversialist than so to exaggerate what he sees to be the critical feature of his opponents' case as to make it a glaring caricature of reality. What the true realistic psychologist says is not that there is any "absolute and perfect freedom" in man, still less "an inexhaustible source of self-procreating energy," or "a motiveless and hap-hazard" power which ignores all reasons for its action. What reasonable psychologists who stick to facts do say is only this,—that in proportion as man's mind becomes healthy and mature, there is undoubtedly developed in it a certain limited power of free choice between alternative courses of action, a power of which it is impossible to say that you can find the efficient cause of it in the antecedent conditions, seeing that you know the efficient cause to be independent of the antecedent conditions. Now, this is not saying that our freedom is "absolute and perfect," but that it is relative and imperfect; it is not saying that it is "an inexhaustible source of self-procreating energy," but a very exhaustible source of such energy; and it is not saying that such freedom as we have is "motiveless and hap-hazard," for it may be, and ought to be, motivated and rational. Dr. Maudsley, with most of his school, confuses two most different things,—the reason for a course of action, and the efficient cause of that course of action. If a man chooses a course of action because it is right, it no more follows that it is the rightness of that course of action which determines his will, than it follows that if he goes to bed because the clock has struck his usual hour of bed-time, the striking of the clock has determined his will. In either case, it may be so, or may be otherwise. It may be that he is such an automaton that the striking of the clock sends him off to bed, just in the same way in which it liberates the cuckoo that accompanies the striking of the hour. And it may be that the rightness of a course of action, once seen, takes such immediate and complete possession of the will, that the action is as much determined by its rightness, as the egress of the cuckoo is determined by the striking of the clock. But the other alternative is quite as possible, and much more probable. The reason why the man does right need not be,—generally is not,—the efficient cause of his doing right. The rightness in itself may generate no impulse to act. The striking of the hour may generate no impulse to move. The supply of efficient cause may,—though it need not,—come from elsewhere in both cases, namely, from the man's own volition. He resolves to do right. He resolves to go to bed punctually. And though he acts because it is right, because the fixed hour has arrived, the efficient cause may well be his resolve, and not the reason for his resolve. You might as well say that when you strike a billiard-ball, the efficient cause must be the perception by which you regulate the direction of the blow, as say that when a man does right, the efficient cause must be the sense of rightness. The question is not why a man wills, but it is this,—what determines his will? And the reason why he wills may have little or no operative power in actually putting his will in motion. It is simply a question of fact where the operative influence comes from. We maintain that a man who knows himself, often knows perfectly what the spontaneous resultant of all the influences acting upon him will be unless he intervenes to resist that resultant influence; but that he may exert a certain limited, but still efficient amount of "anti-impulsive" effort, as the late Dr. Ward happily termed it, in opposition to that resultant influence. We do not say that a youth brought up in one set of habits can suddenly take up his free-will, break with his past, and so revolutionise himself as to make himself a new set of habits. We do not say that the amount of "anti-impulsive effort" which every man has at his disposal is unlimited. We do say only this,—that healthy and mature minds undoubtedly find in themselves the power of resisting, up to a certain point, the total set and tendency of their hereditary and personal inclinations and habits, and that it is impossible to ascribe this to a latent tendency of which the man is unconscious, because, if that were the explanation, the latent tendency, however unconscious he might be of it, would take its effect on him by inclining him so to act; whereas, all he is conscious of in these cases is the utmost disinclination so to act, and the positive self-assurance that if he does not make a most fatiguing and distressing effort against the grain of all his latent and patent tendencies, judgment will go by default on the wrong side.

Further, we press on Dr. Maudsley to explain to us how the illusion of freedom arises, if there be, as he says, "far more necessity in man than in nature, and far more freedom in nature than in man" (p. 127). On his view of the subject, there is really no excuse for the illusion of free will. Everything in our experience, he declares, points to the absolute uniformity of antecedent and consequent, and as the very notion of cause is closely bound up with that absolute uniformity of antecedent and consequent, the conception of a spiritual break in the chain of causation ought to be, in his view, a grotesque perversity of the mind more akin to insanity than sanity. And that, indeed, is his view of it. He uniformly treats the notion of any self-determining power as proper to lunatics, in whom it is very often extravagantly caricatured. But surely he is bound to account for the origin of what is to him so very mad a notion in the sanest and most practical minds of the day. We have come upon but one hint of such an explanation in Dr. Maudsley's book. It is in the section on "What Consciousness tells us Concerning Will," one of the ablest sections in the book, and one on which alone it would be easy to write a treatise. The suggestion is this,—that as consciousness tells us nothing, except concerning the moment, and as we are dependent on memory—memory, with all its inadequacy and inaccuracy—for the history of the states which led up to that moment, the notion of freedom probably arises from the comparative shadow and oblivion into which the antecedent and determining conditions have fallen. At least, that is how we understand the passage to which we refer. It runs as follows:—

"Consciousness makes known the actual choice or volition, but does not make known the pre-existent order of events; it does not reveal what has taken place, and is taking place, in the unilluminated region: it is the self-revelation of the moment, and no more. But how infinitely small is that revelation compared with what we learn by observation and experience of self and of others, and by the history of human doings in all time and in all places, needs not be pointed out. The one is the coruscating point of a moment, the other embraces length of time and breadth of space. As the testimony of consciousness, moreover, is immediate—that is to say, is strictly the expression of its present state—it cannot, by the nature of the case, have direct regard to any former state of consciousness; otherwise, we should have to admit that a present state of consciousness could be itself and a former state of consciousness at the same instant. If it steps beyond the instant, we have no longer to do with the direct deliverance of itself, but with the indirect evidence of memory of antecedent consciousness, not with introspective certainty, but with retrospective fallacy; staying in the instant, how can it help falling into the illusion of an undetermined will?"

Now, the answer to that clever suggestion is that if it were good for anything, it would be good for a great deal more than the illusion of an undetermined will in the form in which we actually find it in man. On that view, we should have "the illusion of an undetermined will" in respect to every act of our lives. A man insults me, and I promptly give him a blow which kills him. Interrogated about that blow, I say that so far as I know, it was involuntary, and due to a burst of passion which I had no more power to prevent at the time (doubtless owing to want of discipline in the past) than I have the power to prevent a start when a report goes off suddenly at my ear. But Dr. Maudsley's theory would make it just as natural to indulge "the illusion" of freedom in that case, as in the case of a deliberate resolve, taken after much inward debate. It is just as true that the consciousness in that case, too, applies only to the moment; that the consciousness of the past states which determined my impulse of the moment is a mere matter of memory; and that therefore I am liable to ascribe to free-will what the "fallacy of memory" prevents me from tracing back to the moral habits of the past. Dr. Maudsley fails to see that his account of the illusion of freedom would explain just as well why we ought to imagine actions to be free which we never for a moment suppose to be free, as why we ought to imagine actions to be free which we do most imperiously assert to result from our own self-caused volition, and from nothing else. Again, no man thinks that he is at liberty either to smell or not to smell a powerful odour. But Dr. Maudsley's suggestion as to the limited scope of immediate consciousness would be just as good for explaining why we had,—if we had,—any such illusion of freedom, as it is for explaining why we imagine volitions to be free which, according to him, are quite as deeply rooted in the history of the past as is the sense of a powerful odour in the physical origin of that odour.

One word only as to the physiological side of Dr. Maudsley's book. That there is much to be said as to the indisputable physical conditions of free volition, which Dr. Maudsley says with very great force, we should be the last to deny. But when he asserts (p. 118) "that there is not a single bodily phenomenon that has not its sufficient determining conditions in an antecedent state of the body," we reply simply that either we cannot agree with him as to what "the body" includes,—a subject on which, perhaps, he is himself not quite clear,—or that if we do, we challenge his statement of the fact. If the common belief that a number of people by sheer force of united volition can influence not a few persons, wholly unconscious of what that volition is, to perform some specified and complicated action previously agreed upon without these persons being in the least able to guess its nature, we call that a bodily phenomenon which has no sufficient determining conditions in the antecedent state of the body, as we know it, unless Dr. Maudsley very largely modify his ordinary use of the word "body." And if, again, it be true,—as a great deal of cumulative evidence goes to show,—that there are many cases in which dying people, and fewer but still indisputable cases in which people in health, can produce on persons at a distance the impression of their presence, and of some special condition of their mind at the moment of that visionary presence, then we say that this is a bodily phenomenon of which the determining condition appears to be in the main, not an antecedent state of the body, but an antecedent state of the feelings and the mind. But this is the class of facts which physiological psychology prefers to ignore, rather than to investigate and explain.

THE ROMANCE OF COMBEHURST.*

It is very seldom that we come across a book which bears such strong testimony to the good disposition of its writer as does The Romance of Combehurst. It impresses the reader as a romance written in the "sweet spring-time" by a young author, full of the enthusiasm of humanity. Nothing seems impossible, nothing that is right to do, too difficult to be done. Great sacrifices are willingly made and gracefully accepted, with an approving nod and smile from our authoress, which seem to say, "Good girl! that was the right thing to do," or, "Well done, my boy! that was your duty, and you have done it, not that any boy worthy the name could have done less. Still, we hear—though we are unwilling to believe it—that there are boys who are not worthy the name; therefore, we commend you." No one is exalted or made much of for doing his or her duty; the author takes it all in simple good-faith, as if it were the only natural line of action under the circumstances, which, as we have said, and said in all seriousness, speaks volumes for her own character and disposition. In the same good-faith she tells all the rest of her decidedly improbable story as though it were unquestionably quite true, almost beguiling us into accepting it all in the same spirit. There is no apology, no explanation, and certainly when you are telling an improbable story, that is the wise way in which to do it; only, in this case, we do not for a moment believe that our authoress thinks it to be improbable.

We have heard it said that you can do everything, however unpleasant it may be to those around you, if you only do it in the right way; and the instance given to prove the truth of this assertion is taken from humble life. A cat walks daintily into a room on a cold winter's day, and with a benign glance at the company and a melodious purring sound, she walks leisurely round, selects for herself the warmest place in the room—perhaps the only warm place, right in front of the fire—curls herself up and goes serenely to sleep, secure that no one will be so unreasonable as to question her right to sleep wherever inclination prompts her to sleep. No one calls it selfish, no one is annoyed, because she has done it so prettily and gracefully. Indeed, every one experiences an access of warmth and comfort in themselves, from beholding pussy's blissful repose. Now, imagine the same thing done in a different way, and by a less self-possessed individual—if it were done hurriedly, or noisily, or clumsily, or diffidently even, or in any way obtrusively, what a storm of indignation it would excite in the bosoms of all beholders? How thoughtless, how inconsiderate, how selfish! No, it must be done as the cat does it, without a sound or a gesture to provoke criticism, or it must not be done at all. In like manner, in telling an improbable story, do it confidently, boldly, unhesitatingly—never pretend to explain anything—and pleasantly, and you will, for the most part, carry your readers with you without criticism—and the authoress of The Romance of Combehurst has thus succeeded in a great measure; but we must be allowed to make ourselves an exception to the rule, for it is our business to criticise. First, however, we must say that it is a very pleasant story. You breathe in an atmosphere of open windows, large rooms, the scent of flowers, dewy roses, old trees, with their fresh spring green or their rich autumn tints; and even when you are taken to a home behind a small shop in London, you are treated to a long, snug parlour, and to a large lumber-room, tidy and clean, with air and space, and containing a fine piano, where the heroine may cultivate her glorious voice at her own sweet will, or nearly so.

Every one in this book is either good and kind and attractive, or becomes so in the course of the second volume. Even the wicked hero, who has been endeavouring to possess himself, by means of marrying the heroine, of the property which he knows to be hers, but which is supposed by the world at large to be his—and whose baseness is a great shock to the feelings of the gentle authoress—suddenly and completely reforms, on receipt of a letter from this same cousin, offering him, by deed of gift, the whole property of which she has unexpectedly become possessed, and asking only, in return, that he would desist from his attempts to make her his wife, and absolve her from the promise, which she gave to her dying grandmother, to try to care for him. When he had read this letter, “surprise, agitation, and at last a great and sudden remorse, seemed to overpower him, as the strong-willed, imperious man bowed his head on his hands, in an attitude of utter self-humiliation.” From this position he rises eventually, writes to his cousin confessing his guilt, and instantly makes preparations for leaving the country and toiling in some distant land, to earn, with the work of his own hands, sufficient money with which to repay his cousin all that he had spent since he became aware that the property belonged to her. This sudden and complete reformation taxes the powers of credulity, already considerably stretched, a little too far, and we could scarcely blame the reader, if at this point, he encroached somewhat on our prerogative of criticism, or if he were slightly incredulous as to the “dark glances,” the “vehement storms of invective which burst from his lips,” &c., of which we have heard before in connection with this same young hero. Nor is this all, for the high-minded younger brother, Basil, who is also in love with the heiress, and with whom she is in love, decides that he must share his brother’s exile. “If he is shamed,” he says, “I am shamed. If he is rightly self-exiled, I am rightly self-exiled, too;” and he goes, without a word of explanation as to his feelings. He and Dorothy enter together upon the final trial, which is to perfect their already almost perfect characters; and Vernon, in his distant home, fast approaches the same desirable state of perfection. Vernon’s exile has the good effect also of raising a frivolous young lady, who is attached to him, to the high level which he and his family have attained. All this is very pleasant and satisfactory, and we willingly confess that, if we are to have either a superfluity of goodness or a superfluity of naughtiness, in a story, we infinitely prefer the former.

The actors in The Romance of Combehurst are not particularly natural or life-like. Their talk is decidedly formal, old-fashioned and stilted, and the ends of their sentences are too finely rounded off for ordinary conversation. For instance, Vernon concludes an address to his brother with, “I will leave you to your pleasant reflections, and seek the rest which I sorely need;” and Basil says to himself, “Meanwhile, I, too, am weary, and must to bed.” He talks, too, of “wotting” of, instead of “knowing of.” He is an exceedingly good young man, and reminds us, somewhat, of Miss Austen’s Edmund, in Mansfield Park, in his way of lecturing and setting others to rights, in a perfectly gentle and courteous, but slightly priggish fashion; he, however, would certainly not have knocked under about the acting, had he been in Edmund’s place. Basil, again, speaks to his young protégé patronisingly as “child,” or in such terms as these, “There, that is my wise pupil, again.” Most of the actors in this drama address one another in the exclamatory fashion so common in books fifty years since,—“My kind Robin,” “My dear Master,” “My good pupil,” “Dear Madam,” “Little Dorothy,” &c.; and a superfluity of “Ma’am,” “Sirs,” and “Misses” appears constantly; and we even find

The two Mr. Rigbys are certainly exceptionally fortunate in having no relatives with whom to divide the property and money which they inherit from old “Lady Hurst,” as their own claim to it dates back as far as their great-great-grandfather on the mother’s side; but this authoress is generous in her bestowal upon her characters of all fine things, both spiritual and temporal, amongst which last are titles, which she bestows with as much inaccuracy as generosity. A certain Sir Cecil Hurst, baronet, great-grandfather to old Lady Hurst, falls in love with a beautiful and virtuous public singer, of the name of Dorothy—who accompanies herself on the guitar!—and marries her; and on her marriage that lady is supposed to become Lady Dorothy Hurst, a title which she could only have possessed had she been the daughter of an earl at least. Later on, and stranger still, the daughter of a baronet apparently inherits her father’s title, and is called “Lady Hurst”—the old lady with whose death the story begins—and the baronetcy is made to descend through her to her son, who is described as “Sir Maurice Hurst, Bart.” Perhaps, since titles are so very hereditary in this family, it may not be so extraordinary a coincidence that family likenesses insist on descending with the same exemplary pertinacity. It is recorded that in the gallery of the Hall of Combehurst, Dorothy—then supposed to be the adopted child of the old lodge-keeper—is struck with the wonderful, almost exact likeness between Mr. Basil Rigby and his great-great-great-great-grandfather, Sir Basil Hurst; and Basil sees the veritable Dorothy herself, to whom he has just presented a guitar, in the portrait of her great-great-great-grandmother, the “Lady Dorothy Hurst” before mentioned, with whom Sir Cecil Hurst (why not Sir Basil, to make the coincidence complete?) fell in love while she was singing to the guitar.

The history of the father and mother of the heroine is strangely similar. Both were only children, both had well-meaning but severe mothers, who made their homes unendurable to them; they ran away, and were married; both died, and, before dying, both wrote repentant letters to their respective mothers. Both these letters failed in reaching the hands for which they were destined. One was laid aside in the pocket of a coat which was never again unwrapped in the lifetime of Lady Hurst, the other was put away in a box which was never opened in the lifetime of Mrs. Wilson,—and hence arise the mystery of the story. These strange circumstances are, of course, not huddled grossly together, as we have huddled them, but are discreetly distributed over the second volume, and told in the simple, credulous style of this authoress. The coincidences are not unbecomingly prominent, until we set to work to pull the book to pieces; and when we have said our worst, it still remains a lively story, full of agreeable people with refined feelings and exceptionally high principles, even down to the good old family lawyer. The scene is laid in a lovely neighbourhood—a neighbourhood, we imagine, compounded of the writer’s experience of the New Forest and the Quantock Hills—and the story is written by a thorough lover of Nature and of her kind, as well as by an ardent believer in the ultimate victory of good over evil.

COLONEL MALLESON’S LIFE OF LORD CLIVE.*

“It has often occurred to me,” writes Colonel Malleison in his preface, “that the title of the people of these Islands to control the interests of the vast populations inhabiting Hindustan, so often called in question during recent years, might be fairly investigated by a crucial examination of the proceedings of the warriors and statesmen whose title to be regarded as the founders of the Indian Empire has never been questioned.” It is not quite clear what a crucial examination may be or do, but did it never occur to Colonel Malleison that the “proceedings” of Clive, Warren Hastings, and Wellesley have been tolerably well investigated already, by friends and foes alike? Did it never occur to him that the accretions made to our empire since the days of Clive and Wellesley have rendered their “proceedings” of not much weight, as affecting our title to rule our Indian Empire as at present constituted? Finally, did it never occur to him that the title of the English race to rule “the vast populations inhabiting Hindustan” depends not at all on the greater or less injustice which may have accompanied the “proceedings” of the soldiers and statesmen who have founded and built up our empire in the East? Our title rests on the fact that we are a superior race to the vast "populations" we have taken upon ourselves to govern. That this undertaking involves, in foro conscientie publicæ, duties and liabilities which—but really the observations that Colonel Malleeson's idea challenges are so alarmingly obvious, that we shrink from making them. We shall criticise his book, therefore, as a biography of Clive, and refrain from troubling our readers with his "crucial examination." And we do this contentedly enough, because we have been unable to trace in this work the slightest attempt to traverse or rectify the verdict which has long been passed on Clive's work, or to connect that work with the "title" which "has so often been called in question during recent years."

There was room for a new life of Clive. There is room for a new biography of all our greatest men, with the exception of Scott and Johnson, and perhaps, but this is dubious, of Nelson. Readers of Macaulay's essay do not need to be told why the labours of Mill, Orme, and Sir John Malcolm left the coast clear for Gleig's Life of Clive, which was a respectable performance of the middle-rate, and as such neither better nor worse, in our opinion, than the work before us. For Colonel Malleeson, if he does not "altogether lack the abilities" that a biographer should be "dressed in," lacks most of them. He cannot treat a great theme greatly, and he indulges in petty bombast. "A giant in isolation feels no sympathy with the policy of dwarfs," for instance, is a sounding sentence which signifies little or nothing when applied, as it is by Colonel Malleeson, to the failures which Wellesley, Ellenborough, and Clive proved to be in the sphere of English politics. Moreover, Colonel Malleeson's style is neither vivid nor nervous. His moral reflections are so obvious as to wear the appearance of platitudes. His political reflections are anything but "flashes of sagacity." As a military historian, he is at his best, but even here he has managed to show, quite gratuitously, that he is as ignorant of the careers of other conquerors as he is conversant with that of Clive. It was not "caution" which prevented Napoleon from making Borodino a decisive victory; and if he had thrown the whole of his Guard into the fight, "all the horrors of the retreat from Russia," which Colonel Malleeson refers to the fact that he did not, would have followed from his prolonged stay in Moscow, and from the resolution of the Czar and his people, which there is no ground for supposing that a more damaging defeat on the Moskwa would have altered. It is idle, too, to suppose that the conduct of the Governor of Craone materially affected the result of the campaign in France in 1814. That was a foregone conclusion from the hour when Napoleon wrote, after Montmirail, to his representatives at Chatillon to take a less humble attitude. Again, "want of scruple" was not fatal personally to Alexander the Great nor to Julius Cæsar, whom Colonel Malleeson affectedly calls Caius Julius; neither did Frederick the Great triumph in spite of his want of scruple, nor does "his work, continued on the same basis, triumph still." Napoleon rubbed that work clean off the slate; and Scharnhorst and Stein are the real founders of Prussia's present greatness. And even with regard to Napoleon, it was not his "want of scruple" that ruined him, but, as the Duke of Wellington emphatically said, his utter want, at times, of common-sense. As the last four blunders occur in one of the score of pages of needless summary and dubious comment which Colonel Malleeson naïvely calls the "Character" of Clive, this will be as good a place as we are likely to find for making some strictures on that "character," for Macaulay's essay and ubiquitous examiners have made the remarkable career of Clive a matter of such common knowledge that we may refer to any step in it without any preliminary words of elucidation. In Clive's second administration, then, he showed himself, to use Colonel Malleeson's expression, "in all respects the virtuous, resolute, far-sighted reformer and statesman." This is true, but when Colonel Malleeson goes on to say that there was reason in the men who argued that when Clive bore himself thus, that "it was in very deed Satan reproving sin"; that the manner in which the victor of Plassy had made his fortune should have prevented him from returning to India; and finally, that "men will not stand to be lectured by a man who has profited by the vices which he denounces in them," our answer is simple. Every one remembers how Macaulay proves that although criminal justice knows nothing of set-off, history takes wider views. But there is more to be said than that. When Satan rebukes sin he will be playing the hypocrite, or will, as Burns wished he would, be taking a thought and mending. Now, Clive was no hypocrite, and far indeed as we are from agreeing with Colonel Malleeson's notion that his character is "an open book, which all who run may read"—an amusing variation this, of the time-honoured misquotation from Habakkuk, for nothing hinders that an open book may be printed in type as small as that of Pickering's diamond edition of Shakespeare—it is a psychological fact that Clive was honestly blind to the immorality of his worst deeds. Assume that he was not, look at him as Satan rebuking sin, it is still clear that the sin which he was rebuking was not identical with the sin of which he was conscious. Imagine him saying, in colloquial language, to the men who defended their own laches by identifying it with his own:—"I sheared a shepherd, closely belike and cruelly perhaps; but he was an evil shepherd to his flock, and if I went too fast and too far, what matter? But you, gentlemen, are bent on shearing more closely and cruelly the sheep themselves. I can keep you from doing so, and I will." And he did; and whatever Colonel Malleeson may say, the admiration which Clive's second administration deservedly claims must be extended in some degree to Clive himself. And as to the forcible-feeble gnome that "men will not stand to be lectured," &c., that depends. Like the Yankee sportsman's beaver, they'll "hev to," if the lecturer has a will like Clive's, and power like his to enforce that will.

Approaching this Life from another side, we find none of the details which we eagerly look for, when we come across any hitherto unread account of Clive. Suicide is, as a rule, a subject not more dismal than dull; and the conventional solution of "temporary insanity" is as wise, on the whole, in all cases, as it is probably false in many. But this remark applies to the rank and file of suicides, and not to such an exceptional man as Clive. Did he commit suicide, after all? We hold that he did not, if he perished by an over-dose of laudanum, against which he had been specially warned. For cases not a few have occurred where men have taken what others deemed an over-dose and more, and have recovered. But if a penknife was used, and we have never been able to make out whether it was or no, then, whether Clive used it as one who deliberately chooses to bear "the natural shocks that flesh is heir to" no longer, or used it when his mind for the moment was unbinged, his suicide suggests some questions that are worth considering. Macaulay speaks with characteristic confidence of a "great mind ruined by the pang of wounded honour, by the weariness of satiety, by fatal diseases and still more fatal remedies." But parsimony of causes holds in other matters as well as natural science, and the pain of the gall-stones was more likely to act as a counter-irritant than not to the pangs of wounded honour (if Clive ever felt any), and vice versa. Then as to the weariness of satiety and the laudanum. It would certainly be interesting, and instructive, too, to learn, if we may compare small things with great, whether Clive's satiety had anything in common with the satiety which brought the late Mr. Sayers, of valorous memory, to an early grave. Was the "Clive party" analogous to poor Tom's Circus? Was the great soldier and statesman as resourceless when his occupation was gone as the great pugilist was? What were Clive's personal habits? Was reading a sealed fountain of delight to him? Did he drink? Did he gamble? And, finally, was there anything in his sayings and doings that could be regarded as a herald of approaching insanity? For opium, though it ruins the will as completely as it wastes the muscles of a man, leaves his intellect unimpaired and sound, though, by reason of the will's weakness, no longer always available. Colonel Malleeson makes no addition to the story of Clive sitting taciturn for hours together in company, and breaking out with fire and energy when the conversation turned on some subject which interested him,—on the way, for instance, that England should be defended in case of invasion. "And that man cut his throat!" was Johnson's comment on this story; and as we can find no other reference to Clive in Boswell, we must say that Macaulay was building on a very slight foundation, if it was for this, and for this only, that he says that Johnson always spoke of Clive as an incarnate fiend.

Readers of Macaulay's essay may be surprised at the high place which he assigns to Clive as a General. It is only justice to Colonel Malleeson to say that his narrative of Clive's military career gives us full warrant for placing Clive fourth on the list of the commanders that England has produced. It is strange that he has chosen a motto for his book from Carlyle, for Carlyle appears, and might inferentially be proved from his account of Wolfe's death, to have never heard of Clive. We must also protest against Colonel Malleon's mode of spelling Indian proper names. The "fad" which gives us "Kánci-puran" for "Conjeveran" is worse than that which offers us "Korinth" for "Corinth," and it is needless to say that the value of this work for students is sensibly and materially diminished by the fact that no atlas has been published in English, or, so far as we know, in any language, which can be used with it. It provokes a smile, too, to find that the nemesis of phonetic spelling exacts inconsistency as a penalty from the votaries of that "fad" in India as well as in Hellas. "Plassey," which ought, if Colonel Malleon is right, to be spelt "Paláse," was the title, he says, given by the English to the victory, and must be respected. Quite so; but then, by all that is wonderful, why offer us "Lakhaao" for "Lucknow"? Inconsistency may not be the sin of sins which impetuous Schiller said it was, but fatuous and gratuitous inconsistency should be avoided by a historian; and though Colonel Malleon may ignore the fact, it is none the less certain that in the next historical work which is written on India, the geographical names will either appear in their old forms, or in phonetic forms which, whatever else they may be, will not be the same as his own.

DE PRESSENSÉ'S "STUDY OF ORIGINS."*

DE PRESSENSÉ is already well known as the author of important historical books on the life of Christ, and on the early years of Christianity. These works showed that he was a diligent and competent historical student, and they also revealed speculative power of no ordinary kind. The various phases of the conflict between Christianity and Greek and Roman culture, which he had to describe, led him to ponder deeply on the ultimate problems of knowledge, of being, and of duty. In his historical studies he found phases of thought, and modes of regarding religion, life, and duty, which he also found in scientific and philosophical discussion among the chief European nations. He has consequently studied with enthusiasm and success the chief currents of modern thought, and the result we have in the volume now before us.

He calls his book A Study of Origins, and his object is to examine critically the various theories which are now current regarding knowledge, being, and duty, and to set forth what he regards as the true solution of these problems. It is a weighty task, which has taxed even his consummate powers to the uttermost. Nor has he been successful on all the lines of attack and defence. Sometimes he seems to surrender a position which might be easily defended; sometimes he regards as vital and important positions which many have abandoned as indefensible. But when all allowances are made, we regard this work of De Pressensé as of great importance, and as a weighty contribution to the philosophic literature of our time. The style is clear, lucid, and felicitous, adapting itself readily to all the sinuosities of his subject. The arrangement of topics is such as to make each chapter an introduction to what follows, and all are grouped into one artistic whole. He has thought out his subject, and has anticipated the objections which may be brought against his conclusions. The point of view from which the book is written is thus described in the preface:—

"To think freely is to lay aside all prejudice, and to accept simply the results of experience. I am increasingly convinced that experimental science is in no way hostile to the principles of theism. It is not the province of science to demonstrate these principles; all that can be fairly asked of it is to recognise their possibility. When once this possibility of a divine and moral world is granted, other processes of experiment adapted to the nature of the subject supply its demonstration; the way is open. This is the conclusion to which I would bring my readers. Once thoroughly established, this conclusion suffices to secure to humanity its most precious possession,—that higher life apart from which man misses all that distinguishes him from the brute, and is without any light beyond the grave, without any compass on his voyage through life, without morality, without law, without liberty, given up to the chances of brute force, a hopeless and degraded thing. I refuse to accept such a horoscope for humanity. If, indeed, the first and final term of the world's history were force, I should be a pessimist of the sombrest dye, both as regards society and the individual." (p. xi.)

The issues are vital, and when a writer is thus conscious of the greatness of the issue, we may expect him to put forth all his strength.

One feature in this work is worthy of respect and of imitation. M. de Pressensé is careful to state the opinions of his opponents with the utmost precision and accuracy, and he always speaks of them with the respect due to their position and eminence in the departments of science they have respectively cultivated. He has no jealousy of science, no distrust of its method, nor fear of its results. He is a theist, and to him jealousy of science means distrust in God. But he is careful to distinguish between the method and results of science, within their proper sphere, and the vast and vague speculations, mainly of the negative sort, which have cast their dark shadow on every side around the stable-ground of science. He insists that the method which is true and adequate in physical science must be modified and enlarged when we study the phenomena of life, and again, must be further enlarged when we regard moral, spiritual, and social life. The method of study must vary according to the conditions of the problem, and modes of acquiring knowledge must be adapted to the diversity of objects to be known. A man of science who has mastered the methods of physical science, and is recognised as an authority, say, on light, heat, or electricity, is often rendered unfit by his very success in his own field of knowledge to form even an intelligent opinion on matters of a more complex nature. He usually deals with motives as if they were physical forces, with men as if they were atoms, and with the vast and complicated phenomena of human life as if those were as simple as are the laws of matter and motion. As a matter of fact, when such men speak of moral and spiritual things, their first procedure is to eliminate all that is characteristic of the higher life, reduce the problem to its lowest terms, and so find nothing in the problem which cannot be expressed in terms of matter and motion. It is easy for the human mind to find resting-places on any of the ascending planes of life, and by the easy process of denial of all that lies above and beyond seek to affirm that a true and adequate solution has been found of the mystery of being, thought, and life. While ready to welcome all the positive conquests of science, he is prepared to show that these are not inconsistent with, rather they are in fullest harmony with Theism and with Christianity. It would lead us too far afield to enter into detail, but a brief summary will not be out of place.

The first book discusses the problem of knowledge, and, as was to be expected in a French writer, the author begins with a statement and criticism of Positivism. The famous law of the three stages is discussed; and these stages turn out, on examination, to be not successive, but co-existent, and in truth three aspects of things all equally necessary for embracing things in their totality. Then, again, Positivism has not been able to keep within the bounds assigned to it. On the one hand, Comte has passed beyond the positive limit, by allowing scope to the religious sentiment; and on the other hand, M. Littré has transgressed the limit, by tending more and more to materialism, as the solution of the problem of the Universe. Then follows a luminous discussion of the new psychology of England, France, and Germany, in which we find a clear statement and a stringent criticism of the views of Stuart Mill, Spencer, Taine, Herbart, Lotze, to mention only the more prominent names. We are led on to the views of Descartes, Spinoza, and Kant; and growing out of this historical disquisition, we find what De Pressensé regards as the true solution of the problem of knowledge. This book is valuable for its wealth of historical information, as well as for its contribution to the theory of knowledge. The most important section is that which describes the share of the will in knowledge.

The second and third books are devoted to the discussion of the problem of being, and treat of the questions of the origin of the cosmos and the origin of man. Here M. de Pressensé comes into contact with those theories which have this element in common, however diverse in method and result they may otherwise be,—that they seek to account for the Universe from within the Universe. They cannot endure the thought of a Creator, and relegate him to the position of the Unknowable, or think of him as identified with the sum of things. Here it is necessary for the author to grapple with the theory of Darwin, or rather with Darwin's theory as modified and extended by subsequent writers,—with the transformation theory of Herbert Spencer, and with the theories of Immanence, as set forth by Hegel, or of unconscious will or purpose, as maintained by Schopenhauer and Hartmann. Here, again, we note the accuracy of statement with which he sets forth the views he has to controvert. As regards the origin of man, in a series of chapters he discusses the more important questions raised in more recent years. Man in his twofold nature, the relations of the physical and the moral, man and the brutes, language—its origin and influence on knowledge,—and human society and animal societies, are the titles of this part of the book. We quote the following paragraph:—

"In any case, the moral unity of mankind remains beyond question. We do not say that this unity has been felt and recognised in all ages. The consciousness of it has gradually grown clearer, as it has been raised from the purely natural into the higher sphere of the moral life, till in the end man has learnt, not only to acquiesce in, but to desire it. The highest form of society was to receive this seal of the free and conscious life which separates it from animal societies. Hence it has needed long ages for the great idea of humanity to overcome the exclusivism of the clan, the tribe, the nation. The ancient world was built upon principles the very reverse of this; each nation applied to other nations the insulting name of barbarians. The alien was as much outside the protection of law as the vanquished foe; the rights of man, as man, had no recognised existence. Philosophical thought, indeed, anticipated free institutions. Cicero, as a true prophet of the ideal, spoke of the republic of mankind; but it was not till the Son of God had appeared in history that the grand word of emancipation was spoken. 'In Christ, there is neither Jew, nor Greek, barbarian, Scythian, bond or free.' On that day, the great human society broke all the fetters of tribe and nation. But many centuries had yet to pass, and many a moral battle to be fought, before the idea of humanity was accepted in all its breadth, and embodied in free institutions." (pp. 359-360.)

In the book on the problem of duty, the old questions, old in some forms as the Schools of Greece, are discussed with clearness, freshness, and power. De Pressensé is against utilitarianism in all its forms. He is against determinism and an advocate of free-will, and he makes a notable contribution towards the settlement of this olden controversy. There is also a valuable discussion on moral sanctions. Another chapter treats of the significance of art, and yet another, and this is one of the best, deals with the origin and nature of religion. This chapter takes advantage of the full and ripe discussions on the great subject of Religion by thinkers of the eminence of Hegel, Pfleiderer, and Réville. The concluding chapter is on "The Savage and Primeval Man."

It will be seen from this brief summary how extensive is the range of questions discussed by De Pressensé in this volume. We have also to state that each part of the volume is written with full knowledge of the literature of each particular subject. It has been well received in France; it will, we believe, be warmly welcomed in England. The full and accurate description of the views of many writers in Germany, France, and England makes it of great value to those who reside far from libraries, and who are unable to procure many books; while the positive contribution to the great Theistic argument, and the criticism of opposing views, will help those who, in many places, have to contend with and overcome the anti-theistic theories of the day. It may be added that Mrs. Holmden has translated the book into English in every way worthy of the importance of the work. The translation is specially happy in the rendering of technical terms in science and philosophy.

THREE BOOKS ABOUT THE STAGE.*

It is not difficult to point out faults in Mr. William Archer's vigorous criticism of the drama and the dramatists of the day. His style is rather self-conscious. He apparently thinks his views so different from those of most writers on his subject that he must necessarily be defiant beforehand; and so, on almost every second page, we find him almost undisguisedly in a "come one, come all," attitude. He denounces, and very properly denounces, vulgarity on the stage, yet in his "Introduction" he writes in this fashion:—"Theatrical audiences are seldom entirely composed of young ladies' boarding-schools, and in a world constituted as ours is, the serious facts of life cannot be seriously treated without touching on subjects which may be classed as 'unpleasant.' The fault lies not with the dramatist, but ultimately with Eve and the Serpent, but for whom the Licensor of Plays would have had a sinecure." Mr. Archer's second sentence is a fair example of the clap-trap humour for indulging in which he rightly blames Mr. Burnand, Mr. Byron, and although in a lesser degree, Mr. Gilbert. Mr. Archer's style could be improved; he is apt to sacrifice lucidity for the sake of trenchancy or terseness. Thus he writes of Mr. Herman Merivale:—"He can scarcely be called one of the popular dramatists of the day.

He writes too well and too carefully for that bad eminence. It is to be hoped and expected that Mr. Merivale may give us much good and successful work in the coming years, and that his popularity may rise, if not to fever-point, at least to a fair and steady average temperature?" The sentiment here is sound, but the clumsy "for" in the second sentence, and the inappropriate metaphor in the third, are fair examples of the shoddy English that is printed in these days, when we seem to have far too much running and writing, without preliminary walking and reading. We confess, too, that we do not quite understand the principle on which Mr. Archer classifies living English dramatists and playwrights. He may be right in describing Mr. Browning as "a dramatist of the day after-to-morrow; but we see no good reason for his placing Mr. Boucicault and Mr. Charles Reade beside Robertson and the late Lord Lytton as playwrights of yesterday. Playwrights or dramatists of to-day are men who cater for the theatrical wants of the day; are not Mr. Boucicault and Mr. Reade still doing so? Mr. Archer's list of present-day writers for the Stage includes sixteen names arranged in alphabetical order, beginning with Mr. James Albery, and closing with Mr. W. G. Wills. Encouraged by the ignorance to which the Lord Chief Justice lately confessed as to the existence of Miss Constance Gilchrist and of Mr. Corney Grain, we venture to ask who is Mr. S. Theyre Smith? At all events, who is he, that he should be included in such a list, while the name of Mr. Robert Buchanan, although we are far from endorsing his pretensions as a dramatist, does not appear in it?

With all its faults, however, Mr. Archer's volume is a likeable one, and ought to be read, especially by the writers whom he criticises. He is fearless, honest, and open-eyed, even though he is also self-conscious. Although we do not agree with his views as to the relationship that ought to exist between the stage and the morals, what he says about the "non-moral" character of many of the English plays of the day is only too sound. The "Criterion drama"—including vulgar pieces of the "Pink Dominoes" and "Betsy" type—deserves all that Mr. Archer says of it, and a great deal more. Mr. Byron, Mr. Burnand, and even Mr. Gilbert—at least in some passages that disfigure his Pygmalion and Galatea—quite merit such a rebuke as Mr. Archer administers to them, for writing or "adapting" to please a theatrical taste inferior to their own. They have certainly shown themselves capable of doing better work than that on which Mr. Archer animadverts, and whenever a writer deliberately gives to the world what does not come up to his own standard of excellence, he commits an offence deserving of censure. In plain English, he sacrifices reputation for pocket, and, what is worse, he contributes to the further demoralisation of the public taste. Such an offence is, indeed, similar in kind, but, of course, unequal in magnitude, to that of Dryden, who, when Belial was enthroned at the Restoration, set himself deliberately to burn incense to him, although to a certain extent, fortunately for his fame, "his indelicacy," as Sir Walter Scott says, "was like the forced impudence of a bashful man." Mr. Archer's book may have a little of the effect of the wholesome moral operation performed in the family circle, and familiarly styled "a good shaking."

Mr. Michael Williams's Some London Theatres, Past and Present, and Mr. Hollingshead's Footlights may be bracketed together, if not contrasted. Mr. Williams's book, which consists of five chapters dealing with the drama in Sadler's Wells, High-bury Barn, Norton-Folgate, Portman Market, and the "Three Lyceums," is a modest and entertaining one. He is generous, rather than discriminating, in the panegyrics he passes on actors, actresses, and theatrical managers. But he has been at great pains to collect information about the truly melancholy vicissitudes of the drama in London, and to give it to the public in a readable form. Mr. Williams might, however, have been less mysterious in speaking about some danger that he thinks may be in store for Mr. Irving and the latest and most successful of the "Three Lyceums." It serves little purpose to write in this fashion,—"Whether our great Actor-Manager, at a later period—it is said, next year—will find himself able to take up the thread of popular interest at the point where he left it, remains to be seen; but, to judge from past examples, the outlook is not, we fear, altogether unfraught with danger." The title of "Footlights," which Mr. Hollingshead has given to the eleventh volume of his collected stories, essays, and sketches, is rather a misnomer. Probably the bulk, certainly the best, of the book has no bearing on the Stage; take, for example, the papers giving "Thumb-nail Sketches" in Russia and Spain, which are full of a genuine, if rather broad humour. Many of the sketches hardly deserved the original trouble Mr. Hollingshead took in writing them for magazines and journals; and the sole excuse for their republication is the fact, which their author triumphantly states in his preface, that he has found a publisher. Does not everybody, at least everybody who reads a periodical, know by heart the stories of Beau Nash the M.C. and the "Young Roscius"? Mr. Hollingshead is never dull, however, and the readers of Footlights will find out-of-the-way information in papers like "Manfred" on the Stage" and "A Gentle Lady Married to a Moor," and also mild sarcasm and a ha'porth of wisdom in "School Board Papers," "The Spendthrift's Guide," and the letters "To the (seldom-at) Home Secretary." But surely Mr. Hollingshead is beating out his gold very thin.

MR. SWINBURNE'S CENTURY OF ROUNDELS.*

A CRITIC who has anything of the modesty which characterises his order feels somewhat reluctant to arraign a poet of Mr. Swinburne's rank on a matter which concerns the exercise of his art. We are thankful for whatever new he may give us, and if he chooses that this should be in the form of a roundel, or even of a hundred roundels, who is there to complain? But we are sure that we are expressing the feelings of many readers, when we say that the choice in this particular instance does not seem to us a very happy one. A roundel is a very pretty and ingenious toy. Constructed with the metrical skill of which Mr. Swinburne is a master, it is capable of giving, on occasion, a good deal of pleasure. But the occasion, we take it, is when it comes as a change, a relief after some poem which requires laborious thought, or which appeals to the deeper emotions. Such poems give us the impression of the human soul approaching regions which are almost too lofty for its life, or struggling with emotions which almost master it. All this is changed, when we come to an elaborate composition like a roundel. Here man is evidently master of what he deals with. He sports with language, twists it and turns it at his pleasure, and so stirs no deeper feeling than the satisfaction with which we regard the skilful exercise of art. Hence there naturally follows a very narrow limitation of the themes with which such poems can properly deal. There was a time, perhaps, when genuine feeling may have expressed itself in these highly artificial forms. It can scarcely so express itself now. The happiest efforts of the kind that are now produced are those in which there is at least a suspicion of banter. If we want a roundel or a ballade à double refrain in perfection, we should be inclined to go to the semi-humorous muse of Mr. Andrew Lang. Who does not feel that the pathetic tone of the following example of Mr. Swinburne's Century is injured, not by anything incongruous in the language, which, indeed, is all that could be wished, but by the metrical form, a form which seems to us wanting both in dignity and in sweetness:—

"How should life, O friend, forget
Death, whose guest art thou?
Faith responds to love's regrets
How?"

Still, for us that bow
Sorrowing, still, though life be set,
Shines thy mild bright brow.

Yea, though death and thou be met,
Love may find thee now
Still, albeit we know not yet
How."

Surely there is something very jarring in this abrupt monosyllable "how," something which makes us feel, as a great poet never should allow us to feel, the mechanism of the verse. In this case, the word is peculiarly unlucky, for it seems to have compelled Mr. Swinburne, who is far too great a master of language to allow of such compulsion, to use a very strange inversion in the second line. "Whose guest art thou," for "whose guest thou art," is obscure and harsh. Such of the hundred poems as have a similar monosyllable as the pivot, so to speak, of their metrical construction, are, in our judgment, the least felicitous of the collection. But though the others jar less upon the ear, often indeed, we willingly allow, do not jar at all, the impression made by this long succession of ingenious efforts is wanting in true effectiveness. We should say this in the case of any writer, we say it with the more emphasis in the case of Mr. Swinburne, because the special quality of his verse, his sonorous, even magnificent rhythm, is lost in what is at best a melodious elegance.

Our ungracious task of fault-finding ended, we gladly acknowledge the many charms and beauties of this volume. Never has the poet touched to more effect the note of pathos. Here are two successive poems which seem to us very happy, both in their resemblance and their contrast:—

I.

"Above the sea and sea-washed town we dwelt,
We twain together, two brief summers, free
From heed of hours as light as clouds that melt
Above the sea.

Free from all heed of aught at all were we,
Save chance of change that clouds or sunbeams dealt,
And gleam of heaven to windward or to lee.

The Norman downs, with bright grey waves for belt
Were more for us than inland ways might be;
A clearer sense of nearer heaven was felt

II.

Cliffs and downs and headlands which the forward-hasting
Flight of dawn, and eve empurples and embrowns, Wings of wild sea-winds and stormy seasons wasting Cliffs and downs,

These, or ever man was, were; the same sky frowns,
Laughs, and lightens, as before his soul, forecasting
Times to be, conceived such hopes as time discrowns.

These we loved of old; but now for me the blasting Breath of death makes dull the bright small seaward towns, Clothes with human change these all but everlasting
Cliffs and downs."

To the same class may be referred the seven poems that come under the title of "A Baby's Death." Their pathetic beauty would be marred by separating any one from the rest, and the reader must go to Mr. Swinburne's volumes to judge of them. The "Étude Réaliste," as Mr. Swinburne half-mockingly, it would seem, entitles the three roundels which celebrate the charms of a baby's feet, hands, and eyes, is ingenious, but little more; but a higher note again is touched in the eleven poems which the poet devotes to various phases of babyhood and childhood. It is no small increase to the charms of this volume that throughout it Mr. Swinburne sings virginibus puerisque. As we began by venturing to criticise the form in which he has chosen to put his thoughts, we shall conclude by quoting the very graceful little poem in which he describes and, so to speak, defends his art:—

"A roundel is wrought as a ring or a starbright sphere,
With craft of delight and with cunning of sound unsought,
That the heart of the hearer may smile, if to pleasure his ear
A roundel is wrought."

Its jewel of music is carven of all or of aught—
Love, laughter, or mourning—remembrance of rapture or fear—
That fancy may fashion to hang in the ear of thought.

As a bird's quick sound runs round, and the hearts in us hear
Pause answer to pause, and again the same strain is caught,
So moves the device whence, round as a pearl or tear,
A roundel is wrought."

UNDER SUNNY SKIES.*

WE once heard Mr. Justin McCarthy's History of Our Own Times spoken of as a delightful history, "because it was so juicy." On the principle, probably, that opposites are apt to suggest each other, this expression occurred to us on reading Under Sunny Skies, because it is an exact definition of what that book is not; it is, in truth, a dry composition, which lacks the quality of juiciness sadly. We are sorry to have to express this unfavourable opinion, because the author has evidently bestowed both care and thought upon her work, can write very cleverly, and gives indications of a capacity for keen criticism. But for all that, she will never produce a good novel, unless she will learn to forget herself in writing, and to think more of the importance of pleasing her audience than of airing her own notions about things in general and politics in particular, and of giving to the world the last verses she has written. Long dialogues on political subjects, descriptions of scenery, and rhapsodies about hunting and art, may be very useful as accessories to a novel, but cannot make one up by themselves; it is out of these materials that the greater part of this book is composed, and if they be taken out of it, there is hardly anything substantial in the shape of plot or incident as a residuum. The writer apparently regards being amusing as a matter of indifference, compared with being edifying, didactic, weighty, serious; and the ungrateful reader, alas! instead of appreciating her efforts for his instruction as he should do, longs for something lighter,—a scrap of nonsense, a touch of humour, a bit of fun, a spark of jollity, something to provoke a laugh. Had she studied human nature as closely as she has done abstract subjects, especially politics, she would surely have avoided this over-gravity; for she would have perceived that as the seriousness of life can never expel all the light and comic elements that are in humanity, therefore no picture of the latter can be a good one from which they are excluded. Her favourite subject is politics, and upon that well-worn theme she enunciates opinions which, however carefully and well considered, yet contain nothing so novel or striking as to make them compensate for the story that the reader expects. As a sample of this, we extract her observations on the characters of Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Gladstone, who are figured respectively as Dwarris and Harward:—

“Dwarris, born of an alien race, without the help of circumstance or fortune, has become the leader of the proud Conservative aristocracy of the country. He has moulded like wax the least pliable of material; he has led blindfolded the least trustful of men. Success has never intoxicated, as defeat has never depressed him. Owing all to individual effort, he has never worshipped his fellows. Men have been to him as puppets, ideas as sacred laws. Few men have been more conscious of their own powers, and few more ready to appreciate genius in others. With an inborn love of Imperialism—born of his blood and poetical fancy,—he has caused his name to be associated with sweeping popular, almost Radical, measures. Cut off by birth from inheriting the glorious traditions of our country, he has been chosen as the champion of that goodly heritage; the best judge of his time of the variable temper of the English people, he has despised whilst he has profited by it; a man of iron will and great resources, he has never attempted to coerce like Wellington, or to humour like Palmerston. A man whom many distrust, few love, but many admire,—a man whose career has been marked with many scintillations from his cold, clear intellect, but never lighted by the warm glow of simple feeling,—he stands the embodiment of intellectual success, at once above and beneath his compeers.” “Dwarris is too astute to be ungrateful. It is your foolish man who kicks the ladder down and burns his boats behind him. Your wise one will look to the bridge which he may need to recross. If Dwarris ever leaves services unrewarded, it is because they have been seeming only and not substantial.”—“Dwarris has sometimes appeared to me like a boat-bridge that rises and falls with the tide; whilst Harward is like a granite or stone structure.”—“Therein lies one of his faults. There is a kind of mental and moral angularity about him. He cannot adapt himself to circumstances. He will load a cannon to shoot a fly!”—“But he will shoot his fly effectually.”—“Granted; but it is a waste of power.”—“I don’t see that when a strong man does even a small thing as a giant, and not as a pigmy, he of necessity lays himself open to that accusation.”—“My dear fellow, don’t you know that it is not the man who possesses the most strength, but the one who uses it the most skilfully, who wins the prize?”—“Well, after such encomiums on Dwarris, I can hardly expect you have many blessings to bestow on Harward.”—“They are sundered as far as the Poles,” replied Edmonds, speaking with increased enthusiasm; “they are light and darkness. Harward has got a larger brain than his opponent, but not of such a subtle character. He is a man to ‘survey mankind from China to Peru,’ whose far-reaching glance can take in empires and centuries with equal ease; but can overlook the potent power of the man on the other side of the table. He is a man of intense feeling, which, some might say, occasionally overleaps his prudence. He possesses much of that highest kind of brain-power we call genius; but little of the valuable cunning of talent and tact. Like all men of genius, feeling enters largely into all his views, which, while it enhances the dignity of the man, detracts from his value as a successful politician. Unlike his great adversary, who is of all men the most pachydermatous, he quivers under every pin-prick. He is weighted with an excessive sensibility, and all the world sees when the arrow goes home. But, to balance that, there is a soul of perfect truth and fearless honesty. He is more apt to be swayed by what he feels is the need of the people—what will be for their permanent good—than by their wishes; hence his uncertain popularity. He has not got the winning personal attraction of Palmerston, but he is a man of broader views and higher attainments. He most resembles the great Sir Robert Peel, not only in the intense earnestness and positive conviction which underlie his every action, but also in his private attributes. Harward is a man who is hated by some, worshipped by a few, and honoured by many.”—“I see you are a little more impressed by Dwarris’s brilliant genius than by the more solid virtues of your own chief.”—“That is pardonable. Harward is not a dazzling man; and you must remember I am only a superficial political student, and Dwarris’s attractions are precisely those which attract the light thinker. Harward one thinks of as part of the system, surrounded and supported by other natures kindred to his own; but Dwarris stands alone, like the sphinx of an Eastern desert, alike unmoved under the fiercest and most pitiless storm of calumny, as under the full light of a noon-day sun of success.”

The small amount of story introduced is too much broken up, as there are no less than four pairs of lovers whose fortunes are supposed to be followed. But it is impossible to do this satisfactorily in the very small space that can be spared to each one. When a two-volume novel is half taken up with extraneous matter, and the remainder attempts to deal with as many characters as does this book, there is evidently no room to make any one of them interesting, for the reader never gets to know them well enough for his sympathies to be enlisted on their behalf. Who amongst all the people in Under Sunny Skies are meant to be leading lady and gentleman, is a difficult matter to say; all have a tendency to be lay figures, or wind-bags letting themselves out in words, rather than real flesh and blood, and none of them give the impression of being in earnest about the sentiments that flow glibly from their lips; consequently, there is no genuine passion in the pages. The most life-like and least wooden character is a coquette, who captivates and makes a fool of a green young man, and the short episode devoted to this is well enough. Another heroine is Chlorinde, an actress whose ambition prompts her to marry a gentleman for his rank and wealth, though her heart is given to a working-man who is a Radical agitator. On the verge of attaining the object of her ambition, she pauses to count the cost, and recalls the story of a woman pursued by wolves when driving through a forest with her children, and casting them one by one to the fierce beasts, in hope of gaining time to save some. In this tale Chlorinde sees an allegory of herself and all who struggle for success in life, and her application of it seems worth quoting:—

“I take, for instance, a young and gifted man, who is conscious of great powers within him; and even in early days, if he sets success before him as the object to be attained, the sacrifices begin. He sees his comrades go by to the dance whilst he sits alone and studies. The bright eyes, the laughter, the music, and the dance appeal just as strongly to him as to the gay revellers from whom, though his heart yearns for their companionship, his habits separate him. Then, as he advances in life, his progress is impeded by those dear things which Nature meant to sweeten our lives—the homely friendship of some man, the tender love of some woman. They are gradually but firmly put aside, because the friend or lover has not those social recommendations which are so necessary for the advancement of his successful career. He cultivates men who are alien to his soul; he smiles on women in whom he recognises no divinity; he cuts himself free from the old moorings, and, leaving the humble mill-pond, he ventures out on to the broad sea, and those old loves and old friendships weight him too heavily; so, like a prudent sailor, he lightens cargo,—he casts his darlings to the wolves.” “He reaches the goal for which he aimed—he is through the forest—he is within his castle gates, and the wolves are howling in the far distance. Something, doubtless, he finds sweet in the cup of success the world’s Ganymedes offer to his lips; but what has he lost by the way? We hear the shouts of those who welcome him; the world brays a loud hosanna; and the fair and the brave gather round his table; but I see him alone—my successful man—and I see his eye traverse regretfully the old ground, wondering who has gathered the blossoms that had bloomed in vain for him. He thinks a little remorsefully of the path which he has trodden; over the neglected friendships; over the rejected loves,—yea! perhaps over his soul’s honour. How clear has he kept his integrity in the fight!—the struggle was keen, and it may be, a too punctilious honour was one of the things which held him back. Let us not pry too closely. I know he has cast his darlings to the wolves!”

One pair of lovers, who are drowned together, are so profoundly uninteresting that no one can feel the least thrill of emotion in reading of their sad fate. As for the fourth heroine, she has no pretensions to the title except that she is the destiny of the narrator of the story (which is autobiographical in form); for though she is spoken of as being perfect, yet she has no opportunity of displaying any of her perfections. We must remark, in conclusion, that when dialogues run on long without mentioning the names of the speakers, the reader is sure to get confused as to who says what; Under Sunny Skies sins considerably in this way, and contains one or two conversations where, even at the beginning, the name of the speaker is not given.

EARLY LAW AND CUSTOM.*

SIR HENRY MAINE’S work always carries with it the prestige arising out of great literary achievement. In his volume upon Ancient Law, in which he took the Roman Law as his text, he invested ancient legal institutions with a totally new significance by tracing the development, modification, and survival of the ideas which those institutions embodied. It was not one nationality, but civilised society, which seemed to become animated by a single and continuous life, as he showed its relation to a few primitive legal conceptions. In carrying his researches farther backwards, and in dealing as he has since done, and as he does in parts of the volume upon Early Law and Custom now before us, with social phenomena which preceded the formation of positive law, his labour undoubtedly becomes more difficult. Yet the result of it is scarcely less valuable. The student will still admire the author's resolute adherence to the historical method in a region of inquiry offering the greatest temptation to theory and conjecture, the wide range of his vision over the whole domain of history and law, and the keen penetration with which he associates and interprets facts apparently the most widely severed, and which enables him to discuss some problems affecting the origin of human society with the same skill, if not with the same confidence, that he evinced in dealing with the Edicts of the Prætors. At the same time, it is still rather by the lucidity and precision of his thought, than by any elaboration or display of learning, that he inspires confidence in his conclusions. The extent of his acquirement is, indeed, almost hidden by the literary skill by which he commends his subject to the general reader. So easily may the latter follow him as entirely to forget the greatness of the labour involved in the examination and comparison of primitive ideas and institutions, as these appear from the ancient records of almost every civilisation which has existed in three continents.

A connection of some kind between the earliest written law and religion is suggested to us by the one sacred literature with which we are all most familiar. Sir Henry Maine begins his book by an inquiry into the nature of this connection as it appears from the Sacred Books of the Hindus. The advantages attending the pursuit of the inquiry in the field which he has chosen are that the Sanskrit literature suggests the actual stages of the process by which religious speculation and observance may transform themselves into positive law. Although the bond connecting a man's future condition with his present conduct was conceived of, according to the religious system of the Brahmans, as absolute and inevitable, their system was not sufficiently logical to exclude the idea of repentance; and penance,—torture self-inflicted here, in order to avoid worse misery hereafter,—occupied an important place in their teaching. It was not that they were unaware of the logical difficulty. Some authorities doubted the efficacy of penance to restore an erring man to his former state, "because," says Gautama, one of the most ancient books, "the deed shall not perish"; but the most excellent opinion is that he shall perform a penance." A man, however, may fairly have required something more than an "excellent opinion" to induce him to enclose himself in a hollow iron case, after lighting a fire on either side of it, with a view to burning himself to death, or to undergo the other equally hideous and tedious operations of self-torture prescribed as penances by the Brahmans; and their teaching and authority might have been rather weakened than supported by their elaborate doctrine of penances, but for the transformation which turned penance into punishment, and in which the author finds one important connecting-link between religious teaching and civil law:—

"How, then, does what we should call law—that is, law, civil or criminal, enforced by sanctions or penalties to be inflicted in this world—first make its appearance in these books? It appears in connection with the personage whom we call the King. His authority is more or less assumed to exist in the oldest of these treatises; but all taken together, they suggest that the alliance between the King and the Brahmans was very gradually formed. . . . In what appears to me to be the most ancient portions of these books, the King is only represented as the auxiliary of the spiritual director. He is to complete and enforce penances. 'If any persons,' says Apastamba (ii., v. 10-13), 'transgress the order of their spiritual director, he shall take them before the King. The King shall consult his domestic priest, who should be learned in the law and in the art of governing. He shall order them to perform the proper penance, if they are Brahmans, and reduce them to reason by forcible means, except corporal punishment and servitude; but men of other castes the King, after examining their actions, may punish, even by death.' In a later treatise (Vishnu, iii., 2), the duties of a King are summed-up in two rules,—he is to protect his people; he is to keep the four castes, and the four orders of Student, Householder, Hermit, and Ascetic, in the practice of their several duties; or, in other words, he is to enforce the whole social and religious system as conceived by the sacerdotal lawyers. The further progress of change consists in the further exaltation of the personage who, in the passage from Apastamba, is called the King's domestic priest. In the end, the law-books come to contemplate an ideal tribunal composed of the King, with learned Brahmans as assessors."

A great part of the positive law which is contained in the Sacred Books, and the growth of which is thus accounted for, was, no doubt, the direct creation of a sacerdotal class, utilising and stereotyping for its own purpose the elementary instincts and traditionary practices of primitive society. In the practice of ancestor-worship, for instance, so widely prevalent amongst uncivilised mankind, and in the mysterious tie supposed to exist between the dead father of the household and his living successor, the Brahmans found a field for their activity similar to that which the later priests of another religion found in the doctrine of masses for the dead. Human instinct prompted such a use of the property of the dead man as would benefit him in the world to which he had gone; and the law of inheritance, in the hands of the Brahmans, became a law for securing a successor who would provide for the performance of the ancestral rites to the satisfaction of the religious officials. It is obvious, however, that law, in the sense of some system of recognised and enforceable custom or observance, must be older than either royalty or sacerdotalism, and cannot have been created by Brahmans; for the origin of law in this sense must be concurrent with the origin of society. Some system of customary law must have preceded, and been absorbed by, the Brahmanical codes; and Sir Henry Maine thinks that the customary law of the Punjab represents the earliest Hindu institutions, before they were subjected to the sacerdotal influence. But the effect of this influence, where it existed, would be to transform the customary law, if not to destroy it; for local usage would assume a totally new character when incorporated into the written formularies of a system based on the privileges of a sacred class, and enforced by the most powerful of all possible sanctions,—punishments inflicted by a king. Nothing, indeed, could suggest more clearly than these researches the nature of the process by which the three most obvious factors in early civilisation,—priestly influence, royal authority, and popular feeling as expressed in primitive customary observances,—acted and reacted upon one another, until one became dominant; although in no other case has the process resulted in a triumph for the priests similar to that obtained by the Brahmans.

In the Western world, or at least in the Teutonic part of it, the authority of the king established itself without any similar dependence upon sacerdotalism; and, as illustrative of this, we would, but for the limits of our space, gladly quote at length from the author's striking chapter upon "The King and Early Civil Justice." He shows us here the king, in contact, not with priests, but with the primitive popular assembly, which in the earliest records of many societies is found existing side by side with the king, and dividing authority, especially judicial authority, with him; and the law of development suggested is that in communities dwelling in walled cities, and of which Athens and Rome are the most striking examples, the popular assembly gradually monopolises power, to the exclusion of the king, whose office becomes formal or extinct; whilst in the case of communities spread in villages over a great area of country, the king's authority grows whilst popular freedom wanes, the burden involved in the right and duty of the freeman to attend the popular court or assembly as legislator and judge increasing indefinitely by the mere physical obstacle of distance. "Much of ancient freedom," he says, "was lost through the vastness of the payment in person which it demanded." Even in our own country, where the difficulty was partly alleviated at an early date by the beginning of a representative system—the delegation of the Reeve and Fourmen of the village to attend the local court—the burden was acutely felt; and the substitution of the king's justice for the popular justice not only tended to lessen this burden, but was accompanied by further advantages of a very obvious kind. The king, as seen by the example of our own Plantagenets, was for a long time an itinerant personage; and when he ceased to be so, he was represented by the itinerant justices, who still exist in our judges of assize. Further, it was only in the hands of the king and of the experts who accompanied him that the law could assume any sort of system or uniformity; and lastly, it was only the king's decrees which were certain of execution, for the popular local courts, in the inadequacy of their process for execution, inherited a weakness arising out of their origin. The orders or resolutions of primitive courts were frequently declarations of right or custom, rather than decrees to which obedience could be compelled, and it is certainly to the power of the king that we owe our own conception of law, as carrying with it a sanction that makes it irresistible.

We have but briefly referred to one or two only of the inquiries of which this book is the outcome. The reader will find, in the discussion of the Salic Law and its relation to such modern difficulties as that affecting the royal succession in Afghanistan, in the description of the Slavonian house communities as showing the survival of the most ancient social group larger than the family, and in other subjects presented to him, matter of equally absorbing interest. To have the facts and records of primitive society made luminous, and to see the light which they throw upon the historical growth of nations widely separated in space and time, and even upon modern political and legal systems, are pleasures with which Sir Henry Maine's readers are familiar, and which they are not likely to miss in his latest volume.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Living London, being Echoes Re-echoed. By George Augustus Sala. (Remington and Co.)—Mr. Sala, it is needless to say, is a journalist by profession. He is proud of his occupation, although he sees its weak points, and observes that "your appreciation of a grand Court show is not enhanced by the consciousness that when the pomps and vanities are over, you have to hurry up to London and make three columns and a half of printed matter out of that which could very fitly be narrated in fifty lines." There can be no doubt that Mr. Sala's journalistic work would be more interesting, were it more compressed. For a well-known illustrated journal he is in the habit of writing weekly three columns of gossip and about a column of theatrical criticism. The bulky volume entitled Living London is a reprint of this criticism and gossip for 1882. The book is an extraordinary production, when thus viewed as a whole, and it is a pity that, amidst the frank utterances of the "introductory" chapter, Mr. Sala did not tell his readers how this olla podrida should be tasted. To read it consecutively is, of course, impossible. On any topic of the day or on any subject that occurs to him, the writer jots down opinions, and facts carefully garnered up in common-place books. He is weak in literature, and rarely intrudes purely literary topics; he is strong, though, perhaps, a little prejudiced, when he writes of the drama; and he turns with evident pleasure to the derivation of words, illustrations of folk-lore, and the noble art of cockery. From the first page to the last, as readers of his weekly causeries well know, Mr. Sala is distinctly, but not unpleasantly, egotistical. He tells us about himself and about his friends, about his correspondence and about his dinners; how much he dislikes Bank Holidays, how little he has travelled in England and how much upon the Continent; and how on Friday, May 26th, he went to the Oaks on the top of a coach, and made the drive down in less than two hours. "I know," he says, "that I put my money (it was very little) on a four-legged something, and lost it,—I mean my money. I always do. Nor think me insincere in saying that I know nothing about the race itself. I was looking at the lobster-salad." No incident, indeed, that concerns the writer is too trifling to be chronicled in these Echoes; and he is good enough to inform us that though he has been writing for the Press ever since the days of his youth, he has "never had time to master even the rudiments of English grammar." Judging from his writings and confessions, the author is not, as we have hinted, already, a man of letters. His judgment on cookery or heraldry carries weight, his opinion of a great poem or history is of no special significance, yet his vocation is one demanding a large library, and Mr. Sala seems to have innumerable dictionaries, cookery books, medical books, illustrated catalogues, and a collection of works on tithes, and confesses to buying "upper-shelf books," namely, books which are purchased in order to fill up shelves. He does not profess, he tells us, to know anything of English poetry, and when his "esteemed friend" Mr. Locker sent him the last edition of "London Lyrics," he had the little volume sumptuously bound, with the intention of reading it all,—when he can find time. Not the least remarkable feature of the volume are the curious illustrations with which its pages abound.

Memoir of Sir Charles Reed. By his Son, Charles E. B. Reed, M.A. (Macmillan.)—The useful life of Sir Charles Reed well deserved the record which the filial piety of his son, regulated always by excellent judgment and taste, has here given to the world. From early youth he devoted no little part of his time and strength to the work of education; and in this work he did excellent service. The policy of the London School Board, a policy which sorely-burdened ratepayers have, on the whole, approved, owed much to his exertions, first as vice-chairman under Lord Lawrence, and secondly as chairman. This was the most important part that Sir Charles Reed had to play in his life; but he was consistently devoted to useful and conscientious work. At the same time, he had energy enough to build up for himself a very solid fabric of commercial success. And he never lacked the leisure for the cultivation of refined and intellectual tastes. Personally, he seems to have won the affection of all with whom he came into contact. Altogether, this is an attractive picture of an honest, energetic, large-hearted man. He made mistakes, indeed. In company with the vast majority of Nonconformists, he began by protesting against the State aid to education which he afterwards found to be indispensable. But he had the manliness to own and to repair his errors. And he never failed in tolerance and charity. An appendix to the Memoir gives Sir Charles Reed's statement, made to the School Board in September, 1880, in which he gave a summary of the work done by the Board from its foundation up to that date.

Miss Beauchamp: a Philistine. By Constance McEwen. 3 vols. (Chapman and Hall.)—The reading of this book, or, at least, of as much of it as we could manage, has left little impression besides a languid wonder why the heroine is described as "a Philistine." She seems to have had quite different qualities. She was highly æsthetic, had in particular a marvellous gift of recitation, and was generally a highly romantic person. She makes a love-match on the very best principles, and is generally, we should say, a very model of all that "Philistines" are not. As for the story, it is about the thinnest and most unmeaning that we have ever found filling, or trying to fill, three volumes. Diana Beauchamp, anxious to clear her ancestral estate by the exercise of her gift of recitation, goes to a certain entrepreneur, a Mr. Cantilupe. Mr. Cantilupe falls madly in love with her; but she marries a more congenial spirit, Sir Blaise Pascal. Sir Blaise is, conveniently for the development of the story, an Irish landlord. Mr. Cantilupe whispers to his tenantry that he is an oppressor, and he is murdered. The murderer dies penitent, and Lady Pascal remains faithful to the memory of her husband. That is about all, and how it is spun out into some seven or eight hundred pages, is more than we can say.

Babrius. With Introductory Dissertations, &c. By W. Gunion Rutherford, M.A. (Macmillan and Co.)—We do not think that the doubt, which may possibly suggest itself as to whether Babrius is worth the trouble which has been here bestowed upon him, will survive even a cursory inspection of Mr. Rutherford's work. It cannot but be a great gain to have so admirable an exercise in scholarship, even were the subject-matter of less literary value than it may safely be allowed to be. The first dissertation deals with the versification of Babrius, and acutely points out that in this we see a clear proof of his really Latin origin. The Babrian metre is the scæzon, and it is written on principles which can be clearly traced in Latin writers of this rhythm. Both the usage in respect of feet and the usage in respect of accent are, Mr. Rutherford points out, clearly Latin. The second dissertation deals with the "History of Greek Fable," and, we are glad to see, reinstates our old friend Æsop in the position of a real person. If this is the most interesting of the four preliminary chapters in the book, the most valuable is that which treats of the "Language of Babrius." It will be a new sensation to many, who are sufficiently well acquainted with Greek, to find an author's vocabulary and construction analysed with this subtle skill. A chapter on the text, a running commentary on the text, and a carefully-constructed "Lexicon Græcitatæ Babrianæ," complete what is really a model edition. We hope that the well-deserved promotion which has come to Mr. Rutherford since the publication of this book will not have the result of withdrawing him from the fields of literature.

The Annual Register, New Series, 1882 (Rivingtons), contains its usual supply of information, an account of "English" and of "Foreign" history, constituting together "Part I." and "Part II.," with its various items of "Chronicle of Events," "Retrospect of Literature, Science, and Art," "Obituaries," and details of official matters.

Wanderings in a Wild Country; or, Three Years among the Cannibals of New Britain. By Wilfred Powell. (Sampson Low and Co.)—New Britain lies off the north-east coast of New Guinea, and has the better known Solomon Islands to its south-east. Mr. Powell paid a long visit to it, for purposes of trade, as we gather, though he is not very definite in his statements on this point; and in this book he has recorded his experiences. The people of New Britain are cannibals of the worst kind. We have seldom read anything more horrible than Mr. Powell's account of the cannibal feast, at which he was compelled to see a man tortured, killed, cooked, and eaten before his eyes. He attempted first to purchase the poor wretch, and then to put him out of his misery, but was not permitted to do so. "If you shoot him," he was told, "the people will think that he is poisoned." We are quite prepared to approve, when we come to the most interesting part of the book, the campaign of Mr. Brown, Wesleyan Missionary, against the cannibal chief Tarlily. There was much indignation expressed at the time at this gentleman's action, but Mr. Powell has a good deal to say in his favour. Tarlily had eaten four of his teachers, and declared that he meant to eat them all, with Mr. Brown himself, and all the other white men in the island. The only terms that he offered were that Mr. Brown should give up the wives and children of the murdered teachers. It would require a very thorough-going "peace-at-any-price" partisan to recommend this. To leave the island was impossible. To sit still was to court destruction, for all natives alike would have deserted. To take the offensive was the only alternative. War accordingly was made, in the regular style. Every village was burnt that had been concerned in the murder or the feast, and the plain trees cut down (this last seems unnecessary, but is, we suppose, an integral part of a New-Britain campaign). The enemy paid an emphatic tribute to the vigour of the proceedings. "We did not know," they said, when asked why they had not paid the fine before their villages were destroyed; "it was not fighting,—it was an earthquake." Mr. Powell is inclined to think that the labour trade is not so bad as has been represented; still, he is in favour of giving greater police powers to the Queen's ships.

The Story of Helena Modjeska. By Mabel Collins. (W. H. Allen and Co.)—This book has, in part at least, the look of an autobiography. Miss Collins has evidently had the advantage of hearing from Madame Modjeska ("Modjeska" is a compromise, conceded to the weakness of non-Slavonic tongues, of the true "Modrzejewska") a full account of her early years, and of what has happened behind the scenes, so to speak, of her dramatic career. She has added the result of her own observations, observations which have produced a very earnest—and, we should suppose, a well-deserved—admiration of her friend's character. The result is a remarkably interesting book, suggesting a comparison, in which there is also no little contrast, with the reminiscences which "Miss Fanny Kemble" has given to us of her own theatrical life. Madame Modjeska, though she had from early years a strong passion for the stage, did not act till after her marriage. Her first attempt was of the humblest kind,—nothing like the first appearance of Miss Kemble at Drury Lane in the character of Juliet. She was one of a very small provincial company, and "had but two dresses, a black one which she wore for tragedy, and a white one for comedy." These early difficulties make amusing reading in Miss Collins's narrative; every detail is vivid and truthful. By degrees, Madame Modjeska attracted attention. Before long, her success was so decided that the manager of the Warsaw theatre proposed to her a contract "for the whole of her life." This singular arrangement she accepted, and is apparently bound by it to the present day, though she can get, it would seem, protracted leave of absence. At Warsaw, Madame Modjeska began to act Shakespeare, translated, of course, into Polish. In course of time circumstances made life at Warsaw unpleasant, and her husband (she was by this time married a second time) resolved to try the experiment of life in the New World. Madame Modjeska accordingly left the stage for a Californian farm. The farm was not a success, partly because there was no rain, chiefly because the farmers knew nothing of their business. Successful or no, it could not have kept the great actress long from the work of her life. But she had now a great task before her. She had to learn English well enough to act in it. It was probably less of a difficulty to a Pole than it would have been to a Frenchwoman, but it was no trifling undertaking, and it speaks volumes for her energy and ability that she should have succeeded in it so completely. Succeed she did, and had a most triumphant tour through the United States. Since then she has appeared with great success in London. Miss Collins tells us some curious things about her acting. "She will sit upon the stage writing a letter which appears to break her heart, giving utterance to sobs of despair, with the tears falling down her face. She conveys to the audience the real, terrible spectacle of a suffering woman writing words that cost her agony; while upon the paper that lies before her she draws funny caricatures, and all sorts of queer things." Yet when she acts in the Dame aux Camélias (a favourite play with her, strangely enough, for so exemplary a woman) she must not be spoken to, so terribly in earnest is she. Altogether, this is a very interesting book.

Love's Empire. 3 vols. (Tinsley Brothers.)—We suppose that this book is intended for a social and political satire, and we see that the scene is laid in India. Beyond this supposition and this statement we should not like to venture, except, indeed, to say that, in a tolerably extended experience of books, we have seldom found anything so unreadable.

We have received Volume IV. of The Students' Encyclopædia. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—Volume I. of The Pulpit Commentary, edited by the Rev. H. D. M. Spence, M.A., and the Rev. J. S. MODERN LANG. TRIPOS. NEWS OF THE WEEK.

ONE of the most fearful catastrophes of a generation rich in catastrophes took place in the beautiful island of Ischia, in the Bay of Naples, last Saturday, when an earthquake destroyed the towns of the island, and buried some 3,000 persons at least, in their ruins,—many compute the dead alone at 4,000. It was about half-past nine in the evening; the theatre was open in Casamicciola, and the curtain had just drawn up; in the chief hotel a Welsh gentleman—who perished,—was playing a “funeral march,” when suddenly a shock brought down most of the walls in the island; a visitor in his room on the fourth story of the hotel found himself wounded and bleeding in the street; in the theatre there was a confused heap of human beings, and the flaming oil of the petroleum lamps was running all over the benches; the ground rose and fell as if it were sea; and the shrieks of the dying in the streets, and of the mothers who feared that their husbands or children were killed, made one vast and frightful confusion. Even yesterday there had been, at the end of six days, no complete exhumation of the living and the dead, and the decomposition had been so rapid that latterly the civilians had refused to proceed with it, and the duty was left to the soldiers. Hundreds of injured and mutilated persons had been removed to Naples, but for every injured person saved there seem to have been four or five buried under the ruins of the little Ischian towns. Ischia was this year quite the favourite watering-place of the Roman nobles, and amongst the victims of the earthquake are a great many distinguished Italian families.

King Humbert visited the scene of misery on Wednesday, distributing relief to the utmost of his ability, and showing his sympathy freely and cordially, in spite of the fears of his Ministers, who had some reason to dread that some of the many tottering walls not yet level with the ground might fall on him. On Wednesday and Thursday, a dozen people who had been buried alive by the earthquake were disinterred, still living, though they had been four or five days under the ruins, a man of eighty amongst them. An Englishman living in Ischia, Mr. Nesbit, seems to have thrown himself into the work of assisting his poor neighbours with true devotion, and to have received the personal thanks of King Humbert for his exertions. The misery remaining amidst the pestilential ruins is even more heartrending than the harvest of death itself. And the trouble due to positive want is very pressing. Mr. C. E. Mudie, of Muswell Hill, London, N., the Chairman of the well-known Library Company, tells us that he shall be very glad to receive and acknowledge English subscriptions for the sufferers.

James Carey, the Irish informer, was assassinated on board the ‘Melrose,’ between Cape Town and Port Elizabeth, last Sunday, the 29th July, by an Irishman who gives his name as O'Donnell. In writing three weeks ago we pointed out the great difficulty of keeping Carey's identity unknown in any part of the world where Englishmen and Irishmen go, and especially the additional difficulty which the presence of his wife and children with him would involve. It is pretty clear that the police made a very serious mistake in allowing him to travel with his wife and family to the Cape, if they wanted to secure his incognito. The passengers on board the ‘Kinfauns Castle,’—the vessel in which he travelled to the Cape,—had, it is said, guessed his true name and story, in consequence of the presence of his wife and seven children; and O'Donnell, who was with them, declares that he secured his own passage by the ‘Melrose’ from Cape Town to Port Elizabeth on purpose that he might kill him. He declares, indeed, that it was only at Cape Town that he discovered who his fellow-passenger had been, but that is not quite consistent with the story which he is said to have told in London before his departure, as to the importance of the mission on which he was sent. He discharged three shots at Carey, who died crying out that O'Donnell had shot him. O'Donnell was at once arrested, and as his crime was committed on the high seas, it is believed that he will be sent back to England for trial.

The news was received by the lower part of the population of Dublin with savage joy. On Tuesday night, bonfires were lighted in the streets, and people danced round them, expressing in some instances their delight that Carey was in Hell. His part had certainly been sufficiently infamous, but the plot he had unveiled was infamous also, as well as most cruel, and the exultation of the Irish people in his assassination and his penal sufferings would hardly be so fiercely vindictive as it is if they did not look upon that infamous and cruel plot with something of positive sympathy or admiration. A mean and hypocritical informer of a singularly debased type must be regarded everywhere with horror; but if the crime which he brought to light had been felt to be loathsome, there would not be this fiendish rejoicing over his murder, and over those worse and endless sufferings of which it is assumed that his death is but the beginning. Every link in his horrid story, from the plots he laid to the plots he betrayed and the ferocious joy which his death has elicited, is a sensible addition to the dreary evidence of human depravity and malignity.

There is a rumour, we hope untrue, that another witness in the Phoenix Park murder trials, Mr. Mottley, a Dublin hatter, who was not an informer, but gave evidence that he had seen Kelly standing by the car of the murderers, has been murdered in Philadelphia, for his evidence. Mr. Trevelyan did not confirm the statement on Thursday night, and we hope it is false. It would be base, indeed, to assassinate an independent witness, who merely gave evidence of a foul crime, which the law positively compelled him to give.

A discussion arose on Thursday as to the desirability of proceeding with the National Debt Bill, Mr. Hubbard and Mr. W. H. Smith warmly asserting that there was no longer time to discuss the Bill with the care that it required. But Mr. Gladstone replied that, reluctant as he should be to press on the House at that late day a measure for which the majority of the House and the majority in the country did not feel the most cordial wish, his strong impression was that there is this widespread wish for the National Debt Bill, and that its principles at least are adopted by both Conservatives and Liberals. The silence of Sir Stafford Northcote gave consent to this view of the case, and, in reality, no one is more deeply pledged to the policy of beginning in earnest to attack the Debt, than the leader of the Opposition. We earnestly hope, therefore, that this Bill will be pressed and carried. The Long Annuities expire in 1885, and it would be in the highest degree foolish to leave to the chances of next year,—with its inevitable Reform-Bill quarrels,—the prudent provision which Liberals are bound to make for diminishing the burden to be handed down to our children. Mr. Childers, we are confident, will be firm on this cardinal feature of his finance.

Sir Stafford Northcote's motion for an address to her Majesty, praying her not to recognise any claim of the Suez Canal Company to such a monopoly of water communication between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea as would exclude the possibility of competition on the part of other Companies, was moved in the House of Commons on Monday, and defended by Sir Stafford Northcote in a speech of extreme moderation,—not to use a stronger phrase, such as want of heart. Sir Stafford did not profess to argue against the moral claim of the Company to every consideration, but only to insist that their legal claim to any monopoly should be denied, in order that there might be a greater "leverage" for reducing the Company to reasonable terms. Sir Stafford used the argument which Mr. Horace Davey had originated, that an "exclusive power" was given to M. de Lesseps only for the formation and management of a universal company, and not to exclude competing schemes from the Isthmus,—though, as Mr. Gladstone afterwards remarked, it was odd that an "exclusive power" should be given to M. de Lesseps to do what, if Sir Stafford Northcote's interpretation were correct, everybody had an equally exclusive power to do, since either Sir Stafford Northcote or himself might have set on foot a universal company, without any grant at all from the ruler of Egypt. Sir Stafford Northcote also declared that till last September there was no trace of M. de Lesseps having claimed any exclusive power, such as the British Government had apparently attributed to him in its recent negotiations.

Mr. Norwood, who moved the amendment accepted by the Government, reserving to the House of Commons perfect freedom of judgment, did not deplore the breaking-off of the negotiations, but held that there was plenty of leverage for future arrangements with M. de Lesseps, without taking up Sir Stafford Northcote's position. He himself believed that if M. de Lesseps were not inclined to concede what he ought to the representatives of British commerce, British commerce could find an alternative route for itself,—and he inclined to the route by way of Palestine from Acre, by way of the Jordan and the Dead Sea, to the Gulf of Akabah. In fact, Mr. Norwood altogether underrated the advantages of M. de Lesseps' position, and seemed to think that he would give them up out of pure dread of the persistency and resolution of British commercial men, with their heart set on having their own way.

Mr. Gladstone commented with great force on Sir Stafford Northcote's very inconsistent contention, first, that there is no political danger in a frank discussion of this question,—that it is a mere question of arrangement between the British Government on one side and a private company on the other;—and next, that high political and international considerations are at stake, like Lord Salisbury's claim of right on behalf of all other nations to interfere in cutting isthmuses against the will of the territorial power, for the good of the world at large. This inconsistent contention only showed, said the Prime Minister, how delicate the ground really is. If such claims had any basis, the British Government would not assert a "pouvoir exclusif" to interfere in this way. For himself, he recognised no possibility of a British canal except on British territory; and, therefore, he was anxious not to use language that might reasonably excite the international susceptibilities of more than one great State. The Government could have accepted with perfect ease Sir Stafford Northcote's motion, which only denied to M. de Lesseps a monopoly of communication between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, instead of raising the question of the exclusive right to pierce the Isthmus of Suez; but they could not accept his speech as equally unobjectionable. The Prime Minister was astonished at the statement that the exclusive claims of the Company had only recently been put forward. In 1872, M. de Lesseps had claimed to interpret his exclusive powers even more widely, and the late Government, who had the records of this claim in the archives of the Foreign Office, passed it over in complete silence when—on political grounds—they purchased the Canal Shares. To Mr. Bourke, who declared that he knew nothing of these papers, Mr. Gladstone replied that Governments were held responsible for acquainting, or failing to acquaint, themselves with important facts recorded in the archives of the Foreign Office, and bearing on their own policy. Mr. Gladstone's contention was, that no Legislature could clear up the law of this matter, or could do anything but commit itself to a disputable view of that law which its meddling in the matter would irritate other national Legislatures into immediately challenging. This was a matter for a Court of Judicature,—prima facie, an Egyptian Court of Judicature,—or if not, then for some great international tribunal representing all the countries concerned in the Suez Canal. The House of Commons could not clear up the matter. It could only stir up the selfish jealousies involved.

In the remainder of the debate, Mr. Cohen argued with great ability for the exclusive rights granted to M. de Lesseps; and Mr. Davey against them, though he supported Mr. Norwood's amendment reserving the freedom of the House of Commons, and denied that a resolution on the subject of the legal rights of the Company passed by the House of Commons could do anything but harm. The Chancellor of the Exchequer explained, in a luminous speech, how the Government had been forced by the pressure of the shipowners and merchants into the position of either lending their influence to a competitive scheme infringing M. de Lesseps's asserted rights, or co-operating with him for the construction of a new line of canal on the best terms they could extract from him, and had chosen the second course, because they well knew the first to be both dishonest and impolitic, and certain to lead to the complete break-off of the negotiations. Sir Hardinge Giffard reviled the Government for holding the opinion that it was dishonest to deny M. de Lesseps's claims, and Sir Henry James argued the law of the question, showing that the grant to M. de Lesseps was rather analogous to the grant of power to hold a fair or to exercise a franchise,—a kind of grant necessarily exclusive so long as it lasts,—than the grant of a monopoly, and that it could not be withdrawn during the time for which it was made, except on evidence that the Company was not duly fulfilling the conditions of the grant. Sir Stafford Northcote's motion was defeated by 283 votes against 183,—majority, 99; and Mr. Norwood's amendment was then agreed to.

At the French Academy of Sciences on Monday, M. de Lesseps presented a volume of M. Marius Fontane's "Universal History," entitled, "The Asiatics," to the Academy, and seized the occasion to make a very ingenious speech on the Phœnician element in English civilisation, and the liability that element has brought with it to "outbursts of covetousness," "which are unjust, and even threatening to human progress." It is to the Asiatic, or rather to the Phœnician, element in England that M. de Lesseps ascribes the tendency to these outbursts of covetousness. But that, perhaps, is only because he wanted to remark in conclusion that "the strong Anglo-Saxon race always ends by overcoming any unhealthy agitation, in order to return to the side of equity, and to labour for its triumph." We fear that this rhetorical mode of putting the matter does injustice to Asiatics, and too much justice to Anglo-Saxons. If there is a tendency to outbursts of covetousness in us at all, we suspect it is the Anglo-Saxon, not the imaginary Phœnician in the disguise of the Anglo-Saxon, who is subject to them, though it is also the Anglo-Saxon who conquers these arrogances of the commercial spirit. The Phœnician blood in us is exceedingly hypothetical.

The Administration of Egypt appears to be quite incompetent to deal with the cholera, and, indeed, with almost all other questions, in any sense satisfactory to European criticism. In truth, the position of Egypt, exposed as it is to European criticism, and administered as it is by Native statesmen on principles wholly inconsistent with European assumptions, proves to be quite untenable. The cholera is now diminishing in violence almost everywhere, though more and more of the English troops are attacked; indeed, we suppose that by this time in some hundred cases the disease has proved mortal to our soldiers. Otherwise, as we said, the epidemic is on the decline, though 275 deaths occurred on Wednesday at Cairo. Nevertheless, the attempts of the Native Government to deal with the epidemic on scientific principles have been utterly futile, and they have ended in Lord Granville sending out English doctors to direct the sanitary measures. That is, we fear, how all such efforts must end. If Oriental Governments attempt to apply principles which they do not understand, to please a distant Government on which they are dependent, they will always fail; and the result will be that the foreign Government must interfere more and more.

A crowded meeting was held in Willis's Rooms on Wednesday, under the presidency of Mr. Bright, to support Lord Ripon's Indian policy in relation to what is called the Ilbert Bill,—the Bill permitting a few Native Judges who are members of the Covenanted Civil Service, i.e., who have been educated here and gone back to India under the same conditions as our own Indian Civil Servants,—to try Europeans accused of crimes, a power which they do not at present possess. Mr. Bright explained the object of the measure, showing that it was a very small step in the direction of the policy adopted in 1833, and developed in 1858, for removing all those official disabilities under which persons of native race in India may stand. Mr. Bright, having stated the case, Mr. Lal Mohun Ghose addressed the meeting on the subject, strongly supporting Lord Ripon's measure; and then Mr. Forster followed in the same line, declaring his belief that a good deal of the opposition to this small measure had arisen from the fear excited by Lord Ripon's policy in encouraging local self-government in India. Mr. Forster defended the principle of the Ilbert Bill as a necessary application of our deliberately announced Indian policy; and this we have fully recognised, though we have doubted whether the proper moment had arrived for abolishing the personal right of Europeans to be judged by Europeans. An impressive speech was made by Dr. Markby, formerly Judge of the High Court at Calcutta, in favour of the Bill, in which he bore strong testimony to the character of the Native Judges whose colleague he had been. And in the end, the resolution in favour of Lord Ripon's policy was carried unanimously.

A Conservative meeting, to neutralise the effect of the Liberal meeting on the Ilbert Bill, was held in the Town Hall, Limehouse, on Thursday, under the presidency of Mr. Stanhope. Mr. Stanhope's speech was very moderate, insisting rather on the danger that at this moment the Bill will irritate Europeans against Natives, and therefore Natives against Europeans, than on the merits of the issue. Mr. Stanhope says that all the Indian Local Governments were opposed to the Bill, whereas, we believe the truth to be that, in the first instance certainly, all except that of Coorg were in favour of the Bill; and that if they subsequently changed their mind—which we do not know that they did—it was under the influence of caste feeling. Mr. Stanhope says that there is no injustice in excluding Native magistrates from the power of trying Europeans; but in reality that often means refusing all redress to natives injured by Europeans, since no British magistrate is to be found within reach. For British magistrates, too, must, in that case, be reserved all the magistracies of districts where there are British residents, a great injustice to native magistrates. The chief argument urged against the Bill was that the Bill was "at least half a century in advance of its time," an argument which virtually admits that at least half a century hence it will be a right and proper measure. That is our own contention exaggerated. The resolutions against the Bill were not by any means unanimous.

On Friday week, in the House of Commons, the debate on the Indian contribution towards the Egyptian war—which Mr. Gladstone described as a contribution of about one-seventh of its expenses—was brought to a close, and Mr. Onslow's vote of censure on the Government for placing any part of the expense on India—for a vote of censure it was—was defeated by 210 votes to 55. In the course of the debate, Mr. Gladstone, who had to explain that Mr. Onslow's expression of "regret" was, by tradition and usage, a formal vote of censure on the Government, remarked incidentally that it would not, perhaps, be a subject of much regret to himself personally, if it were carried,—meaning, of course, that the resignation of office which it would involve would not be displeasing to him. Possibly not; but even if not personally displeasing to him, we hope it would be politically displeasing to him in the highest degree. His work is not yet done, but only doing; and while the country needs him as much as it still does, it would be well if both he and we could forget altogether the possibility of his retirement. A leader whose retirement is counted upon, has to consider the views of his probable successor more than is consistent with full authority; and there will always be half-loyal followers who will discount the day of his retirement.

The Marquis of Waterford yesterday week opened another aristocratic attack on the Irish Land Act, by a speech in which he assumed that the Lords' Committee,—who had examined the Chief Commissioners and a few Sub-Commissioners, one gentleman who had acted as counsel for the tenants, and thirty-two gentlemen who were either landlords, or landlords' agents, or landlords' solicitors, or landlords' counsel,—had conducted a perfectly fair inquiry, which might be taken as representing adequately the true working of the Act. Of course, the Marquis of Waterford's attack was echoed on all sides by Tory landlords, and replied to chiefly by the members of the Government and one or two independent Peers, like Lord Emly, who made a good speech, and Lord Fitzgerald, who exposed with great force the onesidedness of the Lords' inquiry and the partisan character of the history by which their Lordships' views were coloured. The tilting against the Land Act came to an end, of course, without result,—or rather, with the only result intended, the casting of Tory mud at a piece of legislation which has pacified Ireland, and supplied a tardy reparation to the work of centuries of injustice.

On Saturday last, the French Senate adopted that provision of the new Bill on the Magistracy of France which suspends for three months judicial irremovability, by the small majority of 3,—133 Senators voting for it, and 130 against it. It is, no doubt, true that there are too many Judges in France, and that a reduction of their number by some 500 to 600 will be very beneficial in the end. But to leave to the Executive the power of choosing whom it will suspend is to destroy the prestige of irremovability, and to set an example which it is far from unlikely that a jealous democracy will often urge the French Chambers to follow. It is not denied that the five or six hundred Judges to be selected for removal will be Judges of anti-Republican opinions, and that a solemn example of political interference with the Judiciary is to be set, at the instance of the Legislature. The Judges suspended will be pensioned off; but that is but a small alleviation of the injustice inflicted, and no alleviation at all of the bad precedent set up. It is quite true that, under the Empire, Judges were dismissed without any compensation, and that the Reactionary Cabinet of 1877 dismissed very freely public prosecutors and justices of the peace; but the Republic should have shown itself stronger than the Empire, and than the Reactionary Cabinet of 1877. The next step downwards will be to have elective Judges,—and that is a step which the Chamber has already shown itself willing enough to take.

Captain Webb's body has been found at Lewiston, on the Niagara River, seven miles below the Falls. There was a bad fracture of the skull. But the doctors profess to have discovered that this injury was inflicted after death, and that Captain Webb was not drowned, but suffocated by the force of the Niagara Whirlpool, which, by its pressure on the nerve-centres, robbed him of all power of directing his own motions, and probably of all power of breathing. This may be so, and perhaps it enhances the terrors of the Niagara Whirlpool thus to represent it. But perhaps most human beings would be content to know that Captain Webb's head was fractured by the violence with which he was hurled against the rocks, and would be as much deterred by that catastrophe from following his very mad example, as they would even be by learning that his nerve-centres were so oppressed by the whirlpool that he could neither breathe nor direct his own motions.

On Tuesday, the House took the Report on the English Agricultural Holdings Bill, and struck out, by a majority of 90 (166 against 76), Mr. Balfour's amendment, which had limited compensation under parts one and two of the first schedule (building, reclaiming, irrigating, and draining, &c.), to the outlay actually made. As Mr. C. S. Read well expressed the objection to this amendment of Mr. Balfour's, it really meant that the landlord could say to the tenant, "Heads, I win; tails, you lose; if your improvement succeeds, I get the profit out of it, and you only your outlay; if it does not succeed, you get the loss." With the striking-out of this amendment, however, the Government introduced words stating that in estimating the value of any improvement in these parts of the first schedule, "There shall not be taken into account, as part of the improvement made by the tenant, what is justly due to the inherent capabilities of the soil." That is only fair. Two tenants may make the very same improvements, spending the very same sum upon them, and making them with equal efficiency, while the former may double the yield, and the latter only increase it by 10 per cent. The difference is due, of course, to the inherent properties of the soil, and the difference ought to belong to the landlord. No other important amendment was made, and the Bill was read a third time on Wednesday by the House of Commons. It has now to run the gauntlet of the House of Lords.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE'S DEFEAT.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE would certainly have done much better, had he been content with that portion of glory which no doubt accrued to him in the eyes of the Conservatives, when the Government withdrew the provisional agreement on the Suez Canal, and declined to ask the judgment of Parliament upon it. Up to that time, he was in the position of a leader who has at least inflicted a visible check upon the superior forces of his foe. But in attempting to follow up his slight success, he challenged and encountered a combat the only result of which was a very great defeat for himself, which more or less wiped out the impression of the previous reverse to the Government. On Monday night, the House, by a majority of ninety-nine, rejected Sir Stafford Northcote's motion, not a few voting for the amendment who professed their personal agreement with Sir Stafford Northcote's view, though they would not admit the wisdom of inviting the House of Commons to give in its adhesion to that view. In fact, the resolution which Sir Stafford Northcote proposed had almost every fault that a Parliamentary resolution could have. Its terms, indeed, were susceptible of a harmless interpretation, but then Sir Stafford Northcote supported it by an argument which made it clear that that harmless interpretation was not the interpretation affixed to it by its proposer. As he himself interpreted it, it was an invitation to the House of Commons to interfere in the judicial interpretation of a series of documents for the exposition of which the House of Commons has no special capacity, and in which it could hardly by any possibility be impartial, so that its interpretation, when given, could not command any authority. As the Prime Minister pointed out, if the Legislature of one nation interested in the Suez Canal Company is to be asked to affix its own interpretation to this series of documents, that is setting an example which might well be followed by the Legislatures of other nations also interested in it; and the following of that example by those other Legislatures would lead to a complication of national rivalries and jealousies of the most disastrous kind. Moreover, even if Sir Stafford Northcote's view of the Suez Canal concession were right, the passing of a judicial opinion upon it by the British House of Commons would not conduce to the acceptance of the right view of the matter in the right quarter. As Mr. Gladstone suggested, the only tribunals which could possibly pronounce authoritatively on the legal meaning of the Concession would be either the proper Egyptian tribunals to which a document officially issued by the Egyptian Government would naturally be referred, or else some international tribunal in which all the nations chiefly interested in the Suez Canal are adequately represented. And neither of these tribunals would be likely to be influenced, except, perhaps, unfavourably, by the claim of such a body as the House of Commons to put its own construction on these legal documents. Moreover, as Mr. Childers showed with great force, the reason which compelled the Government to take up, not, indeed, any definite legal position, but a practical position involving the virtual repudiation of Sir Stafford Northcote's view, does not in the least apply to the House of Commons. The Government, urged by the whole commercial community to obtain more convenient arrangements on the Canal, had to choose between two courses,—that of menacing M. de Lesseps with British competition, or that of negotiating with him on friendly terms which went at least as far as this that they agreed to leave him in complete possession of the field, so long as he showed himself willing to use his power for the furtherance of the commerce of the world. Both attitudes were pressed upon the British Government, but the alternative between these attitudes was compulsory; there was no third course. The least intimation that M. de Lesseps's exclusive right might be invaded by the British Government would, as that Government well knew, involve the absolute breaking-off of the negotiations, and compel them either openly to contest his right, i.e., to declare open war with him, or to subside into helpless silence. The Government chose the wiser course, that of negotiating with M. de Lesseps on the most amicable terms which virtually assumed the justice of his claims, and though the concessions which they so extracted did not satisfy the representatives of British Commerce, those concessions were at least very much more in the interests of commerce than an open feud with M. de Lesseps,—and with France,—could possibly have been. But this necessity of assuming some practical attitude,—one either of hostility to, or of virtual acquiescence in, M. de Lesseps's claims,—which for the Executive Government was inevitable, is for the House of Commons absolutely non-existent. Why should they take up any attitude at all on an abstract question of law which does not concern them? If they take up even the right attitude, it will not help the adoption of that attitude by the world at large, and will probably even hinder its adoption. If they take up the wrong attitude, that would only discredit the House of Commons, so soon as it is known to be the wrong attitude; and even if it hastened the adoption of the right attitude by the rest of the world, it would only achieve that result by piquing the rest of the world into opposing the English claim,—not a very satisfactory mode of stimulating the cause of right. The reasons which compelled the Government to take up some definite basis for the negotiation had no application at all to the House of Commons, especially just now, when the House of Commons is not asked to sanction any proposal on the subject. The Government did not ask to have its own assumptions approved, and did not, indeed, wish to have them approved, now that the practical proposal based on those assumptions was no longer before the House. Still less did it wish to have those assumptions condemned, when the only result of condemning them must have been to irritate to the highest degree the jealousy of the French people, and to compel the French Company to regard the House of Commons as a body that, for political reasons, is eager to invade the Company's vested rights.

There was no arguing against positions so powerful as these, and Sir Stafford Northcote's resolution was rejected after a debate in which it can be hardly said that any sincere fight was made for it. Sir Stafford Northcote advanced, indeed, a few feeble reasons for Mr. Horace Davey's and Mr. Underdown's view of the legal question, but no reasons at all for committing the House of Commons to that view; while Mr. Horace Davey himself, though holding by his own view, voted against the proposal to commit the House of Commons to it. No one attempted to answer Mr. Cohen's very strong argument for the opposite view of the legal question, that if the "exclusive power" granted to M. de Lesseps in 1854 was exhausted so soon as he had formed the Company and received the concession of its rights, it was most anomalous that the charter of 1854 should be recited and confirmed as in full force at a date when, on that view of the matter, the whole of the "exclusive power" had been used and had expired. Neither did any one answer Mr. Gladstone's point that M. de Lesseps had, as far back as 1872, asserted an "exclusive power" much in advance of that for which he now contends, but that the late Government, in buying the Canal Shares in 1876, had left that claim quite unchallenged, and had not even lodged a protest against it, though the Government had under that purchase secured a personal representation on the Board of Directors of the Company. Mr. Bourke's rather humiliating declaration that he knew nothing of the papers in which that claim was made, though he represented the Foreign Office in the House of Commons at the time of the purchase of the Shares by the Government, was only a confession of personal neglect. In fact, however, we can have no doubt that Lord Beaconsfield would have been the last man to encourage a somewhat shabby if not absolutely dishonourable attempt to invade the rights of so daring and successful an adventurer as M. de Lesseps. Were Lord Beaconsfield still at the head of his party, we should have heard nothing of this tardy challenge of the privileges of a man modelled so completely after Lord Beaconsfield's own heart as Ferdinand de Lesseps.

Mr. Gladstone's majority of ninety-nine really meant this,—that the House of Commons will have nothing to say to the proposal to start a competition with the Suez Canal Company, the only chance of which consists in the fact that we have recently gained a military influence in Egypt which we might use, if we chose, to M. de Lesseps's injury. It is true that Sir Stafford Northcote in the strongest way deprecated doing this. It is true that he insisted on the moral claims of the Company to consideration, while contesting its legal claims. But then, it is also true that he expressly argued for contesting its legal claims, in order to secure for us a better "leverage" in negotiating with M. de Lesseps; and his proposal comes to just this,—that he would beat down M. de Lesseps by brandishing over his head the fear of a competition, though he would not beat him down too low. And yet, if that is a legitimate "leverage" at all, it is legitimate for a good deal more than Sir Stafford

Northcote would approve. The leverage of open competition is good for as much as this,—the reduction of the profits of the Company to an ordinary rate of profit, or is not good at all. The House of Commons has been very wise in declining altogether to give its sanction to the use of this “leverage.” On the other hand, the Government is not without a “leverage” which it may fairly use, though not so powerful a leverage as that of the threat of open competition. It may fairly say that the concession to M. de Lesseps was made avowedly by the Egyptian Government for the commercial good of the whole world, and that so soon as the Company receiving that concession shows any indifference to the needs of commerce, and refuses to take the steps which it safely can take for the better accommodation of that commerce, it would be breaking the conditions of its grant. Clearly, as yet, the Suez Canal Company have shown no signs of such indifference, and till they do, the House of Commons is right in rejecting every invitation to infringe its reasonable claims, and in supporting by an immense majority the Government which has shown its disinclination to infringe those claims.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE OPPOSITION.

THE struggles of the Session are now pretty nearly over, though, on the vexed question of Indian Judges, there was to be a Party demonstration in the House yesterday, while the South-African policy of the Government will probably be challenged in a thin House early next week. On neither subject, however, can the Conservatives be regarded as either hopeful or desirous of victory, but only as anxious not to let it be supposed that they drop any count in the long indictment which they bring against the policy of the Government. They wish to enter on the campaigns of the long vacation,—for the long vacation has now become a series of provincial campaigns,—with the declaration that they have often lately made, that the policy of the present Government has been one unbroken series of failures, wherever they have not taken a leaf out of the book of the predecessors whom they denounced; that in Ireland, in India, in Egypt, in relation to the Suez Canal, in South Africa, and universally at home,—for instance, as regards Parliamentary procedure, Mr. Bradlaugh, agriculture, and finance,—they have surpassed themselves either in achieving disaster, or in copying a better policy than their own. Such is the Conservative contention, and if their statements are to be trusted, the Government will close this Session far weaker than they opened it, and with a moral certainty of defeat whenever they submit their policy to the judgment of the constituencies.

Let us consider, with as much impartiality as is possible for those who have in almost every case of difference held with the Government and against the Opposition, how far this contention is true. We should say, then, that in relation to Ireland, India, Egypt—including the Suez-Canal negotiation—Parliamentary procedure, the condition of agriculture, and the finance of the country, the Government will close the Session far stronger than they opened it; and that only in relation to Mr. Bradlaugh and South Africa can it be reasonably said that they may have failed to gain, even if they have not lost ground. Let us first take the case of Ireland. Even Conservatives do not deny that the condition of Ireland at the present time is far more satisfactory in every respect, than the condition of Ireland even half a year ago. What they assert is that that improved condition is due solely to the application of the Conservative policy of repressing crime, and is not due in any respect to the Liberal policy of reviewing rent in the interest of the tenant. Now we do not very well know why the policy of repressing crime efficiently is called more a Conservative than a Liberal policy. It is a policy conceived and effectually applied by the Liberal Government, and the only distinctive Conservative contention on the subject is that it alone should have been applied, and that the Land policy,—to which, in our belief, more than half the pacification is due,—should not have been concurrently adopted. But the country, we think, will not be disposed to endorse the Conservative claim to a power of intuitive analysis of a compound result. The pacification of Ireland is a fact, and it is also a fact that it has been brought about after the administration of a double remedy,—one remedy intended to strike at the root of just discontent, the other intended to punish unjust violence. Is it common-sense to say that the constituencies will be persuaded by the Conservatives to ascribe the whole result to the remedy which strikes only at crime and not at the disposition to commit crime? Is it reasonable to maintain that tenants who are availing themselves of the provisions of the Land Act by hundreds of thousands, are as likely to subscribe to Secret Societies and to encourage Ribbon Conspiracies, as they were when they regarded the whole Land legislation of the country as oppressive to them? Admit, if you please, that they prefer Mr. Parnell's policy to that of the Government,—that is to be expected, for they hope to gain more by it, and they are easily persuaded that it is not unjust,—but let them be ever so anxious to repudiate the Government for Mr. Parnell, is it human nature to assume that when they are availing themselves in masses of the policy of the Government, they are as ready as ever to support a revolutionary movement which would endanger the very privileges they have just received. It is true that they will support Mr. Healy, when he promises them a yet more liberal land policy than that of the Government. But would they support Mr. Healy if he were again to bid them refuse their rent, as the Land League bade them to refuse their rent two years ago? No sane man will believe it. And, therefore, we say that the Constituencies look upon the contention of the Conservatives that Ireland has been pacified by coercion alone, as a foolish and unsupported statement, due to the vehemence of Conservative party spirit, and not to any sort of evidence or probable presumption. Ireland is not transformed, but Ireland is already in a better condition than any which pure coercion could by any possibility have brought about.

With regard to India, popular feeling is, we suspect, absolutely satisfied with the results of Lord Ripon's policy, and well convinced that wherever he has reversed the policy of his predecessor, he has turned evil into good. As concerns Egypt, the country has never doubted that the Government are doing all in their power for the benefit of the people of Egypt, and all in their power to establish a Government there which may one day be independent of our aid,—though we ourselves have little hope that that day is near, or is as yet even growing nearer. Still, what the English people cared for was this, that what we did in Egypt should not be done for the purposes of annexation or the greed of empire, but solely to re-establish order and to establish justice in a country which we are bound to protect against anarchy and tyranny. If we can re-establish order and establish justice only by keeping our control of the affairs of Egypt,—if it would involve far more suffering to Egypt than it would humiliation to England for us to retire,—the constituencies will be well content to approve of our remaining. But they do not want to see the lust of territory overpowering the sympathy of the British people with native aspirations, and we believe that they are quite content with the evidence that the policy of the English Government is one long struggle to help Egypt to help herself. They do not believe and have no right to believe that in overthrowing Arabi, the Liberal Government took a leaf out of the Afghan policy of Lord Beaconsfield. And all the efforts of the Tory Press to prove this calumny, have, we believe, been so much wasted ink. The result of the recent debate on the Suez Canal has unquestionably been to convince the English people of the absolute good-faith of the Government in resisting a policy of annexation, even at the very time when they are forced, in the interests of Egypt herself, to counsel the Egyptian Government to do much which no Oriental Government, except under European tutelage, would ever dream of doing.

In South Africa alone, we believe that the Conservatives may fairly say that Liberal policy has not as yet produced any satisfactory result. It is true that nothing could be worse than the legacy of complications which the Tories left us, but it is equally true that we have not found a satisfactory solution as yet for any of these complications. The retrocession of the Transvaal has not as yet worked well, and the conditions on which it was given back have been broken. The restoration of Cetewayo to Zululand was just, but it has not been successful, and it has ended in his defeat and destruction by a still less educated barbarian. No other result could have been expected when the mistake was committed of stipulating that Cetewayo should not create an army. But this mistake was made in deference to Tory prejudice. The Basuto question is still unsolved. Thus the best any Liberal can say is that some very false steps, taken by the Conservatives in ignorance, have been retraced, but that we are as yet only groping our way to a more moderate and more successful policy. But we do not think the country will resent a new failure, following on a long series of failures even grosser still, but will do the Government the justice to say that it is honestly trying to solve a nearly insoluble problem.

As to internal questions, we wholly deny that the Government is regarded as having lost ground during the Session. It is true that on the Affirmation Bill they were defeated, but it is also true that Mr. Gladstone's speech has made the question better and more fully understood all over the country; and that in the great towns, at least, the Government is far stronger than it was six months ago. Members who, like Alderman M'Arthur and Mr. Jerningham, deserted the Government on that question, are urged by their constituencies to resign their seats, while a very strong and eager feeling is growing up in favour of the passing of a similar measure. We do not know how far this change of feeling has spread to the counties, and are quite ready to believe that in many county constituencies the Bradlaugh question is still full of the promise of Conservative gain; but in the country as a whole, there is far more confidence that the Affirmation Bill was a right measure than there was six months ago,—and this feeling is steadily growing, instead of being on the decline. For the rest, the Government have gained steadily by their honesty, their tenacity, and their obvious conviction. In relation to the farmers, the Agricultural Holdings Bill will tell strongly in their favour, especially since their wise persistence in refusing to accept Mr. Balfour's chance victory, and in insisting that the tenant shall recover not only the outlay on his improvements, but also such fair profit on that outlay as the market value of those improvements will give him. In relation to Procedure, the Grand Committees, though not an indisputable success, will give us three valuable measures which certainly would not have been carried without them, and will mark the first step in the recovery from the era of Obstruction. And in relation to Revenue and Expenditure, Mr. Childers's admirable National Debt Bill will, we believe, late as it is for a second reading, redeem the financial policy of the Session from the charge of colourlessness and unprogressiveness. Mr. Gladstone was fully justified in saying on Thursday that the great majority of the people strongly desire to see a final step taken towards the substantial reduction of our Debt, and that the great majority of the House of Commons represent in this matter the great majority of the people. Indeed, the Conservatives have themselves sanctioned the principle, though not the detail of the Bill,—a Bill of which it is the principle rather than the detail that is important. On the whole, we do not think that the Conservatives will commence their Long-vacation campaign with any very hopeful augury. If they will take the advice of an opponent, we should recommend them to harp as much as possible on the subject of South Africa, but even on South Africa to refer as little as possible to the Tory policy, which landed us in such a chaos of perplexities. On every other subject, from Mr. Bradlaugh to the Suez Canal, they will find the tide gradually but steadily turning against them.

INDIAN JUDGES AND BRITISH CRIMINALS.

THE opponents of the Ilbert Bill are very bad tacticians. Their wild exaggeration and violence have caused a reaction in favour of the Bill, which is pretty certain to ensure its safety. Had they conducted their opposition temperately, and limited their objections to the question of opportuneness, after the example which we set them when the bare outline of the Bill first reached this country, it is not unlikely that they might have carried public opinion with them. But there is nothing which the public resent more than an attempt to impose on their ignorance. The mass of people in this country know themselves to be very ill-informed on Indian questions, and their natural impulse is to give credit to the first man of character who volunteers to instruct them. If, however, they find that they have been deceived, they are apt to go to the opposite extreme, and believe all they hear on the opposite side. This is just what is now happening in the case of Mr. Ilbert's Bill. When the question began to be first agitated, the British public were profoundly ignorant of the whole subject, and were inclined to believe that Lord Ripon had, with the best intentions, made a serious mistake. But the indiscriminate fury of the opponents of the Bill has provoked a host of champions into the arena, and these have had no difficulty in refuting the heterogeneous objections urged against it, and even in carrying the war into the enemy's camp. Lord Ripon's assailants have had the imprudence to attack the Bill on its merits, and not merely on the ground that it is a premature step in the right direction. Their arguments go in the length of denying that any step at all is needed in that direction. They appear to regard the existing state of things as ideally the best, and thus plainly tell the teeming millions of our Indian fellow-subjects that they never can expect equality of rights with Europeans in the Civil any more than in the Military service of the Crown. The perilous folly of such a policy is so self-evident as to require no demonstration; but we may relate a vivid illustration, which lately came to our knowledge, of the mischief which it is silently producing in the Native mind. Two years ago, an English traveller visited an interesting old temple in the interior of India. He was shown over the building by one of the priests of the temple, who wore no other garment than a loin-cloth. This man not only displayed an erudite familiarity with the antiquities of the temple and of the surrounding district; he was also an accomplished Latin and Greek scholar, and thoroughly well versed in English literature. The English visitor ventured to ask for an explanation of the striking contrast between the priest's outward mien and mental accomplishments, and expressed his wonder that one so cultivated could not do something better for himself than earn a scanty livelihood by acting as guide to chance visitors to the temple. The priest's answer was to the following effect:—"I am a high-caste Brahmin, tracing my lineage back to a line of ancestry more ancient and not less noble than that of the proudest of your English Peers. I studied and graduated at the University of Calcutta; and on taking my degree, I had to choose my career. On looking about me, I found that I could aspire to be a guard on one of your railways, or a clerk in one of your mercantile establishments, but that scarcely any career was open to me to which an English gentleman would think of aspiring. So I thought, on reflection, that I should be consulting my dignity and self-respect better by retiring to this temple, and living the kind of life which has excited your wonder. Do you, English, imagine that your rule is popular in India? Believe me, it is not. And how can it be? We give your Government all the credit that it deserves. In the ordinary affairs of life it is a just Government; and it has given this country peace. But it is a foreign Government. Your English officials fill all the posts worth having, and the native gentry have no career. Put yourselves in our position. If, in an evil day, France were to conquer you, and turn your country into a French dependency, would you be content, provided your foreign masters gave you peace and did justice between man and man, while Frenchmen officered your Army and Navy, and filled nearly all the posts worth having in your Civil Service? You know you would not; and how can you expect us to be satisfied with your rule over us?"

That is a dangerous feeling, which it is surely desirable to conciliate, if possible. But how can it be conciliated, if it is proclaimed to the educated natives of India that they have no prospect of an improving future; that no degree of qualification, no merit, however conspicuous, will ever entitle any of them, out of the three Presidency towns, to sit in judgment on the lowest ruffian who claims the privilege of being a European? That is the ground which the adversaries of Lord Ripon have taken up, and their cause was lost from the moment they committed themselves to so preposterous a policy. The other side had only to put forth a plain statement of facts, and the opposing arguments stood openly refuted. Perhaps the most effective defence of the Ilbert Bill that has appeared in England is Mr. Macrae's article in the current Fortnightly Review, on "Criminal Jurisdiction over Englishmen in India." Its argumentative effectiveness is largely due to its clear and compact statement of facts. A summary of the facts will show our readers that if Mr. Ilbert's Bill should pass into law, there is nothing in it, on its merits, which need cause any alarm. Ever since 1836, the administration of justice in civil cases has been exercised by Native judges and magistrates over Europeans as well as natives throughout India. At this moment the Judges in the Courts of First Instance are nearly all natives, "and so well have they discharged," says Mr. Macrae, himself a practising barrister in India, "the responsibility put upon them, that it is a notorious fact that in the great majority of cases where appeals have been preferred from their decisions, and the immediate Court above under an English Civilian has differed from them, their decisions have been reaffirmed by the highest Courts of Appeal, whether the High Court or the Privy Council." This certainly is a remarkable tribute to the professional competency as well as to the integrity of the Native Judges. Prima facie, then, it seems a flagrant anomaly that Judges who have established so high a reputation as administrators of the law in civil cases, should be deemed incompetent to adjudicate on the most trivial criminal charge brought against a European in the interior of the country, or, to be strictly accurate, anywhere outside the three Presidency towns. So indefensible did Lord Dalhousie consider the anomaly, that his Government introduced, in 1849—as we stated on a former occasion—a Bill for extending the criminal jurisdiction of Magistrates, whether Native or English, over all British subjects in India, without distinction of race. But before the scheme was completed the Mutiny broke out, and made it impossible for a time to carry out Lord Dalhousie's policy. In 1877, however, an Act was passed "empowering Presidency Magistrates, whether natives or not, to exercise the same criminal jurisdiction over European British subjects as over natives within the limits of the Presidency towns." Several Native magistrates have exercised the full jurisdiction, thus conferred, to the entire satisfaction of the European community; and, as a matter of fact, the number of Europeans over which Native Judges now exercise jurisdiction in criminal cases embraces three-fourths of the whole European population of India. But although Native Judges are allowed to sit in judgment on Europeans in criminal cases within the limits of the Presidency towns, and in civil cases without any limits at all, although also they have given universal satisfaction where they have been tested, yet they are still debarred from trying any criminal case when a European is concerned outside the limits of the Presidency towns. Mr. Macrae gives some striking illustrations of the way in which this system works. Last year, Mr. Gupta, a native gentleman, after officiating for some time as Presidency magistrate in Calcutta, to the entire satisfaction of the British community, was transferred to a more responsible appointment in the interior, where, by reason of the provisions of the existing law, he was incapacitated from trying even the most petty charge against a European British subject. Another native civilian and English barrister, Mr. Dutt, "who had gained the second place from amongst several candidates in the examination in this country for admission into the Indian Civil Service, and who had come to be appointed Joint Magistrate of the important district of Dacca, was suddenly deprived of that appointment, and removed to a less eligible district, on the ground that the opening of a new railway was bringing a number of Europeans into the Dacca District." Is it surprising that disabilities entailing grievances like this should be felt as galling and degrading by educated natives? It was with a view to remedy these grievances that Lord Ripon determined on the policy which is formulated in Mr. Ilbert's Bill,—of the opportuneness of which we have expressed our own grave doubts, but the abstract merits of which are quite distinct from the opportuneness. Now it is the Bill on its merits that has been so violently assailed. And even those who have, like ourselves, questioned its opportuneness, must do Lord Ripon the justice of admitting that he took the best advice available before taking action. In a confidential circular he solicited the opinions of all the Local Governments of India on the Bill, and they all reported in its favour, with the single exception of Coorg, "the smallest of them all." One of these reports, curiously enough, confirms a suggestion which we made on this subject six months ago, namely, that Native Judges in the interior would be likely to deal more leniently with Europeans than with natives. "I think," says the Officiating Judicial Commissioner of Oudh, "they would, as a rule, unduly favour the Europeans." But, after all, what does Mr. Ilbert's Bill propose? It is extremely limited in its character. It removes a disability, by making qualified natives eligible to offices involving jurisdiction over Europeans in criminal cases. The exercise of this potential right, however, is so circumscribed and guarded, that for some years to come not more than three or four Native Magistrates all over India are likely to enjoy it. The Bill confers the power to try criminal charges against European British subjects upon such persons only as may be nominated and elected for their proved fitness for the position. "The single alteration which we propose to make," said Mr. Ilbert himself, in explanation of his Bill, "is this. We propose to substitute for the disqualification arising from race a qualification depending on tried fitness." In fact, the Judges of the High Court of Calcutta, in the joint letter which they have published against Mr. Ilbert's Bill, dwell on its extreme moderation as an argument against it. "There are only four officers," they say, "who could at present" and "for some time to come," benefit by the provisions of the Bill. "As regards the rest, no question is likely to arise for several years." But if for several years to come only a mere handful of Natives can be appointed Judges under Mr. Ilbert's

Bill, that is surely a reason why no great harm is likely to come of it. The extravagant agitation raised against it will, by force of the recoil, help it to pass into law; and although we should ourselves have much preferred to wait awhile, we have too much confidence in the good-sense of our countrymen in India to doubt that they will soon reconcile themselves to a change which will affect but few of them for a long time to come, and which will not affect those few so prejudicially as some of them now fear. The provisions of Mr. Ilbert's Bill have always been the law and practice of Ceylon under British rule, and have been found to give complete satisfaction to British residents there.

M. CHALLEMEL-LACOUR.

OF all French Statesmen of the present time, no one is so little known to the English public as M. Challemeil-Lacour. If we consider the comments of English papers upon his speech of the 16th of July, if we notice the surprise they express at its moderation and dignity, it becomes clear that the man has been misunderstood.

In their excuse, we may say that M. Challemeil-Lacour is not easy to understand. Now, we read a speech of his remarkable for bitter sarcasm and for open contempt of the opinions of others; now, an utterance no less noteworthy because of its moderation and urbanity. The reading of this riddle is not in itself a grateful task, for M. Challemeil-Lacour can scarcely hope to be reckoned among great men. Yet the solution of the problem is earnestly to be desired at the present moment, when a certain straining is felt of the ties of friendship which bind England to France.

Paul Armand Challemeil-Lacour was born at Avranches (Manche), on May 19th, 1827. He studied at the most famous lycée in Paris, that of St. Louis, with notable success; and in 1846 entered the Normal School, from which he graduated in 1849, as first in the competition in Philosophy. It was, too, as Professor of Philosophy that the young man of twenty-three went to teach in the lycées of Pau and Limoges. Even at this age, his political opinions were formed—and so formed as not to undergo any serious subsequent modification. He expressed himself so boldly on the questions of the day as to become a marked man, and after the coup d'état he was arrested, imprisoned, and banished from France. The young exile withdrew to Belgium, where he lectured successfully. In 1856, however, he was called to Switzerland, to fill the Chair of French Literature in the Polytechnicon of Zurich. After the amnesty, he returned to France, and entered upon his career as a journalist. His articles on literature, art, and philosophy, in Le Temps, La Revue Nationale, and La Revue des Deux Mondes, attracted attention, and he became the manager of La Revue Moderne. In 1868 he established, in conjunction with MM. Brisson, Allain-Targé, and Gambetta, the Revue Politique, of which he undertook the management. This position brought him once more into conflict with the powers that were, and he underwent a conviction for publishing the list of subscriptions for a monument to be erected to Baudin. With the downfall of the Napoleonic régime, his sufferings for the cause of political freedom became so many titles to popular favour, and he was appointed Prefect of the Rhone. After September 4th, 1870, the administration of the city of Lyons was given into his hands. His conduct of the affairs of this city brought him, to say the least, no additional reputation. Yet it must be admitted that his position was one of great difficulty. Lyons had proclaimed the Republic even sooner than Paris, and when M. Challemeil-Lacour arrived there, the city had already entrusted the conduct of its affairs to a Central Revolutionary Committee. All authority was broken down, and the egotism of the individual had at once become anarchical. The police seemed suddenly to have disappeared, and the troops were hostile. M. Challemeil-Lacour was the representative of a Government too free to attract the military chiefs, too bourgeois to enlist the sympathies of the populace. Between the hostility of the leaders of the Army and the mistrust of the populace, M. Challemeil-Lacour found himself placed as between the Devil and the deep sea.

The only way out of the difficulty which M. Challemeil-Lacour saw was to surround himself with moderate men, and appeal to the patriotism of all. He got the Central Committee to liberate the Imperialists whom the populace had thrown into prison on September 4th, and to fix a date for the Municipal elections. He thus brought the city once more under the dominion of the laws; but the French artisans, in the towns at least, are Socialists, and one day, led by Cluseret and others, they stormed the Prefecture, and imprisoned M. Challemel-Lacour. On the next day, he was freed by the Moderates, and at once was invested with complete civil and military authority by the Delegation of Tours. It is said that he now ordered the troops to fire on the populace,—“Fusillez-moi ces gens-là!” It is certain that he drove Cluseret and the other leaders out of the city, and partially, at least, re-established order. Now, however, the General in command of the troops refused to obey the delegate of the Civil authority, and M. Challemel-Lacour at once gave orders to arrest General Masure. To cut a long story short, the confusion became worse confounded, the populace was all but openly rebellious, and one night the commander, Arnaud, was assassinated. Immediately Gambetta came to the assistance of his friend. Gambetta, representing, as he did, the spirit of patriotism, soon evolved order out of disorder. The stronger man was successful where the weaker had failed, and this is the more remarkable, inasmuch as the only repressive measure then taken seems to have been the prohibition of all political assemblies. Yet, from that time on, M. Challemel-Lacour's task was easy. When Gambetta left the Government, M. Challemel-Lacour gave up his position in Lyons, and a few months later became editor-in-chief of La République Française. In January, 1872, he was elected Deputy for the Bouches du Rhône by the Radicals. Whatever may be thought of M. Challemel-Lacour as a doer, his success as a speaker is beyond question. In a Chamber where Gambetta alone surpassed him in eloquence, he immediately took the first place as a debater. Always calm and self-possessed, his readiness in discussion was as remarkable as the exactness of his knowledge. On January 30th, he was elected Senator for the Bouches du Rhône, and before the expiration of the term of six years he was sent as the Ambassador of France to the Court of St. James. Once more his practical talents were called in question. Nothing could exceed the lucidity of his despatches, nor did he fail in conducting the business of his office; but he was disliked in society, and condemned by public opinion. Yet the French, who forgive ability everything, have ratified his appointment to the most influential position in the French Ministry, and it is not too much to say that upon his present conduct the future of France, at least for one generation, may rest.

What, then, shall we say of M. Challemel-Lacour? Fortunately, we have not only his actions, but also his speeches and writings, on which to base our judgment. He has published the letters of Madame d'Epinay, with an introduction; translated Ritter's “History of Philosophy,” also with an introduction; and, finally, has written a book on Wilhelm von Humboldt, entitled “La Philosophie Individualiste.” These, with his speeches, afford data enough to allow us to measure his intellect. Let us take his most important work, his criticism, published in 1864, of the individualistic philosophy. The position of Wilhelm von Humboldt as a political thinker may be made clear to Englishmen almost in one phrase,—he was the forerunner and teacher of J. S. Mill. Humboldt insists that it is necessary to allow the individual the most complete liberty of action; the State should never, according to him, substitute its action for that of the individual. In later life, Humboldt saw reason to modify somewhat these articles of his political creed, but he had affirmed too stoutly ever to change his position as the head of a school; and it is as a teacher of individualism that M. Challemel-Lacour studies him. He begins by calling Wilhelm von Humboldt his hero, and states the creed of the German with clearness and vigour. When M. Challemel-Lacour, however, comes to Humboldt's statement that the sole function of the State is to provide for public security, he hesitates to accept the dogma, and helps himself out of the difficulty by a somewhat fine-spun argument,—“Agreed,” he writes, “but the public well-being is also a condition necessary to peace, and, therefore, Humboldt's theory forces us to give back to the State some of the authority which he would have taken from it.” M. Challemel-Lacour, however, decides nothing, and ends his book with an ill-defined statement of the question. Whether it is well to trust in the many, and to repose all authority in the masses, or to hope all from a few gifted individuals, he confesses himself unable to determine. At least we see here that M. Challemel-Lacour is truth-loving, or he would not be content to formulate without settling the question. Here, too, his desire to be impartial is as conspicuous as the fact that his intellectual capacity is not of a really high order. He is one of the led, and not a leader in thought; he is an opportunist, not because he has solved the problem, and reconciled the two opposing dogmas in an affirmation which includes both, but because he sees unclearly the two antagonistic movements, and, unable to calculate the resultant of the forces, abandons himself to the leading of circumstances. Nor is M. Challemel-Lacour's opportunism, meaning hereby his want of insight, atoned for by depth of moral feeling, by purity of conscience. He is not a large man, even in mental stature; and yet his ethical tone is of a lower order than his intelligence. He asserts that it “is a great imperfection in a statesman to push mere conscientious scruples too far, and to be incapable of sacrificing his moral delicacy to his aim. When truth has conquered, she has almost always owed her victory to means of a questionable morality” (“a des moyens scabreux et équivoques”). Now the man who sees that there is but one law, one order, in the moral and in the material world, that right always in the long-run is might, may be called a believer. The man who doubts this is a sceptic—one much to be pitied—but what shall we say of the man who absolutely declares that the lie is stronger than the truth, and that it alone helps the truth to victory, except that he is an avowed detractor of the truth? The intellect, then, the mental eyesight of M. Challemel-Lacour is fairly keen, truth-seeking, and impartial, but not sufficiently powerful to save him from disbelief in the very existence of right; the conscience, on the other hand, the mental feeling of the man, is so blunted that he considers it an imperfection not to be able and willing to do even what he sees to be wrong.

He is dogmatic withal, and self-assertive; he can overawe the men about him—men, for the most part, of even less insight and less knowledge than himself—by his gift of speech, for he is a master of acrid and biting sarcasm. To enable the reader to judge of his power some instances of it may be given. Speaking of Madame d'Epinay's connection with Grimm, and noticing that moral axioms abound in their correspondence, he says:—“They had the double pleasure of sinning together, and then of condemning themselves with one accord from a philosophical [ethical?] stand-point.” The same Grimm of whom St. Beuve speaks as a judicious, honest, faithful man, as one of the greatest of critics, M. Challemel-Lacour dismisses as Grimm “the frog-eyed.” M. Challemel-Lacour's power of sarcasm appears to come from his inability to see the good, at least as much as from his quickness to see defects. Not that his knowledge is really deep or accurate; he makes, for instance, laughable errors in translating from German into French, but as it is rare for a Frenchman to know German at all, he may be considered as a whale among minnows.

We have thought it our duty to depict M. Challemel-Lacour as we see him, but we must not forget that he has often shown both courage and dexterity, and, above all, that he is in complete sympathy with the surface tendencies of the time. Practical men, that is those who desire to gauge his probable conduct as the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, will do well to look upon M. Challemel-Lacour as a fairly intelligent man, whose intellect may be trusted to restrain his imperiousness of temper. The moralist, the thinker, will see him but as one of that numerous class to whom, in Shakespeare's language, Time gives “alms for oblivion.”

THE LORDS ON THE IRISH LAND ACT.

WHAT can be the motive of the Tory Peers in their systematic and persistent hostility to the Irish Land Act? It cannot be mere peevishness or chagrin, for besides the injustice of imputing such childish conduct to so grave and dignified a body of men, there are landlords among them far too able and practical to allow personal feeling to jeopardise their real interests. For there can be no question that the attitude of the Tory Peers towards the Land Act is prejudicial to the interests of the Irish proprietors. How can the Irish tenantry be expected to regard the Act as a final settlement of the question when they see the Tories, as a party, denouncing the Act as “confiscation and plunder”? Their feeling must be that as soon as the Tories return to power—perhaps in a year or two—the whole question will be reopened, and the Tory Government will attempt either to repeal or modify the Act, or to buy out the Irish landlords and distribute their property among the peasantry, at the expense of the British taxpayer. Yet the very men, who cause all this uncertainty as to the future, complain bitterly of the depreciation of Irish landed property. They undermine the foundation on which the security of property rests, and then complain that it has ceased to fetch a fair price in the market. Yet we suspect that there is method in their seeming recklessness. The truth probably is that they do not wish the Irish Land Act to be a success, and that they are determined, if they can, to make it a failure. Some of them have seen with dismay the considerable reductions of rent made by the Sub-Commissioners. But we doubt whether the most active spirits among the malcontents—men like Lord Waterford and Lord Dunraven, for example—are much moved by that consideration. We believe that neither of these Peers has been pecuniarily a sufferer by the administration of the Land Act,—a fact which is to their credit. We are probably not wrong in attributing their hostility, and that of the Tory Peers in general, to the Land Act, to motives which they do not think it prudent to avow publicly. The Land Act has placed limitations on the rights of the landlords, and by the general reduction of rents it has diminished the saleable value of landed property in general. The limitation of landlord rights has shorn ownership of land in Ireland of some of its sentimental and ornamental attractions. The consequence is that many Irish landlords would very gladly sell their properties, and leave the country; and those who have not suffered from the Land Act are precisely those who are most anxious to sell. If they can arrest, or at least discredit, the action of the Sub-Commissioners, they may hope to persuade intending purchasers that rents may yet go up. But if the Act is allowed free course, there will be very little chance of selling land on anything like the old terms. Conservative Peers in England, on the other hand, aim at helping the Irish landlords, while at the same time they hope to accomplish a political coup by winning the Irish constituencies through the expropriation of the Irish landlords at a handsome figure in favour of peasant-proprietors. In no other way can we explain the remarkable change of front which the Tory party have executed on the question of peasant-proprietors in Ireland. Indeed, Lord Waterford hinted, towards the close of his speech on Friday, at the real aim of the landlords' agitation against the Act. "The purchase clauses," he said, "should at once be rendered workable by transferring the management of the sales to the Landed Estates Court, and by adopting something like the other suggestions contained in the first Report of their Lordships' Committee." What are those suggestions? One of them is that a "Land Tribunal" should be established, to negotiate the purchase of Irish properties by tenants, and that this Tribunal "should be authorised to advance the whole of the purchase-money," without waiting for the judicial fixing of rents as a test of the value of the holdings. The Committee recommend, moreover, that the advances of the State for the purpose of facilitating purchases should be made "at the rate of £3 per cent., and that the repayment should be by annual instalments of £3½ per cent., spreading over sixty-six years; or of £4 per cent., spreading over forty-six years." This is the recommendation of a Committee presided over by Lord Cairns, a significant and important fact, for Lord Cairns delivered an able speech against the Bright Clauses of the Land Act. Under the Bright Clauses, the State advances only two-thirds of the purchase-money, to be repaid by instalments over thirty-five years. What did Lord Cairns think and say of that very moderate proposal? It is worth while to quote his language:—"My Lords, for the third of a century the management of these properties is to be imposed on the Government. . . . Suppose the purchase-money is not paid, and you proceed to enforce your forfeiture. My Lords, in that case I do not envy the position of the Treasury. I think I can foresee, the first time they proceed to forfeiture, the pressure that will be brought to bear on them in Parliament, and I know not which is the more dangerous. I venture to prophesy, with some confidence, that one of two things will happen,—either the whole of these provisions will break down, and you will be obliged to say you cannot enforce their observance; or, if you do, there will be an outcry in the country, and the Government will assume a position more odious than that of the most disliked Irish landlord."

In this view of the matter Lord Cairns was supported by the leading speakers of his party; but, for a special reason, we shall quote but one of them. In addressing his constituents during the General Election of 1880, Mr. W. H. Smith took the opportunity of discussing the question of gradually enabling the tenantry of Ireland to purchase the properties of their landlords, and his conclusion was that he "had difficulty in realising the magical ability of the man who could frame such a scheme." That man of "magical ability" turned out to be himself, for in the last Session of Parliament he tabled a Resolution which declared that "further legislation is imperatively required, to enable tenants in Ireland to acquire the freehold of the land in their occupation on just and reasonable terms."

We have seen what the leaders of the Opposition suggest as "just and reasonable terms." We have also seen what they think of terms which are moderation itself, compared with their own. They believe that the Government could never recover advances of two-thirds of the purchase-money, repayable in thirty-five years; and, believing this, they propose that the State should advance the whole of the purchase-money at 3 per cent., repayable by yearly instalments in sixty-six years. Meanwhile, they set themselves to disparage the Land Act, lest the judicial fixing of rents should diminish the value of the excellent bargain which they intend for Irish landlords, at the cost of the British taxpayers. It is one of the coolest attempts ever made to sacrifice not only the peace of Ireland, but the interests of the population of Great Britain, for the benefit of a particular class and a political party.

The public, however, are not so dull and ill informed as the Tory Peers imagine. They know quite well that the Irish landlords have benefited by the Land Act not less than the tenants. The whole force of England would have failed to secure the regular payment of the old rents; and what is more, no Conservative Government would have dared to make the attempt; nor would a just Government desire to make it. It is surprising that, with such a mass of evidence before him, the Duke of Argyll should still maintain that the only question in fixing rents in Ireland is "what men in the open market will give for land." It is so in this country, because in this country the tenant can meet his landlord on pretty equal terms. There are other means of gaining a livelihood besides the possession of land, and the landlord who tries to drive a hard bargain with his tenant runs the risk of finding his land thrown upon his hands. At this moment numbers of English landlords are glad to let farms at merely nominal rents, to keep them in cultivation. But in Ireland the possession of land is the only means of livelihood to the great mass of the population. "The landlord," as Lord Normanby said in the House of Lords forty years ago, "has a monopoly of the means of existence, and has a power for enforcing his bargains which does not exist elsewhere,—the power of starvation." And this monopoly, let it be remembered, is the direct consequence of English legislation, which first divorced the Irish population from the soil, and then, when they took to other modes of living, destroyed their industries and drove them back upon the land. To say that the proper principle of valuation in such a case is what men are willing to give, is much the same kind of absurdity as saying that the proper price of bread is what starving men will give in a besieged city. The Irish tenantry were obliged, as a rule, to give what the landlord asked, or starve. In the debate in the House of Lords last Friday Lord Emly told a story—by no means a solitary case—of a property bought by the present owner when the rental was £800 a year. "By the labours of the tenants, without any assistance from the landlord, the land was improved and the rent was raised to £3,000 a year. Could their Lordships wonder that in such a case the rents had been reduced 58 and 75 per cent?" We shall not do their Lordships the injustice of believing that they did wonder. In their hearts they cannot think such reductions of rent really unjust, however extraordinary the figures may look on paper, without any explanation. Nor is there much in the plea that rents have been reduced on estates which were not rack-rented. The truth is that, owing to the exorbitant competition for land, the general rental of Irish estates was pushed up to a rack-renting figure. We know of more than one Irish estate on which the rents had not been raised for one or two generations, but which were, nevertheless, found and admitted by the landlords themselves, to their own great surprise, to have been all the while rack-rented. We believe that when the passion and excitement of the hour are past, the Sub-Commissioners will be generally admitted to have done no more in their decisions than satisfy the equity of the cases that came before them.

THE EFFECTS OF THE PARCELS POST.

IT is difficult to forecast the effect on particular classes of such a change in the conditions of social life as will be worked by the Parcels Post. That the nation as a whole will benefit, is of course clear. The removal of artificial barriers to the interchange of commodities must always tend to facilitate production, and thus to equalise the circumstances of life in different places. Looked at in the whole, it is an unmixed good that town and country may freely exchange products. The only question is,—Will any class incidentally suffer?

At first sight, it will certainly strike most people that the shopkeepers of villages and small towns are likely to lose custom. Undoubtedly, a very large retail trade, carried on directly between great towns and the residents in country districts, will be very rapidly developed by the new Post. Perishable provisions apart, there are innumerable things which it will be convenient to get immediately from large retail establishments in town. The question is whether these will not be chiefly articles of comfort or luxury which are at present dispensed with, or in the case of the rich obtained by their own servants. With regard to the things which people require constantly and habitually, the tradesman on the spot will still have great advantages. If, indeed, the limits of the Post were wider, if goods of considerable weight and bulk could be obtained, he would probably gain greatly. For he would then be able to get his supplies at present prices, but more regularly and expeditiously than he can now. But taking the Post as it is, there are many ways in which his position will still aid him. Moderate as the tariff is, postage will add very materially to the cost of cheap articles. Sugar, for instance, is sold at 3d. and 3½d. a pound by every country grocer. Seven pounds will not cost more than 2s.; to add another 1s. for postage is, of course, out of the question. On the other hand, the country shopkeeper can get his supplies down as goods at a very low rate, and can fetch them from the station by his own horse and cart. He will certainly be able to save enough on the carriage over the postal charges to enable him to sell at a reasonable price, and realise a fair profit. The question, indeed, really comes to this,—Will it be possible to obtain goods from a large town dealer at such a reduced charge that it will more than counterbalance the postage? On the heaviest weight permissible the rate is almost 1½d. a pound, and the tariff for the smaller quantities is higher. This is a great addition to the cost of inexpensive articles, and it is in such articles that village tradesmen chiefly deal. We do not believe that the bulk of their trade will be sensibly affected.

If this conclusion is right on strictly economical grounds, there are other considerations which tell in the country shopkeeper's favour. It is his business to get goods from towns. It is the business of the town dealers to facilitate his getting goods in every way. The traveller from a wholesale house calls on him and suggests what he wants, and he has hardly any trouble beyond sending to the nearest station. The consumer, on the other hand, will have to concoct his order out of his own head. He will, no doubt, be assisted by advertisements, but often he will not know where to apply for what he wants. It is troublesome, too, to write an order. It is not the business of the consumer. He has other work, or amusements. In the case of the poor, the disinclination to write will probably settle the question. Even the spread of education will only by degrees render it an easy and every-day occurrence to write a letter or post-card. Then, again, there is the question of credit. The dealer at a distance will hesitate to part with his goods, if he is not confident of payment; while the consumer of limited means and experience will have a still greater objection to paying his money in advance. It will probably be long before these obstacles are overcome. The village tradesman need not fear losing the custom of his humble neighbours for many a day, even if he charges them a trifle more than the price for which they could get the same articles by Post. The well-to-do will be less influenced by the consideration of trouble, and not at all by that of credit, and it seems probable that in their case they may use the Post for articles of substantial value, but not for those in which, for the most part, the village trader deals.

There is another point to be considered. The Post will, no doubt, be used to a great extent for samples. The village shop may be made to look very bright by a collection of specimen articles obtained from large town houses. A good many things, after all, are bought not because they are wanted, but because they catch the eye in a shop-window. These are just the cases, too, in which price is little weighed, and the profits of the retailer are largest. There will be little demur at paying the 3d. or so really put on by the post, and the shopkeeper will clear his full profit. He may, indeed, become in this way a purveyor for the neighbourhood. By keeping a stock of samples, he will suggest tastes and cultivate wants which he may easily supply, if not out of his actual stock, by articles obtained by return of Post. It is quite possible that where clever agents of this kind exist, town houses may discover that it suits their purpose better to push their business through them, than by direct communication with the consumer.

The Parcels Post may in time have a very potent effect on country life, in one of those indirect ways in which far-reaching social reforms act. The delivery of parcels in rural districts will, as the Post develops, require some machinery of conveyance different from that which now exists. It speaks well for the popularity of the postman that the one remark which every one has made about the Parcels Post is,—What will happen to the rural letter-carrier? Most persons living in the country know of some case in which a postman walks eight, ten, or even fifteen miles on his round, often through by-ways and footpaths. Although no one can blame Mr. Fawcett for not providing at first for a traffic which will only come in time, it is clear that the delivery of letters on foot in rural districts, though continued in most places for the present, is doomed by the Parcels Post. Sooner or later, all country deliveries must be performed by cart. Is there any reason why the system of conveyance thus necessitated should not be adapted also to provide that means of communication across country which is so absolutely wanting at present? To reach any place five miles from a railway station without a private carriage means an expenditure of 7s. or 8s., a charge prohibitory on persons of small means. Even for the wealthy, the difference between living near and at a distance from a station is very keenly felt. Constant journeys of several miles are troublesome and expensive, even when performed by one's own horses and servants. On the other hand, it will be very burdensome on the Post Office to maintain a large staff of horses and carts exclusively for the mail service. To own them is contrary to the practice of the Department. As Government accounts do not distinguish between capital and income, it is inconvenient to keep up an extensive plant. But to contract for them will be costly, if the contractor is to rely for his profits on the Post Office alone. If by degrees a system of passenger conveyance could be organised in connection with the collection and delivery of letters and parcels throughout rural districts, a most valuable boon would be incidentally conferred upon the country. To facilitate communication between towns and villages would be to quicken the life of the latter, while increasing the means of refreshment by association with rural quiet and beauty, of which the inhabitants of towns stand so much in need. Perhaps, by such speculations as these, we may be over-rating the effects of such a very simple thing as the carriage of parcels by Post; but it is certainly difficult to limit the results which may flow from a change penetrating into every corner of social life.

NATIONAL PARKS.

SOME of us must have been tempted, when we read the account in the Times of the wonders of the Yellowstone National Park, to envy its happy possessors. It was not so much the extraordinary natural features of the district that aroused this feeling, as the fact that they all belong to the American people. But for this, we know by experience what would in the end become of them. The shores of Niagara do not belong to the people, and the consequence is that every day sees them worse disfigured. From the greed of the speculative builder, or of the owner whose one object is how to exact a toll from the traveller for permission to use his eyes, the Yellowstone District is for ever free. When Lord Lorne visited British Columbia last year, he urged the inhabitants to follow the example of the United States in this respect. Wherever, he said, you find some region of unusual loveliness, I advise you to make a national park of it. In years to come, when British Columbia becomes populous, you will have cause to rejoice over what you have done." Great Britain is a country not less populous to-day than British Columbia or the United States will be in fifty or a hundred years. The need to exchange the crowded city, or the scarcely less crowded suburb, for the real country, for the solitude of the mountain-top or the cheerful silence of the fells, is as great in England now as it is likely to be in America a century hence. Yet the possibilities of supplying that need are constantly becoming fewer. Though enclosure is a harder process than it was—thanks to the Commons Preservation Society—it is still a great deal too easy, and much can be done to deprive the public of country to which they have heretofore had access, without going the length of inclosure. Footpaths can be stopped up; bridle-roads can be diverted; land which has never been common, but of which the use has been virtually free to the public, is turned to account in ways which are of more benefit to the owner; and against all this, the Commons Preservation Society can do but little. Then there is always the possibility that the lord of the manor and the commoners may agree upon terms which, while they make the enclosure less obnoxious to those who have private rights in it, leave it as much a source of annoyance as ever to the public at large. The law, it must not be forgotten, knows nothing of the public at large. It protects the minority who have specific rights in a common, but it does nothing for the majority, who only ask that the common shall be kept open. Thus the cause of Commons Preservation is exposed to two great dangers,—one, that the public interest in their maintenance is necessarily less watchful than the private interest in their destruction; the other, that the public interest in their maintenance can only be defended in roundabout ways. Those who most feel that interest may have no title to be heard in behalf of it, and those who have such a title may have been induced to part with it. Of late, indeed, enclosure has for the time ceased to be the enemy that Commons have most cause to fear. A new railway asks leave to take a very small piece of a common, and the request is sure to be supported by the whole Railway interest in Parliament. Party ties do not unite men half so closely as the brotherhood that subsists between Railway Directors. They may be Whig, Tory, or Radical, but where Railways are concerned they are always to be found in the same lobby. Now, this little fraction of the common which the Railway Company wants to have commonly happens to be so placed as to destroy the beauty of the remainder. Indeed, what was a common before, often ceases after the railway has been made to be anything more than two strips of waste land, divided by a cutting or an embankment. It is difficult, however, for the Commons Preservation Society to be as much on the alert as the Company which is directly concerned in getting the railway made as cheaply as possible. This Session, indeed, the guardians of the public interest have been remarkably successful; but we can hardly doubt that they will some day be found napping, when some railway project is before Parliament, and only wake to the extent of the mischief when the time for averting it has gone by.

Why should not England follow the example of the United States, and convert some of the districts which most lend themselves to this treatment into National Parks? Probably the suggestion will almost take away the reader's breath. The tremendous compensation which the transfer of large tracts of land from private to public ownership would seem to involve, will be thought to be a conclusive argument against such a scheme. But then, in the way in which we should propose to effect this transfer, there need be no very large sum spent in compensation. We do not propose that any of the rights of ownership, as they are at present exercised, should be interfered with. All we ask is that no new development of these rights should be permitted. Let us take, by way of an instance, the Lake District,—the one, perhaps, of all England that, by its manageable size and its surpassing charm, would have the first claim to be put to this use. There would not be the least need to expropriate the existing owners of land. If the face of the country is simply left as it is, there will be ample room for any number of visitors in search of natural beauty. All that is really required is that it should be left as it is. Mansions, cottages, parks, woods, gardens, and sporting rights of all kinds, as they now exist there, are found not to interfere with the full enjoyment by the public of all that the district has to offer. What threatens to interfere with this enjoyment is the extension of these rights. That more houses should be built, that more land should be inclosed, that game preservation should become stricter, that paths that are now open should be shut up, that railways should be made where none exist,—these are the dangers before which those who know and love the Lakes feel helpless, and it is precisely these dangers that the scheme of converting the district into a national park would meet. But when once the change had been effected, the landowners in the district would not be the worse, except prospectively. They would not be able to do anything that they have not done heretofore; but everything that they have done heretofore they would be able to do still. The single operation of the change would be to stereotype the existing order of things, to leave that enclosed which is enclosed, that open which is open, that public which is public, and that private which is private. No doubt, the destruction of these contingent rights would involve some compensation to the owners, but it would be very trifling, in comparison with the compensation that would be required if it were proposed to take from them anything that they now enjoy. Deprive a man of a mansion and a park that has been in his family for centuries, and you take away something which to him may be all but priceless. Say to him that he must never turn his park into building land, and you forbid him merely to do what, unless he should be cursed with a spendthrift heir, he would never think of doing. So, again, if it were proposed to throw open the woods which are now consecrated to the production of pheasants, the owner might feel that his property no longer possessed the quality for which he chiefly valued it. But if he were merely forbidden to shut up woods in which the passer-by is now permitted to roam at will, in order to breed more pheasants, the quality which the property would lose would be something purely contingent and future. The basis, therefore, on which compensation must be calculated would be altogether different from that which must be taken in the case of an extinction of actual and long-exercised rights. We do not say that the plan could be carried out without cost or without difficulty. But when it is considered how impossible it will be to preserve some of the most beautiful districts in England at any less expenditure, whether of money or trouble, and how great the loss of these districts will be to the next generation of Englishmen, we feel that some strong effort should be made to keep them, and that the best chance of making it to good purpose must be looked for in the direction which has now been indicated.

MORAL SCAVENGERING.

IT is difficult to look upon the method by which James Carey brought the murderers of Lord Frederick Cavendish to justice, and by which the Irishman O'Donnell has now assassinated Carey, as anything but one of moral scavengering. There appear to be human beings, and not a few of them, who discharge no purpose more beneficent than that of removing the moral offal with which human society is loaded. As it appears to be a law of nature that wherever there is a good deal of carrion, there there are either dogs or birds to do the work of scavengers in clearing away that carrion, so it appears to be also a law of human nature that wherever there is much moral carrion, there, too, there will be creatures of some kind whose nature impels them to make away with that carrion. Thus, where there are assassins in plenty there are sure to be spies in plenty, and where there are spies in plenty there are pretty sure to be assassins in plenty; and the one set prey upon the other, to the temporary relief, though not, certainly, to the permanent relief of mankind,—for spies, though they bring assassins to justice, do not do anything to render the spirit of the assassin less frequent,—rather, indeed, to stimulate it into activity, so far as they themselves are concerned; and assassins, though they destroy the spies, do not do anything to extinguish the spirit of the informer, for they intensify that temper of cowardice and fear in which the spirit of the informer is most successfully bred. It will never be by moral scavengers like James Carey and his murderer that either the bloodthirsty vindictiveness, or the mean and craven cunning, of our day will be eradicated. Courage will never take the place of cowardice in any people amongst whom assassination is common; and without a popular diffusion of courage, the spy will never disappear. Nor will the habit of assassination disappear till the popular feeling which resents this covert mode of attacking enemies, and marks out those who use it for execration, becomes more widely spread. Scavengers afford a temporary relief to the inhabitants of a country where carrion is plentiful, but they do not remove the causes of that wide-spread moral putridity. Still, we may fairly say that they are useful, up to a certain point. The desperate moral evils which lead to the prevalence of assassination would be in danger of indefinite expansion, if they were not necessarily accompanied by the fear of treachery; and the desperate moral evils which lead to treachery would be almost intolerable, if they were not limited by the moral loathing that leads to assassination. The two evils,—dreadful as each of them is,—reciprocally impose a certain limit on each other, without which they might spread almost indefinitely. The fear felt of the James Careys of life is almost the only fear to which ruffians like Brady seem to be in any degree amenable; and the fear felt of avengers like O'Donnell is almost the only fear to which hypocrites like Carey seem to be in any degree amenable. These two almost intolerable evils certainly tend to limit each other, though not in any degree to extinguish each other; they limit the natural expansiveness by which bloody passions seem possessed on the one hand, and by which treachery breeds treachery on the other. If the spirit of murder did not fear betrayal, we hardly know where it would stop. And if the universal distrust diffused by hypocritical pretences did not fear the knife, we hardly know how far it might not be able to eat its corrupt way into the very heart of society.

It seems a paradox to say that the Careys of society limit the number of Bradys, and the O'Donnells of society the number of Careys, and yet to say in the same breath, as we have done, that the spirit which renders the one set of evils possible, breeds directly the other set of evils. But it is only the sort of paradox of which life is made up. It is true, for instance, that prisons and the use of them are a very real limit on violence; and it is also true that the violence which is bred by the tyrannical disposition to make an over-use of prisons, has a very decided tendency to render that over-use of them less likely. Nevertheless, the redundancy of violence leads directly to the use of Bastilles, and the redundancy of Bastilles leads directly to the use of violence. Evil generates evil, even though the evil generated may limit the evil which generates it, just as a bottle may be so full of water that when you turn it upside down the water will not flow out. There is really no manner of doubt that the prevalence of people like Brady engenders the spy; and there is no manner of doubt that the prevalence of spies engenders assassins like O'Donnell; and yet, true as this is, it is also true that the existence of traitors in countries of violence prevents the rapid increase of violence which might otherwise take place, and that the existence of men of violence in a country of traitors prevents the rapid increase of traitors which might otherwise take place. The assassin produces the spy but also intimidates him; and so puts a limit to the number of spies. The spy produces the assassin, but also intimidates him, and so puts a limit to the number of assassins. There is no paradox, except the paradox which accompanies almost every kind of life, in saying that while evil generates evil, it is also mercifully ordered that these reciprocally-produced evils limit each other's growth, and so provide a breathing-space, as it were, during which those who abhor both evils equally, may look for, and perhaps find, a partial remedy. Moral scavengers are no remedies for putridity; but they may prevent that enormous and rapid increase of putridity which would take place if evils only generated each other, and did not also to some extent interfere with and put fetters on each others' growth. If the kingdom of evil were not necessarily divided against itself, its prospects of final victory would be even more threatening than they are.

That evils which breed evils should, nevertheless, tend to limit the spread of the very evils they breed, is the one feature in evil which distinguishes it from good. True good does not interfere with and limit good, as evil interferes with and limits evil. Genuine goodheartedness, the absence of suspicion, like Lord Frederick Cavendish's, may now and then offer the opportunity for an act of deep guilt; but it never engenders the spirit of guilt, as violence causes treachery and treachery causes violence. On the contrary, good-will fosters genuine trust, and genuine trust fosters good-will. There is no mutually limiting element about the virtues of men, as there is about their sins. Luckily for us, one vice is often the scourge as well as the parent of another vice; but one virtue is always the parent, and the parent only, of other virtues. Doubtless, we may find philanthropy breeding cynicism, but then the philanthropy which breeds cynicism is sure to be a spurious philanthropy, something which, while it professes to love the race at large, is heartless enough to individuals. Evil interferes with and embarrasses evil, as good never interferes with and embarrasses good. Evils are always devouring each other's offspring, like the Gods of heathen fable but then these reciprocal voracities never result in much real good, but only at most in the limitation of evil. Carey is no remedy for Brady, nor O'Donnell for Carey. To get any remedy for such monster evils, we must try and inspire the mutual good-will which renders the assassin hateful, and the hearty trust which renders the spy still more hateful. That was what Lord Frederick Cavendish went to Ireland to do, and fell in the hope of doing. We may recognise with thankfulness that the worst types of evil limit, even while they generate, each other; but they never remedy each other. For a remedy of any kind, we must sow germs of good, and not of evil. Those are the only scavengers which turn rottenness into health, and never turn health into rottenness.

WILLS versus CROMWELL.

MR. WILLS'S drama of Charles I. was, thanks in great part to Mr. Irving, a remarkable success. By making Cromwell appear a vulgar and canting ruffian, and Charles I. as not only a hero and a martyr, but also a modern gentleman, with superior manners and a melancholy smile, a contrast is produced which gives rise to some exceedingly dramatic situations. This method of treatment was admirably adapted for the respectable audiences which wept nightly over the kingly griefs, and when to the emotions of sentimental loyalty were added those of the domestic hearth caused by the farewell scene between Charles and his children, the triumph of the dramatist was complete. Nor was the triumph an illegitimate one. From the days when Sophocles and Euripides moulded the popular legends to suit their own views of dramatic necessity, the dramatist, like the novelist, has always been allowed a poetic licence in dealing with the personages and events of legend and history. So long as the main features are preserved, so long as Achilles is "impiger, iracundus, inexorabilis, acer," and so long as Medea is fierce and Orestes sad, no one can complain. Nor, so long as there is some traditional authority for a particular dramatic view of people and things historical, can the historian object.

Now, there is no denying that there is a traditional view of Charles and Cromwell which justifies Mr. Wills's treatment. It is the view of the Restoration and the historian of the time of the third George, suited to the prejudices and passions of the period in which it was put together. But when Mr. Wills is brought to book, and contends not merely that he was justified as a dramatist in the method of treatment he adopted, but that he was right historically, he leaves himself at the mercy of hostile criticism. In a long letter to the Times, last week, he was impelled by some evil genius to leave the fortress of dramatic fitness and venture out into the open field of historic fact, and to give chapter and verse in support of his contention. As the character of Cromwell does, in fact, involve more or less that of the great bulk of the English nation at that time, it is just as well to show that the series of libels put forward by Mr. Wills are not, as he alleges in his defence, true in substance and in fact.

The greater part of the references given by him may be at once dismissed. Hallam, Godwin, and Mr. Jesse are only second-hand authorities, whose opinions must be taken for what they are worth, and would be easily out-balanced by quotations from Carlyle or Gardiner, or Mr. J. A. Picton, Cromwell's latest biographer. They deal mainly with such points as Cromwell's hypocrisy and tyranny. Of the latter, the only instances cited are the establishment of the Major-Generals, and a general complaint by that staunch Republican, Ludlow. Now, the division of the country into Major-Generalships undoubtedly showed that it was on the brink of military despotism. But it is to be noted that the civil authorities were not superseded, that the Generals were sent out for purely military purposes, namely, to repress any further attempts at Royalist risings like the very serious one which they had just put down, and that they had no general powers of government. Still, no doubt, the measure was wholly "unconstitutional," and was justifiable solely as a means of stopping, as it did stop, further civil war. But a measure taken in time of revolution which is unconstitutional is not necessarily tyrannical. "Tyranny," in English, whatever it may have done in Greek, implies cruelty, unnecessary cruelty, unnecessary arbitrariness and harshness. No one has contended that, in England at least, Cromwell's government was cruel, and the general acquiescence in it, and Cromwell's many attempts to put it and keep it on a constitutional footing, are sufficient evidence that it was not unnecessarily harsh, nor, in intention at least, wholly arbitrary.

The charge of hypocrisy is one which it is only less difficult to disprove than to prove. It is chiefly founded on the fact that Cromwell was given to praying, that he gave thanks to God for his victories, and generally "made Him his journeyman." But this is common, especially in times of fighting. Even at the outbreak of the Franco-German war, both the Emperor and the King appealed to the God of Battles, and Te Deums are a recognised method of celebrating victories. Moreover, if the frequent use of prayer and the name of God is a proof of hypocrisy, then was Charles equally a hypocrite. Witness Sir Philip Warwick, whom Mr. Wills has himself put into the box:—"His exercises of religion were most exemplary. . . . Every morning and evening he spent some time in private meditation, and through the whole week never failed before he sat down to dinner to have part of the Liturgy read unto him and his menial servants, were he never so hungry, or so late in, &c." At all events, it must be allowed in Cromwell's favour that he began to be pious before his piety could have begun to be useful, when he was tithe-lessee to the Dean and Chapter of Ely; and that his piety once led him, according to another of Mr. Wills's witnesses, Heath, to return £20 which he had won at play in his less pious days.

But the main charge against Cromwell (which is made a turning-point in the play) is that he negotiated with the King to be made Earl of Essex, and on the King's refusal vowed his death. The sole authority for this is a statement by Mr. Jesse that there "is a well-known tradition" to that effect, and a quotation from James Heath, on which, of course, that tradition is founded. This personage is the author of what Carlyle calls "a little, brown, lying book," or pamphlet, entitled "Flagellum," published in 1663, when the "White Terror" and the gallows were in full swing, and judicial murders, like that of Sir Henry Vane, were being daily perpetrated; while the ignoble vengeance of the Stuarts and their hangers-on vented itself even on the dead,—not only on the dead bodies of Cromwell and Ireton and the hero Blake, but even on the dead body of Cromwell's poor old mother. This "Flagellum" has never been publicly and thoroughly flagellated as it deserves to be. It is a tissue of ludicrous lies and palpable absurdities, and it would be about as rational to adopt the story told by a "drunk and incapable" of the conduct of the policeman who took him up, as it would to believe its evidence against Cromwell. Here is a sketch of Cromwell's early life, gathered from its veracious pages. He was a notorious "apple dragon," or robber of orchards, as a boy; "from this he passed into another more manly theft, the robbing of dove-houses." He was whipped, by his father's order, for dreaming he should be King of England. "There was none so infamed for drinking, wenching, and the like outrages, as this young Tarquin." He was accordingly sent to Lincoln's Inn, "under pretence of his studying the law" (a pretence which a good many other young squires before and since have been under), but there "found law so contrary to his loose and libertine spirit that he spent his time in an inward spight, which for that space exceeded the enormous extravagance of his former viciousness." Then he became pious (of course, hypocritically), and when he set up farming, used to "continue prayers with the farm labourers so long, that it was nine o'clock in the morning before they began their work." The effect of this was remarkable. "The ploughmen, seeing this zeal of their master, which dispensed with the profitable and most commodious part of the day for their labour, thought they might borrow the other part of it for their pleasure, and therefore they commonly went to the plough with a pack of cards in their pockets, and having turned up two or three furrows, set themselves down to game till dinner-time, when they returned to the second part of their devotion," with the result that "scarce half a crop ever reared itself upon his grounds;" and so forth. Surely, Mr. Wills can never have looked inside the book he quotes, or he would not in cold-blood cite the "banalities" of "Carrion" Heath as an authority. How well he deserves the epithet of "Carrion," we cannot soil these pages by showing. Suffice it to refer to the passage where the young Oliver is ducked for misbehaviour at his uncle's house, and his details of old Oliver's death, when his body was "so full of corruption" that they were "forced to bury him out of hand," and the grand lying-in-state which he describes was, in consequence, that of a sham corpse. But we may reject at once and for ever a tradition which is taken from such a polluted hand as that of Mr. James Heath, sometime student (to his shame be it spoken) of Christ Church, Oxford.

The other chief instance of treachery and duplicity towards Charles urged by Mr. Wills is found in "his cruel wiles to lure away the King to Carisbrook detailed in Sir Philip Warwick's Memoirs of the reign, 1702." Now, again, one is tempted to ask whether Mr. Wills has ever read the book he refers to, because, if so, he must have been in a trance with his eyes not open, but shut. Sir Philip, who, though a vehement Royalist, is at least a gentleman, does not give the smallest countenance to the story that Charles was lured to Carisbrooke by Cromwell. He does, indeed, imply that Cromwell frightened him away from Hampton Court, by pretending (what after events proved to be the fact) that he could not "withstand the torrent of the agitators," who "were like to seize upon his Majesty and murder him." But he distinctly says, "It came not within my knowledge who gave the counsell for his flight, or what was resolved about it," though he was told of the project before it was executed; but "I could not concur for his making a mean (since it was like to be a dangerous) flight." But "being carried off by Mr. John Ashburnham, Sir John Berkeley, and Mr. William Legg onely, the next wee heard of him was that he was in Carisbrook Castle." The King himself told him he did not think he had been betrayed, and Warwick says:—"If it be lawfull to conjecture the choosing this place did not arise from a beleife either of the King or Mr. Ashburnham in the Governour, but from the failing of some ship there [viz., at Southampton] expected. His Majesty like a sick man, was willing to change his bed, and see whether it would better his condition. But that, when he was out of their hands, he should freely put himself into their power again, this, as it has heretofore bin my amazement, now requires my silence." Berkeley and Ashburnham, in their respective accounts of the episode, try to throw the blame on each other; but neither says that the other was a traitor, and Lord Clarendon comes to the conclusion that they were both honest, and says that the King never thought there was any treachery about it. He hints, indeed, that the King and his servants were outwitted by Cromwell, though how that could be he does not attempt to show, nor is it easy to see how Cromwell could have been benefited by the King's flight, nor what security he could have had that it would not end in the King's getting away altogether. There is, on the other hand, no doubt that Charles was then playing a double, or rather a treble game, trying to play off the Army against Parliament, and the Scots against both, and this flight was probably the gamester's throw to get rid of all three.

There is not space to follow Mr. Wills into his other charges of bravado, of cruelty, of vandalism, and even of avarice. The last is quite a novel accusation, and is easily refuted. The true story of the Marquis of Worcester's estates is that Cromwell was voted a sum of money amounting to £1,680 a year out of them, in recognition of his services, and in a few months afterwards he gave £1,000 a year of it to Parliament, for the war in Ireland. If he shared the Duke of Buckingham's estates, he shared them with Lord Fairfax, who became the Duke's father-in-law, and equally should share the charge of rapacity. But it is the same throughout. What Cromwell did was done also by Fairfax, up to the King's execution. It is impossible to suppose that the friend of Hampden and of Fairfax was a mere canting vulgarian, or that such a character would ever have commanded the confidence and respect of the party and the majority of the nation. Those who fix this character on Cromwell do so by looking to after-events, and fall into the logical fallacy of post hoc, ergo propter hoc. Because Cromwell was driven by circumstances to assist in the execution of Charles, and afterwards to take his place on the throne, it is assumed that he always had these objects before him. But in real life, and especially in times of revolution, people do not form these deep designs. They meet the needs of the moment, and are thankful if they can keep their own heads above water. That Cromwell was an enthusiast no one can doubt, and that, like many men, enthusiasts and others than enthusiasts, he thought his own views, and perhaps his own interests, coincided with those of God and Fatherland, may perhaps be conceded. But it is time that all sensible people gave the go-by to "Carrion" Heath, and his foolish slanders.

MIRAGE—MENTAL AND PHYSICAL.

WE believe that the phenomena of Mirage, or Fata Morgana, as they are seen in the Desert, are well known to be due not to mere illusion, but to the displaced images of real objects, which, by reflection from some well-defined stratum of the atmosphere, are transported some scores or hundreds of miles from the place of the originals to which they owe their existence. An admirable description of a mirage of this kind is given in the August Cornhill, the writer, who seems to lay the foundation at least of his tale in fact, stating that at a certain solitary telegraph station on the Red Sea, which he calls Um el Jemal, the occupants of the station used to see for fifty minutes at a time, and repeatedly from day to day, a mirage of the same remarkable building, "an ancient building of great size, castellated, with a broad terrace before its massive gateway." Wahabees were seen walking in numbers along the terrace, so that the observer felt sure that, wherever the castle might be, it was a centre of Wahabee revolt. By copying the scene as it appeared in the mirage, and inquiring of travellers, one of the telegraph clerks at length learnt where the castle was situated, and found out that it was, as he had conjectured from the character of the constantly recurring vision, one of the secret centres of Wahabee conspiracy. It is represented that not the castle only, but the particular persons frequenting the castle, could be seen so clearly in this magic mirror provided by the strange conditions of the atmosphere, as to be recognised and rendered quite familiar to the inhabitants of this little lonely telegraph post on the Red Sea, distant, apparently, some hundreds of miles away. Whether the phenomena of the mirage are really so vivid as this, that you can see the images of what happens at so great a distance as if it were close at hand, we do not profess to know, though the writer of this paper evidently means so to represent it. We should have thought that would have been possible only if the atmosphere could furnish telescopic apparatus to magnify the reflected image, as well as reflecting surfaces by the aid of which to alter and falsify its apparent locality. But be this as it may, there seems to be no doubt that in special localities the desert does present lively pictures of all sorts of distant scenes, sometimes curiously blended together, and sometimes topsy-turvy. Caravans which are not within some scores of miles of the place will apparently pass through it, sometimes in regular order, sometimes with both men and camels marching on their heads. Ships-of-war—probably on the Red Sea—will appear to sail through the desert, side by side with these caravans, so that the mirage grotesquely collects together, like the sheet on which a magic-lantern is displayed, the most ill-assorted collection of images from the real world, and unites them in places where they are quite inconsistent with each other.

Now, it has struck us, in reading the account of some very curious experiments just issued by the "Society for Psychical Research," that there is a curious analogy between the physical phenomena of mirage as seen in the Desert, and the mental phenomena of what the Society call "thought-transference." In the former case, we suppose, the reflection is the result of well-known physical laws; in the latter case, the reflection which appears to take place between mind and mind is the result of very imperfectly known mental laws; but none the less, there is a frequent illustration of that curious inversion or topsy-turvyness in the image which seems to be so often observed in the physical reflection of the mirage, and which in that case is, of course, a very ordinary consequence of the same law which makes the left side of the face in a plain mirror appear to be the right side, and the right side appear as the left. But we should by no means expect that mental reflection would be subject to any sort of inversion of the same kind, and yet it often appears to be so, though by no means uniformly. Thus, in the curious experiments recorded by Mr. Gurney and Mr. Myers, on the transference of Mr. Blackburn's thoughts to the mind of Mr. G. A. Smith, who is described as a young mesmerist living at Brighton, we have many instances of this inversion, though many, too, where, as also in the case of the mirage, there is no such inversion. We will give the record of one set of experiments as a whole. It is only in the last paragraph that the account of this curious inversion occurs:—

"BRIGHTON EXPERIMENTS."

In the last Report (p. 63), a letter is quoted from Mr. Blackburn, of Brighton, who is now an associate of our Society, and who is a very painstaking and accurate observer, to the effect that he had obtained remarkable results in thought-reading, or will-impression, with a Mr. G. A. Smith, a young mesmerist living at Brighton.

We entered into correspondence with Mr. Blackburn, who thereupon took the trouble to send us a paper recording in detail his experiments with Mr. Smith. These statements appeared to be so carefully made, that two of our number, Mr. Myers and Mr. Gurney (Mr. Barrett being unable to go at the time), arranged to pay a visit to Brighton, personally to investigate the joint experiments of Mr. Blackburn and Mr. Smith. These gentlemen most obligingly placed themselves at our service, and a series of trials were made in our own lodgings at Brighton. The results of these trials give us the most important and valuable insight into the manner of the mental transfer of a picture which we have yet obtained.

Mr. Blackburn has frequently practised thought-reading with Mr. Smith; but at the time when our first experiments were made, he had been accustomed to hold Mr. Smith's hand, or touch his forehead, with a view to communicating the impression. No unconscious pressure, however, could have communicated to the subject the definite words and pictures enumerated below. Though some of the early experiments are not striking, we prefer to give the whole series, that a due estimate may be formed of the chances against mere coincidence as an explanation.

EXPERIMENTS MADE AT OUR OWN ROOMS, BRIGHTON, DECEMBER 3RD, 1882.—Present: Mr. Edmund Gurney, Mr. F. W. H. Myers, Mr. Douglas Blackburn, hereafter called B., and Mr. G. A. Smith, hereafter called S.

S. was blindfolded at his own wish to aid in concentration, and during the experiment sat with his back turned to the experimenters.

B. holds S.'s hand, and asks him to name a colour, written down by one of us and shown to B. It is needless to say the strictest silence was preserved during each experiment.*

COLOUR SELECTED.	ANSWER.
Expt. 1.—Gold	Gilt, colour of picture-frame.
" 2.—Light wood	Dark brown, slaty.
" 3.—Crimson	Fiery-looking, red.
" 4.—Black	Dark, black.
" 5.—Oxford blue.....	Yellow, grey, blue.
" 6.—White	Green, white.
" 7.—Orange.....	Reddish brown.
" 8.—Black	I am tired, and see nothing.

After a rest, numbers were then tried in the same way.

	NUMBER SELECTED.	ANSWER.
Expt. 9.—	35	34
" 11.—	7	7

Several trials of colours and numbers were now made with S. and B. in separate rooms, which failed. Names were next tried, written down and shown to B., who then took S.'s hand as before. There was, as usual, no sound nor movement of the lips on the part of any one:—

	NAME CHOSEN.	ANSWER.
Expt. 12.—	Barnard	Harland, Barnard.
" 13.—	Bellairs	Humphreys, Ben Novis, Benaris.
" 14.—	Johnson	Jobson, Johnson.
" 15.—	Regent Street	Rembrandt Steeth, Regent Street.

Two names were then tried without any contact, as follows:—

	NAME CHOSEN.	ANSWER.
Expt. 16.—	Hobhouse	Hunter.
" 17.—	Black	Drake, Blake.

Contact between S. and B. was now resumed by our express desire, as the increased effort of concentration, needed when there was no contact, brought on neuralgia in B.:—

	NAME CHOSEN.	ANSWER.
Expt. 18.—	Queen Anne	Queechy, Queen.
" 19.—	Wissenschaft	Wissie, Wissenaft.

As B. was ignorant of German, he mentally represented the word "Wissenschaft" in English fashion.

Pains were then experimented on. One of us held a sofa cushion close before S.'s face, so that vision of anything on the other side of it was absolutely impossible (he was also blindfolded); and the other pinched or otherwise hurt B., who sat opposite S., holding his outstretched hand. S. in each case localised the pain in his own person, after it had been kept up pretty severely upon B.'s person for a time varying from one to two minutes.

" 22.—	Hair on top of head	Hair on top of head.

These experiments were very striking in the accuracy of the indications given by S. This form of transmission of sensations might with advantage be more widely attempted.

We next drew a series of diagrams of a simple geometrical kind, which were placed behind S., so that B. could see them. S. described them in each case correctly, except that he generally reversed them, seeing the upper side of the diagram downward, the right hand side to the left, &c."

One of the experiments last named was this,—a grotesque Aunt Sally figure was drawn upside down, and so shown to Mr. Blackburn. Mr. Smith, in describing it, said,—“I see a sort of circle, a stick with a lump at the top, an Aunt-Sally sort of thing.” And subsequently, when they experimented for the express purpose of finding out whether there were any such law of inversion, it was discovered that laterally the arrow was inverted as often as not, though when placed vertically it was almost always rightly described:—

“We have now to describe some experiments which were undertaken to test whether the mental inversion of the object that had been noticed in some of the early trials was accidental or otherwise. Mr. Smith, having been carefully blindfolded, sat with his back to us, in a darkened room—some heavy opaque curtains being between him and us. An arrow having been drawn on a sheet of white paper, it was held by one of us in sight of Mr. Blackburn, who remained in our presence, and sat facing the same way as Mr. Smith. In answer to the query, ‘How is the arrow pointing?’ spoken by one of the Committee in a uniform tone of voice, Mr. Smith called out the direction as he mentally perceived it. We turned the arrow noiselessly, and at random, in different directions, and noted the following series of replies:—

* Nothing was said when S. named the colour, and where more than one colour is mentioned, he gave the colours successively without fresh question.

TRUE POSITION OF ARROW.	POSITION AS STATED BY SMITH.	TRUE POSITION OF ARROW.	POSITION AS STATED BY SMITH.
1. Pointing up.	Pointing up.	22. P't'g. to right.	Pointing to right.
2. " to left.	" to right.	23. " to left.	" to left.
3. " down.	" down.	24. " to right.	" to right.
4. " to right.	" to right.	25. " up.	" up.
5. " up.	" up.	26. " down.	" down.
6. " to left.	" to right.	27. " up.	" up.
7. " up.	" up.	28. " up.	" up.
8. " up.	" up.	29. " to left.	" to left.
9. " up.	" up.	30. " to right.	" to right.

After the 37th trial, Mr. Blackburn was obliged to leave; but we continued the experiments, one or two of the Committee taking Mr. Blackburn's place, and with fair success. Counting these last, we made in all 42 trials. In these the arrow was held in a perpendicular position, up or down, 23 times; and of these cases 20 were guessed rightly, 3 wrongly. It was held in a horizontal position, right or left, 19 times; and of these cases 7 guessed rightly, 12 wrongly. The three wrong guesses when the arrow was in a perpendicular position occurred after Mr. Blackburn had left us; and in these cases the error was not one of inversion. Of the 12 wrong guesses, when the arrow was held horizontally, 8 were lateral inversions of the position of the arrow, as if it were seen in a mirror."

Thus, while, as in the case of the mirage, the pictures are frequently seen as they would ordinarily be seen by human eyes, they are often, as in the case of the mirage, more or less inverted images, "as if seen in a mirror," as the Committee themselves describe it. We call attention to this partly because it bears on the so-called brain-wave theory, and seems to show that the transmitted thought is not—in this case, at least—the mere result of a nerve-motion set up in one mind by sympathy with the other, as a vibration in a tuning-fork will be set up if it is placed in the neighbourhood of a vibrating tuning-fork of appropriate length. If that were the explanation, there could be no inversion between right and left, top and bottom; what Mr. Blackburn had imaged to himself as on the right, Mr. Smith would have seen also as on the right, and what Mr. Blackburn had imaged to himself as uppermost, Mr. Smith would not have imaged to himself as undermost. It is clear, however, that no inversion of the kind took place where the question was of the seat of pain,—the left arm was distinguished as the left arm, and the right ear as the right ear; yet, when it became a question of describing a drawing, it often seemed as if Mr. Smith had been gazing at an inverted image of what Mr. Blackburn saw. Was what he saw a mental mirage in any true sense? If so, there would be a real analogy between the laws of reflection, which so often give an inverted image in the case of a mirage, and the law of thought-transference, which so often turns right into left and left into right in the transference. That there is something corresponding to the mirage of the desert, in the vision which some people seem to gain into the scenery of the minds of others, these curious investigations of the Society for Psychical Research appear to show. And the Society will do well to take particular note of the cases in which these strange inversions appear,—for in them it is quite possible that they may find some key to the connection between the physical and the mental laws so closely associated in our lives.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

LORD CLIVE'S DEATH.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In reference to the doubts in last week's Spectator as to the circumstances of Lord Clive's death, permit me to say that the accounts derived from those present leave no doubt that he died by his own hand.

His old Indian secretary and devoted friend, Henry Strachey, Mrs. Strachey, and Miss Ducarel, were in the house at the time. Lord Clive got up from the card-table and left the room. Not returning, Mr. Strachey said to his wife, "You had better go and see where my lord is." She went out, and found him lying with his throat cut with a penknife. She told the story to her son (my uncle), the late Sir Henry Strachey, in all its details, and I have heard him repeat it more than once. His father, he said, could never bear to refer to the subject. When Mr. Gleig's "Life" came out, Sir Henry Strachey pointed out to me some details of the account of Lord Clive's death which did not agree with those he had heard from his mother. And from this I infer that Mr. Gleig derived his information from the Ducarel family, and not from ours.

My uncle, who had the fullest means of knowing the facts, always treated as absurd the notion that Clive was haunted by remorse, or ever reproached himself for his political conduct in India or at home. In a letter existing among our papers, Lord Clive writes:—"How miserable is my condition! I have a disease which makes life insupportable, but which my doctors say will not shorten it one hour." And this is the simple and sufficient explanation of his act. It surely argues a misapprehension of Clive's character—never ignoble in his ends, while hard and unscrupulous in his means—to fancy that he was a victim of remorse. His defence of himself in the House of Commons gives his own estimate of his career. If the great German who so much resembles Clive in character, as to ends and means, were to find life "insupportable," would any one suspect him of remorse?—I am, Sir, &c.,

EDWARD STRACHEY.

THE RITUALISTS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—A Steamboat Company hires the services of a Captain, giving him instructions where to proceed, &c. On taking charge, the captain touches at many other places, alters the service of the vessel entirely. Would he be allowed to defy dismissal, keep charge of the vessel for ten years, draw his wages and enjoy the credit of being captain of a fine ship under a good Company, and when at last the law prevailed, would he be looked on as a martyr?

That for a term of years a man can defy the judgments of an English Court of Law, deemed properly constituted by an immense majority of our law-abiding race, is a serious blow to law and order. I suppose no action takes place at law without both parties thinking themselves right. Consider the result, if a general revolt took place of all unsuccessful suitors, and an absolute refusal to abide by an adverse decision! The Clergy are citizens. The same law which they are called upon to obey gives their peculiar status (not spiritual) of parish priests in certain localities, and recognises them as the representatives there of the English Church as by law established. The amount of the stipend has nothing whatever to do with the question, nor has the love of the people, which a man of great self-denial, kindliness, and work is sure to win in time, let his belief be what it may.

I am not advocating a cold, carelessly conducted service; but conformity to law. If a change of law is desirable, agitate by all legitimate means. An attempted evasion of the consequences of open defiance is not a happy solution of the difficulty, whoever the originator of it may be. Free men have a perfect right to hold and express any opinion, and the world is eager to give credit for hard work and noble attempts to ameliorate the condition of the poor, and bring religion into their lives. But a society with rules is not to be compromised by the action of an agent who throws the rules to the winds, after having freely accepted them. Is freedom all round to be swallowed? Why, lately, your own excellent article on the state of the Protestant Church at Geneva shows clearly the result of freedom too freely applied. Are we prepared, for the sake of individual liberty, to throw true liberty away? Are judgments to be defied? Is law to be turned into ridicule? The matter has now nothing whatever to do with religious belief or observances. It is just on the same footing with a decision that a man owing another £1,000, and refusing to pay, must be sold up, and payment made. Success founded on the degradation of the law of England will, when false sentiment is stripped from it, be found to have been purchased at too dear a price.—I am, Sir, &c., THOS. F. COLLINS.

[Analogies are apt to be deceptive, and Mr. Collins's analogy is not conclusive against Mr. Mackonochie, who is in the position of a captain receiving two contradictory orders,—that of the Judicial Committee in the Westerton case, and that of the same tribunal in the Purchas case. He has chosen to obey the decision which is supported by grammar, history, and common-sense. Besides, Mr. Collins will probably soon learn that a Royal Commission presided over by the late and present Primates, and of which Lord Penzance himself is a member, has recommended both of the Judicial Committee in Ecclesiastical Causes, and of Lord Penzance's

Court. Is not this an admission that there is good ground for dissatisfaction with those Courts? It would, of course, be much more satisfactory if bad laws could be reformed without disobeying them. But it is, unfortunately, the experience of this country that resistance to bad laws is often the most effectual way of getting them amended. Mr. Collins also passes by the injustice of enforcing a very doubtful law, to say the least, against an unpopular minority, while the majority are supposed to break with impunity laws which are not doubtful at all. Does Mr. Collins himself strictly obey all the rubrics of the Prayer-book?—Ed. Spectator.]

DR. MAUDSLEY ON FREE-WILL.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I was much surprised in reading Dr. Maudsley's explanation of what he considers the illusion of Free-will in your columns, to see that he makes no allusion, apparently, to a previous attempt at the same achievement by the greatest English thinker who has yet appeared on the side of unbelief. Hume discovers the genesis of our notion of Free-will in the fact that causation being no objective reality, but a mere figment of the human intellect, men are obliged to make an exception of the only kind of causation of which they have direct consciousness. They say, e.g., that water must freeze, when the temperature falls below 32°, meaning nothing more than that it does freeze, and imagining some mystic bond, where experience shows them nothing but invariable sequence. But when they come to the causes of their own actions, they find there is no must in the case. Hence they invent a second mystic entity—moral freedom—to save them from the consequence of the first physical causation, and remedy an imaginary rule by an exception which is equally imaginary,—a much more ingenious and subtle attempt, it appears to me, to explain away the primary convictions of our nature than that by which Hume's successors seem inclined to replace it, and one which affords a tribute, by its failure, to the impossibility of the thing attempted.—I am, Sir, &c.,

DO DOGS UNDERSTAND OUR LANGUAGE?

SIR,—I think the question has been mooted in your columns as to whether dogs sometimes understand our language. A circumstance that has just occurred leads me to think that it does happen, where they are highly organised and living much with their owners. While our family party were sitting over dessert, a cork jumped from an apollinaris-water bottle on the side-board. I took no notice at first, but after the conversation was ended, I got up and looked about for a few minutes, soon giving up the search. My brother asked what I was looking for, and I answered. I had no sooner sat down than our little dog crept from behind a piece of furniture, where she was reposing on the end of a rug, and went straight up to the cork, looking up at me and pointing to it with her nose. It was near me, but the shadow thrown by the table prevented my seeing it. She is a very nervous little fox-terrier, a most "comfort-loving animal," and spends her life with one or the other of us on my sofa, when her master is out, but hearing his voice at a great distance, and always attending to it.—I am, Sir &c.,

SIR,—Pray, Sir, have the kindness to inform an admiring but perplexed reader of your article on M. de Lesseps how, at five a.m., and with the sun, therefore, in the east, a rainbow could stretch from east to west, seeing that a rainbow is always at right angles to a line drawn from it to the sun, and must at that hour have stretched from north to south?—I am, Sir, &c.,

BOOKS.

MR. JULIAN HAWTHORNE'S LATEST NOVEL.*

To one who, like the present writer, is grateful to Mr. Julian Hawthorne for a large amount of peculiar but very genuine intellectual pleasure, the task of reviewing his latest novel is little less than painful. When we turn from such a book as Garth to the three volumes of Dust, the change is so great that we feel not only bewildered, but almost shocked. The failure is of a very curious character. There is no falling-off in mere cleverness, or even in some of the qualities of genius which Mr. Hawthorne has never failed to manifest; indeed, there are passages and chapters in Dust which, when surveyed apart from their surroundings, will stand the severe test of comparison with some of the author's best previous work; but there is a total absence of what may be called co-ordinating power; the writer's materials seem to be his masters, instead of his servants; and the work, as a whole, has the incoherence and inconsequentiality which are two of the most curious characteristics of dreams. Supposing it were possible for a man of genius to write a novel in some abnormal physical condition, such as somnambulism, trance, or the mental exaltation produced by opium, it would surely be a novel not unlike Dust, which leaves behind it the impression that its author, while retaining all his powers, has lost that conscious control over them which is essential to the production of coherent work.

The severest manner of reviewing Dust would be simply to condense the story, and leave readers to do their own criticism; but this method, which is seldom fair, would in the present case be more unfair than ever, for it would only throw into relief the incredible absurdities of character and plot which, in the novel itself, may be partially hidden from less careful readers by undoubted felicities of craftsmanship in matters of detail. It is, indeed, impossible to write intelligibly of the book without indicating to some extent the course of the story, but we shall make such indication as slight as possible. Mr. Julian Hawthorne is rather fond of enigmatical titles, and we hardly comprehend the relevance of his latest one, even as explained by Herrick's well-known couplet, upon the title-page:—

"Only the actions of the just Smell sweet and blossom in the dust."

We suppose that the just man whose actions are thus to smell sweet and blossom is a certain Mr. Charles John Grantley, who is barbarously murdered, in the middle of the second volume. Grantley has been a partner in a celebrated banking-house, at the head of which was his bosom friend, Sir Francis Bendibow. Sir Francis was also the unknown proprietor of a notorious West-end gambling-house; and at a time when this establishment was suffering from a run of ill-luck, he drew so largely from the funds of the bank that its solvency was in deadly peril. Driven to despair, the banker confessed his delinquencies to his friend and partner, who at once offered to sacrifice his entire fortune to replace the money which had been abstracted; but, unfortunately, such a replacement seemed impossible without a betrayal of the fact that it had been irregularly withdrawn. How this difficulty was overcome must be described in the words of the confession which Mr. Julian Hawthorne puts into the mouth of the dying Sir Francis:—

"'It must become known, Frank,' he said to me, 'that the bank has been robbed by somebody. You are the bank, and it stands or falls with you. It won't make so much difference about me. You may have what I've got, and I'll leave the country. Let 'em think that I took it, and that you replaced it. I can make my own way somewhere else under another name; and the concern will be saved. Take care of my wife and child; it won't do to take them with me, but maybe I can send for them after a bit. And do you let gambling alone for the future.'"

It would be a waste of time to expose the glaring moral absurdities of this situation. It is, in the first place, absolutely incredible that a high-minded man such as Grantley is represented to have been should have made such an outrageous offer, and it is equally impossible that he could have had any feelings of friendship for a person whom he could imagine capable of accepting it. But the incredibility only begins here, for Dust is not consistent even in absurdity. The story opens with Grantley's return to England, and his renewal of intercourse with Sir Francis Bendibow. The latter, without any reason for thinking that Grantley has become hostile to him, but with every reason for believing the contrary, manifests extraordinary uneasiness lest his ex-partner should reveal some secret the nature of which has not yet transpired; and, finally, after taking Grantley to dine with him at his country-house, sends his guest homeward along a lonely road, rides after him, and shoots him dead, wounding fatally at the same time his own son, who, by one of the extraordinary coincidences of which the book is full, has met Grantley a few minutes before the traitorous assassin makes his attack. It should be added that the situation is rendered still more wildly unintelligible by the fact that though the single object of the murder is to obtain possession of the letters relating to the affairs of twenty years back, which Grantley was known to carry with him, the murderer, as soon as his victim falls, rides away without making any attempt to secure the packet for which he has risked his neck.

A plot of this kind is devoid not only of the vraisemblance of the true novel, but of the imaginative consistency which is demanded by the wildest romance, but this defect sinks into insignificance beside the much graver defect of representing the action of Grantley as characterised by ideal nobility. In consenting to act the rôle of a felon in order to save a fraudulent gambler from ruin, this just man is unjust to himself; unjust to the wife and child whom he leaves with a disgraced name; unjust to the friends who have believed in him, and whose faith not only in one man, but in all men, must needs be shaken by his supposed fall; unjust to the customers of the bank whom he commits to the tender mercies of a gambling robber, and unjust even to the wretch whom he has befriended, and whom he condemns to something worse than ruin,—a life which is one long lie. That Sir Francis Bendibow is a scoundrel, is plain enough, but that Grantley is, as represented here, the blameless victim of his rascality, is an assumption too outrageous to deceive the least thoughtful reader of Dust.

We have already alluded to the extraordinary coincidences of which the book is full. Life undoubtedly has its coincidences, and art therefore may have them, too; but Mr. Julian Hawthorne piles them one upon another in a way that is neither life-like nor artistic. In the second chapter, three men, closely connected with each other, meet by perfect accident on the top of a stage-coach. The coach is overturned, and while two of the three are walking away in company from the scene of the catastrophe, they are overtaken by a lady who is the friend of one, and the unknown daughter of the other. Walking a little further, they enter a strange house in search of lodgings, and discover that the proprietor is the widow of an officer who, on the field of Waterloo, has been tended in his dying moments by the younger of the two travellers; while the elder proves to be the son of a man to whom, in her younger days, the widow had been deeply attached. Four such coincidences are surely enough for a whole novel; but Mr. Julian Hawthorne presses them into one chapter, knowing that he has plenty more with which to sprinkle all the chapters that follow. Even some of the incidents which are not coincidences are quite as remarkable; but the climax of the author's wild inventiveness is not reached until he makes the clever and cultivated Marquise Desmoines enter an obscure public-house in the East End, where she first drinks beer at the expense of a low highwayman, then suffers him to kiss her and promises him marriage, and on returning home to her mansion in the West, dresses herself gorgeously, and proceeds to commit suicide by the gratuitously unpleasant process of inhaling the flame of a lamp fed by some nameless poison.

It will naturally be asked whether such a novel as this is worth the trouble of reading, and curiously enough, a negative answer cannot be returned. In Dust, Mr. Julian Hawthorne is undoubtedly at his worst, but he is Mr. Julian Hawthorne still. The book has powerful chapters, and graceful chapters, and chapters full of a charm which might be lengthily analysed, but cannot be briefly indicated. The story of the founding of the great banking-house of Bendibow Brothers, in the days of the South-Sea Bubble, is told admirably, with a restrained strength which we miss elsewhere; and the sketch of the poem by which Philip Lancaster won fame and fortune is really a striking and arresting piece of imaginative work. Some of the conversations, too, are very bright and piquant, and now and then a remark by the way comes home to us, in virtue of its happy insight or felicity of expression. Had Dust come from an unknown young author, we should, in spite of its absurdities, have called it promising; coming as it does from Mr. Julian Hawthorne, we must call it bitterly disappointing; but it does not leave us without hope that he will return to his first standard, and satisfy us in the future, as he has satisfied us in the past.

SCIENTIFIC LAWS AND CHRISTIANITY.*

THIS is one of the most impressive and suggestive books on religion that we have read for a long time. Indeed, with the exception of Dr. Mozley's University Sermons, we can recall no book of our time which showed such a power of restating the moral and practical truths of religion so as to make them take fresh hold of the mind and vividly impress the imagination. The author's name is, we should think, new to the greater number of readers of such books, and there is, therefore, some danger of his work being overlooked. But we are convinced that no one who reads the papers entitled "Biogenesis," "Degeneration," "Eternal Life," and "Classification," to say nothing of the others in this volume, will fail to recognise in Mr. Drummond a new and a powerful teacher, impressive both from the scientific calmness and accuracy of his view of law, and from the deep religious earnestness with which he traces the workings of law in the moral and spiritual sphere. Mr. Drummond's object may be very shortly stated. He attempts to show how the same laws which science has discovered in the phenomena of Nature continue, and can be traced in the phenomena of the spiritual world; how such great principles as biogenesis,—the origination of life only out of what is already living,—not only by analogy, but identically, govern the course of spiritual, as they have been proved to govern that of natural phenomena. He takes, therefore, some of the chief laws of nature as they have been discovered and stated by evolutionists, and demonstrates their identity with those principles of Christianity which have hitherto been accepted on authority, but have never been reduced to law or compared with the laws of nature. Biogenesis becomes in religion regeneration; spiritual death is want of correspondence; eternal life is perfect correspondence with the spiritual environment,—God; conformity to type is conformity to "the image of his Son." These are some of the lines on which Mr. Drummond, with singular and convincing force, works out the continuity of law from the natural into the spiritual world.

In general, writers who attempt to treat religion scientifically give us a very colourless sort of Christianity. They take the minimum of dogma as the basis of their system, and in particular they invariably adopt those optimistic theories of man's capacity for good which are historically associated with the Pelagian heresy. So we did not expect to find much definite doctrine in Mr. Drummond's book. It is very remarkable, however, that his religion is by no means undogmatic; and what is more, his dogma is to a great extent that of the "stern, old-fashioned theology," as he himself calls it. He finds in natural laws the warrant for the doctrines of eternal punishment, sudden conversion, regeneration, the generic distinction between the lost and the saved, the necessity of mortification, the small number of the saved; and perhaps the most striking thing about the book is the way in which one is led up to these, if we may so call them, most dogmatic dogmas, from principles which are drawn from Darwin, and Huxley, and Spencer. We do not wish to endorse all Mr. Drummond's conclusions. Very possibly, and this is, no doubt, a weak point in the method, the same principles might, on further investigation or under different treatment, lead to the disproof of some of these dogmas; but whoever tries to do this will have to reckon with Mr. Drummond's arguments, and controvert his analogies. If the method is valid, Mr. Drummond's treatment of it has a very important claim on the attention of all who are inclined to sympathise with the modern developments of theology.

We will take, as the best illustration of the force and penetration with which familiar religious truths are handled by Mr. Drummond, the first paper, which is also the most important, "Biogenesis." Starting from the now certain scientific doctrine of biogenesis, that "life can only come from the touch of life," he shows that the same principle is laid down for the spiritual world by the doctrine of Regeneration. Between the organic and the inorganic worlds lies a great gulf:—

"The passage from the mineral world to the plant or animal world is hermetically sealed on the mineral side. This inorganic world is staked off from the living world by barriers which have never yet been crossed from within. No change of substance, no modification of environment, no chemistry, no electricity, nor any form of energy, nor any evolution can endow any single atom of the mineral world with the attribute of life. Only by the bending-down into this dead world of some living form can these dead atoms be gifted with the properties of vitality, without this preliminary contact with life, they remain fixed in the inorganic sphere for ever. It is a very mysterious law which guards in this way the portals of the living world. And if there is one thing in Nature more worth pondering for its strangeness it is the spectacle of this vast helpless world of the dead cut off from the living by the Law of Biogenesis, and denied for ever the possibility of resurrection within itself."

Just so in the spiritual world. "The passage from the natural world to the spiritual world is hermetically sealed on the natural side." This is the truth stated by our Lord in the law of spiritual Biogenesis. "Except a man be born again, he cannot enter the kingdom of God." Another and still more important statement of the law is that other saying, "He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." Therefore, "in his relation to the whole spiritual world, the natural man is regarded as dead." "To be carnally minded is death." Thus Agnosticism is a fact, for "the natural man cannot know" the "things of the Spirit of God, for they are spiritually discerned." There is no possibility of "Christianity without a living spirit, or a personal religion without conversion." Christianity is thus finally distinguished from all other religions, because it alone requires this new birth, this creation of spiritual life, and it alone declares that this life is Christ. From this principle we deduce by analogy three things concerning Regeneration. "First, that the new life should dawn suddenly; second, that it should come 'without observation'; third, that it should develop gradually." Thus Mr. Drummond brings us to the doctrine of sudden conversion, and justifies it as scientific, but he guards it carefully from misrepresentation. "There may be cases—they are probably in the majority—where the moment of contact with the living Spirit, though sudden, has been obscure. But the real moment and the conscious moment are two different things. Science pronounces nothing as to the conscious moment."

This inadequate sketch of a very remarkable paper may serve to show our readers something of the cogency with which Mr. Drummond presses home his analogy, and of the skill with which he applies it to the various parts of the subject. We wish we had space to draw it out at greater length; and also to do more than mention his scientific statement of the nature of eternal life, his clear perception that the Christian argument for immortality rests upon the Resurrection of Christ, for "his mission on earth was to give men life," and life means the knowledge of God, and the Incarnation, scientifically considered, is "God opening to man the possibility of correspondence through Jesus Christ." Or again, we should like to dwell upon some of the obiter dicta, and suggestive remarks which the author makes as he works out his analogies. "True mystery casts no shadows around. It is a sudden and awful gulf yawning across the field of knowledge." "We are not lodging a plea for inactivity of the spiritual energies, but for the tranquillity of the spiritual mind." "It is the failure to understand the dynamics of Christianity that has most seriously and most pitifully hindered its growth, both in the individual and in the race." We can only indicate these and other merits of the book, and pass on to a few criticisms which must in fairness be made.

It is noteworthy that Mr. Drummond retains, or seems to retain, an omission which is patent also in the great original of all analogical theology. Bishop Butler ignored the Christian doctrine of the resurrection of the body; Mr. Drummond does not quite ignore it, but his only definite reference to it, so far as we can see, is in his adoption of Reuss's statement that the Apostolic doctrine of immortality "can dispense . . . with the theological thesis of a miraculous corporeal reconstruction of our person," which is a thesis "absolutely opposed to reason." This actual allusion is supported by the general tone of the book, and especially by the paper on "Mortification." Mr. Drummond separates the two spheres, the natural and the spiritual, so absolutely, that he does not seem sufficiently to recognise that this natural life is, after all, more than a probation, it is a preparation for eternal life; and that the Christian, if he adopts the teaching of St. Paul, does not look forward to a time when "the spiritual shall be released from the natural," and "the balm of death, numbing his lower nature, releases him for the scarce disturbed communion of a higher life," but he hopes "to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven . . . not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life." It is strange that Mr. Drummond should be so anxious to adopt Reuss's gross and ignorant misrepresentation of the "theological thesis," that he should overlook the great instance of analogical reasoning in which St. Paul gives a truly scientific statement and justification of this very doctrine. It was no Christian, but the heathen Plotinus, who thanked God that he was not "tied to an immortal body," and we are sorry to see the traces of this essentially heathen idea in Mr. Drummond's treatment of the subject.

A clear perception of this truth and all that it involves might have saved Mr. Drummond from his most serious, because most fundamental defect. The whole book depends upon the assumption that the law which is true of natural is true of spiritual life, and that Biogenesis and Regeneration are merely different applications of the same principle, because that principle holds good of all βίαις. But this never becomes anything more than an assumption. The author fails to establish the identity of the βίαις, which is governed by the law of Biogenesis, with the βίαις, or rather ζωή, which is the gift of Jesus Christ. And yet this is vitally important to his whole method. Unless you can be sure that you are dealing with the same matter, you have no certainty that the law which governs it is identical with, and not merely analogous to the known scientific law of nature. And Mr. Drummond, quite rightly, insists that his position is "not that the spiritual laws are analogous to the natural laws, but that they are the same laws." He does not ignore the difficulty, but twice attempts to answer it. On p. 235 he declares that Christ must have meant literal "life," because we must always take the literal rather than the metaphorical meaning in interpreting the Bible, and to do otherwise here is to charge our Lord with "mystifying his hearers." Also, he says, "the Apostles . . . accepted the term in its simple literal sense." Now, this is more or less satisfactory to us, but we doubt whether it will be convincing to those whom it ought to convince on this subject. His other answer to the question, stated more generally on p. 45, will, we do not hesitate to say, fail to convince any one. The objection is given quite fairly. "The life with which it [Biogenesis] deals in the natural world does not enter at all into the spiritual world The vital principle of the body is a different thing from the vital principle of the spiritual life." But Mr. Drummond seems to think he has answered it by a most palpable petitio principii. "All this is as true as if one were to say that the fifth proposition of the first book of Euclid applies when the figures are drawn with chalk upon a blackboard, but fails with regard to structures of wood or stone. The proposition is continuous for the whole world, and, doubtless, likewise for the sun and moon and stars. The same universality may be predicated likewise for the law of life. Wherever there is life, we may expect to find it arranged, ordered, governed, according to the same law." But that is the whole question,—Is there life? Is the word "life" used in the same sense when we speak of spiritual and of natural life? This must be proved, before Mr. Drummond's book can be as convincing apologetically as it is impressive morally. We would suggest that the proof is to be found not in a priori and fallacious arguments, or in assumptions of canons of interpretation, but in an induction drawn from our own experience of the spiritual life in ourselves and in others. The scientific laws of life are proved by experience; let us try to place the laws of spiritual life on the same foundation.

For this, and for other reasons which will, we think, be apparent, as Mr. Drummond himself seems to feel, on reading the Introduction, the book, unlike other analogies, is more satisfactory on the moral and practical than it is on the speculative side. We believe this is very probably due to the concentration of the author's attention on moral questions, and that he is perfectly capable of working out a complete and weighty "Analogy of Religion" adapted to the modern scientific position. Nothing more important could be done by any religious writer than to deal in this way with the great foundation doctrines of Christianity,—the Atonement, the Trinity, original sin, the Sacraments, justification, inspiration, and miracles; and we sincerely hope that Mr. Drummond may attempt this. In the meantime, we would most strongly commend his present volume to the attention of all who wish to see religious questions treated with wide knowledge and profound earnestness.

DEAN STANLEY IN AMERICA.*

THIS little volume fitly closes the long list of contributions which Dean Stanley has made to English literature. Short and fragmentary as many of the papers are, they bear the unmistakeable marks of his character on every page,—of his wide sympathy, his love for old associations, his candour and simplicity. Who but Stanley would have seen in the joint growth of a maple and an oak a symbol of Canada and England; in the ceaseless "contortion, confusion, whirl, and chaos" of Niagara an image of the whirlpool of existence in the United States, and in the cloud of spray which ever rises above the Falls, a likeness of the pillar of light which should emerge from the distractions of the present? What in other people's hands would appear as affected sentiment is but the natural expression of Dr. Stanley's feeling, and comes forth from his mind clad in terse, clear, and telling English.

There are many passages that will bear quotation, but we would rather refer the reader to the book itself, which we are sure will be read with interest by many who never open an ordinary book of sermons. In one of his pulpit addresses, on "The Unity and Diversity of Christendom," the Dean alludes to the work which each great branch of the Church has accomplished for the good of all. He finds something to say for the Eastern and the Latin Church, for the doctrines of Luther, as for those of Zwinglius and Calvin. He loves to note the points on which men agree, not those on which they differ. Yet no man ever saw more clearly the duty of struggling, if need be single-handed, on behalf of a principle. It was not merely in a spirit of defiance that he admitted Professor Vance Smith to the Holy Communion in Westminster Abbey, and invited Professor Max Müller and the veteran Missionary Moffat to preach there. Indifferent as he was to many religious and ecclesiastical opinions on which other men feel keenly, he was ready to take up the cudgels whenever the principles which he loved were at stake. These principles, as we may gather from the address on the prospects of Liberal theology, are the universality of the divine love, the justification of the good heathen, the supreme importance of morality, the possibility of human perfection, the divinity of conscience, the identification of the Church with the laity, of things secular and sacred. It was Dr. Stanley's conviction that those who held firmly by these opinions, and acted upon them, would prove to be the backbone of the Church of England. How far a Church which held to such opinions only, to the exclusion of all definite religious doctrines, would be able to battle with the ignorance, the misery, and the sin which exist in our large towns, is a question which experience only can decide. We ourselves believe very strongly that experience will decide that question in the negative. Yet no one can deny that such men as Dean Stanley are needed in the Church of England, to bridge over the gulf that yawns between scientific and religious opinion, to soften the differences which, alas! exist between men who are equally earnest in upholding what they believe to be the truth.

As an example of his method in dealing with controversial points, we may refer to his reply to an address presented by the Baptist ministers of New York and Brooklyn. At the beginning and the end of his speech, he thanks the Baptist community for the Christian work they have accomplished, and for the eminent characters they have produced in Bunyan the writer, Hall the preacher, and Havelock the soldier. In the middle of his address, he says:—

"You have alluded to me as an ecclesiastical historian, and have referred to the undoubted antiquity of your principal ceremony,—that of immersion. I feel that here also we ought to be grateful to you for having, almost alone in the Western Church, preserved intact this singular and interesting relic of primitive and Apostolic times, which we—you will forgive me for saying so—which we, at least in our practice, have wisely discarded."

We hope that "clergymen and ministers of all denominations" will read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest the preface to the sermons in which the Dean ably and earnestly discusses the conditions of religious inquiry. The homely maxims which he lays down are easy to speak about, but difficult indeed to carry out. How few enter with a single eye into the arena of controversy! How few are utterly sincere, even in their most secret spiritual struggles; or, if they are, how little disposed to see and acknowledge the truthfulness and the goodness of those who are opposed to them! Even Dean Stanley, with his lofty scorn of party spirit and his contempt for outward ceremonial, was hardly able at times to keep his balance, and to give due credit to those who feel strongly that, so long as we have bodies as well as souls, the spirit of reverence cannot be inculcated without adequate forms and symbols. Yet no one ever took more pains to clothe truth itself in beautiful language, as the following passage from the end of the essay is sufficient to show:—

"Those who have watched the effects of sunrise on the Alpine ranges will remember the dark and chill aspect of the wide landscape in the moment preceding the dawn. At last there arose at once in the western and the eastern heavens a colour, a brightness, a lightness—varying, diffused, indefinite, but still spreading and brightening and lightening over the whole scene. Then, as in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, the highest summits of the range of snow burst from pale death into roseate life, and every slope and crest became as clear and bright as before they had been dark and dull. And, meanwhile, the same light was creeping round the mists of the plain and the exhalations of the lakes, and they, too, were touched with gold, and every shape and form yielded to the returning glow. Such is an image of the rise of true religion, and, therefore, also of true theology, shadowy, diffused, expansive as the dawn, yet, like the dawn, striking with irresistible force now here, now there, first on the highest intelligence, then on the world at large, till at length the world is suffused with its radiance, and the shades of night have melted, we hardly know how or where."

"Such," he adds, "is the process by which the great regenerating truths of religion have made their way, and still make their way into the heart of man." We have only one question to ask on this passage. Is it on the higher intelligences, or is it on the higher lives that the new truths of religion dawn the first? Is it to the Madame Guyon or to the Bossuet of to-day, that we must look for glimpses of the religious truths that are to break upon the twentieth century? Our own belief is that a high intelligence of itself will not point the way to the higher level of life which we long to reach ourselves, in order that we may lift others to it. Neither will this be done by the wild, yet earnest, enthusiasm of a Salvation Army or a Blue-Ribbon Army, but only by that rarest combination of the reason, the conscience, and the will of a man or woman harmoniously working together to know and to do the will of God.

The eight sermons that follow are, in our judgment, almost faultless in style, in clearness of arrangement, in argument, in apt and picturesque illustration. No young man could have written them, no other old man could have conceived them; they are at once so bright with feeling and fancy, so rich in experience! The finest of the series are, we think, the two last, which deal respectively with the nature of man and the nature of God. In these, we discover the nearest approach to what may be called a doctrinal sermon. Man, according to the Dean, has a dual nature, a material body, an immaterial soul. And the soul itself is dual, in that it has a higher and a lower element. This view differs somewhat from the ordinary tripartite view of man's being, yet it strikes us as being at once more in accordance with the Bible, and with the mysterious facts of our own consciousness. For when the struggle of the soul over the body is, as we think, complete, there ensues the more difficult struggle between the higher and the lower soul, between the πνεῦμα and the ψυχή. How this struggle appears again and again in human history, how one element and then the other seems to gain the victory, even in the noblest characters, is finely brought out by the Dean in the pregnant sentence with which the sermon closes:—

"Thou hast it in thy power to become the slave of passion, the slave of luxury, the slave of senseless party spirit, the slave of corruption. Thou hast it in thy power to become the free controller of thyself, the everlasting benefactor of thy country, the unfailing champion of thy God."

As a record of the life of a thorough soldier, one possessing in a more than ordinary degree the love of his profession, a cultivated intellect, and the desire to benefit his kind, the work before us is of considerable interest, though, as the author frankly confesses, it has its primary raison d'être in the very natural desire to vindicate the military reputation of a brother who, except, perhaps, on one fatal occasion, is universally acknowledged not merely to have deserved well of his country, but to have rendered very signal service.

Even with regard to the sad event at Isandhlwana and Colonel Durnford's share in it, military opinion is much divided, and it is probable that the greater number of those capable of forming a sound judgment on the matter believe his obedience to have been as unflinching as his death was heroic. It is not for us to pronounce upon this warmly-debated question, but while unwilling to accept the idea that those in authority could be guilty of "wilfully and deliberately" [traducing the dead, we are bound to state that Colonel Edward Durnford brings forward a formidable mass of evidence in his brother's favour; and it is difficult to believe that a man to whom duty had ever been a guiding star could all at once, and for no conceivable reason, have been guilty of neglecting orders. In point of fact, why should he have done so at Isandhlwana, since at Bushman's River Pass he preferred going through terrible suffering to failure in carrying out his instructions, although it is clear that he would in that case have been entirely exempted from blame? There must have been great misconception somewhere, and the repeated refusals to examine into the matter—for the Court of Inquiry at Helpmakaar seems to have done little or nothing towards clearing it up—are, to say the least of them, injudicious, since the public will not be slow to argue from them, though possibly erroneously, a suppressio veri, having for its object the concealment of the shortcomings of those in higher position; and the relatives of Colonel Durnford, some of them military men, have surely a right to feel injured by this persistent withholding of the scant justice of a rigorous and too-long-delayed investigation.

That the camp of Isandhlwana was placed in a practically indefensible position without being laagered is not to be denied, while everything tends to show that Lord Chelmsford completely underrated the enemy with whom he had to contend, habitually refusing to take the most ordinary precautions against surprise; and his having allowed himself to be decoyed in an opposite direction when 20,000 Zulus were about to pour down upon the camp can scarcely exonerate him from the responsibility for the disaster, even though, according to his statement in the House of Lords, he considered that he had left behind him a sufficient defensive force. As to the question, which in some minds remains doubtful, whether Durnford or Pulleine was in command on the fatal day, this can easily be settled if, as our author states, the copy of the order sent to the latter is yet in existence; but there is a curious story told by a captain of the 24th Regiment, who marched out with the General's force, to the effect that neither Lord Chelmsford nor his staff left any orders with Colonel Pulleine, but that, when miles away from the camp, Lord Chelmsford asked what orders had been left for him. This requires confirmation, but in any case it is quite clear that no anxiety whatever was felt at headquarters for the safety of the camp; and a strange fatality seems to have hung over it, for even Colonel Harness, who, on his own responsibility, had started with his contingent to relieve it, was peremptorily ordered back again. That the gallant fellows who died so bravely should have been left four months on the battle-field unburied is another circumstance which might have been deemed incredible, were it not but too sadly true. The touching story of the finding of their bodies has long been familiar to us, and it affords ample proof, were any needed, of their chivalric bravery. But leaving this painful episode in England's history, let us turn to the memoir, and see what impression it gives us of the man who, by those closely connected with him, and especially by his native following, was so emphatically pronounced a hero.

Very little is told us of the young days of Anthony Durnford, but we find that he joined the Royal Military Academy in 1846 and left it in 1848, having gained fifty-one places and lost none; while the report he brought with him from Chatham, on completing his course of instruction there, bore testimony both to his exemplary conduct and his marked ability. During the first twenty years after getting his commission, the young officer served in Ceylon, at Malta, and in various places in England and Ireland; and in 1872 was despatched to South Africa, where, curiously enough, the first noteworthy event which occurs to him is his accompanying the Secretary for Native Affairs to the coronation of Cetewayo, which he describes as a scene not to be missed, the war-song by 5,000 warriors being wonderfully impressive. Then came the expedition against Langalibalele, and the affair of Bushman's River Pass, of which Major Durnford, with a small force of Natal Carbiniers and Basutos, was desired to take possession, as it was supposed the Chief would attempt to escape that way. He was, however, expressly commanded "not to fire the first shot." During the march up the Drakensberg, through a wild and most difficult country, Major Durnford was dragged over a precipice by the horse which he was leading, and received, besides the dislocation of his shoulder, several severe injuries, notwithstanding which, after a very short rest he continued to push forward, until he sank down at nightfall utterly exhausted by pain and fatigue. But when the moon rose, at about eleven o'clock, the intrepid commander again ordered an advance, although his sufferings were, say the eye-witnesses, almost more than they could bear to see. "What he had to do, was to take his men to the top of Bushman's River Pass as speedily as possible; and there they should be, if he preserved breath enough to give his orders, and consciousness to know that they were being carried out." This night's experience formed, says the writer, the first link of the chain which ever after bound the affections of the little band of brave Basutos to their leader, for they found themselves for the first time treated by an English officer with consideration and sympathy, and Major Durnford soon learned to set a high value upon these brave, intelligent fellows. In the engagement which followed, when, as is known, the undisciplined Natal Carbiniers fled for their lives, Major Durnford received the assegai-wound that disabled his left arm for life; notwithstanding which, and his sufferings from the accident above described, he insisted on being lifted on to his horse the very next morning, and starting at the head of some volunteers to the relief of Captain Boyes and his party, who had been sent to his support, and were supposed to be in great danger. Public thanks were, of course, rendered to Major Durnford for his noble conduct on these occasions. Merciless to himself, Colonel Durnford naturally expected much endurance and self-control from the able-bodied under his command; while he was, like almost all brave men, exceedingly tender to every one in sickness or trouble. He was also resolutely determined, so far as rested with himself, that justice should be done to all the natives, and nothing distressed or disgusted him more than anything like unfair dealing. In the struggle for right against might he was ever foremost, and this it was that made him take up so strongly the cause of the Putini tribe, who had worked so hard under his directions at the destruction of the mountain passes. Taking pains, as he did, to understand the character of the South-African people, he was able to manage them easily by means of their good-will; and the natives said of Colonel Durnford that he was not like other white men, who shout at them and treat them like dogs. He, they said, spoke quietly, but no guilty man could stand before him. His kindness to young officers, indeed to all who needed assistance, was unbounded; but his good deeds were performed so silently, that few, save the recipients of his bounty, ever came to know of them.

As one of the Boundary Commission appointed to investigate the land question between the Boers and the Zulus, Colonel Durnford had excellent opportunities of knowing exactly how the case stood, and of forming an opinion as to England's proper course of action; and he maintained that a vigorous policy, in union with strict justice, might easily settle matters without recourse to war, for which, he remarked more than once in private letters, we were totally unprepared. But although such was his opinion, he did not fail to throw himself with all his energy into his duty as a soldier, raising and drilling three regiments of Natal natives, besides his favourite Basutos and Putini, organising native pioneer corps, and in every way preparing for the encounter, which to the last he believed would be staved off. From his letters to his mother, between whom and himself there subsisted the closest affection, we learn more of Colonel Durnford's character and occupations than in any other way; and these letters are full of his love of work, and his eager desire to do something useful. His last note, written from Rorke's Drift on January 21st, 1879, after Lord Chelmsford's departure for Isandhlwana, concludes with these words,—"I am 'down,' because I am left behind, but we shall see." Little did he then think that the next day would see the "lion," as he was called by the Zulus, overpowered only by the overwhelming numbers of his opponents, lying on the field which he had disputed so bravely, surrounded by a heap of slain. Possibly, however, the death of these devoted men was the salvation of the rest of the South-African Army, for we cannot help thinking, with the faithful Jabez, that if the disaster had not occurred at Isandhlwana, it was bound to happen somewhere else, and then very probably the whole force would have been cut to pieces.

"I TELL you," said a Californian miner, "men is the queerest things in natur; beasts is nothing to them, earthquakes is nothing to them, you bet!" and Mrs. Bridges, after travelling round the world for about two years and a half, has arrived at the same opinion. That man is even more wonderful than Nature may be a common-place truth, but it is one that will be vividly felt by the reader who travels with this lady in Greece and Egypt, in British India and Thibet, in Burmah and Java, in China and Japan, to Vancouver's Island and across the States.

How much of actual novelty there is in this pleasantly-written journal we cannot pretend to say, but the writer is careful to avoid lingering too long in well-known places, and her experiences are related with vivacity and intelligence. The subject, it is evident, is inexhaustible, and every intelligent traveller surveys it with fresh eyes. Women, too, see many things that escape the less rapid perception of men, and they frequently surpass men in the happy art of telling what they know. The volume, let us say at once, is readable from the first page to the last, and if the use we make of it should serve to illustrate the interest of the narrative, it will be far from exhausting it. We need not linger with the traveller in Greece, where the women are said to be singularly unclassical in form and feature, nor in Egypt, where Mrs. Bridges managed to visit the Great Pyramid, without the assistance of those "pestilential nuisances," the Pyramid Arabs; so let us pass on to Hyderabad, where the Mohurram festival afforded a spectacle of Eastern magnificence. What is our poor City show on the 9th of November, compared with the barbaric brilliancy of a scene like this?—

"I fairly rubbed my eyes," says the writer, "and wondered whether we had got back to the days of Saladin, as these bands of Arab horsemen, on their prancing white horses, with generally the tail and legs stained purple, covered with gaudy trappings, rode by; their riders, some in chain armour, some in English uniforms of the last century, some in Arab burnous, and some in Zouave dress; some with scimitars, some with guns, others with blunderbusses or long bamboo lances, every man in military costume à discrétion, preceded by a band of musicians, resembling the Christy Minstrels in war-paint and feathers. Then came the infantry, chiefly in prodigious turbans, armed with very long guns, some in the old French uniform of the First Empire, and helmets of the Middle Ages. After them were led the stud of the chieftain. . . . and lastly, the chieftain himself, generally mounted on a splendid elephant, covered with trappings and silver ornaments. One of these grand animals had jewels on his head worth £20,000, and his owner, sitting on the crimson-velvet howdah, was a blaze of gold and precious stones."

Here Mrs. Bridges met a Mussulman lady, who, strange to say, had a governess, and was learning English. "I do read the 'Fifth Royal Reader,'" she said, "and I do make Berlin-wool work, and I do make the 'Return Galop' on the piano for two hours every day;" and she looked forward to the time when her husband would take her to Europe, "to see with my eyes which I am not allowed to do here." Then the travellers (Mrs. Bridges was accompanied by her husband) breakfast with the Ameer-i-Kabir, "a bundle of sky-blue moiré and diamonds, with a pink turban on the top," and inspect his Amazon guard, the only corps now existing in the country, "sturdy-looking little women, dressed as soldiers, some in brown holland turned up with scarlet, and others in native-police uniform," who presented arms and "marched in a very soldier-like manner." Leaving Hyderabad, where they had been entertained by Sir Salar Jung, "the one man in our nation," according to the intelligent lady who plays the "Return Galop," the caves of Ellora and Ajanta were visited, the shrines of the former being still much frequented, while the latter are deserted. "The birds built round the head of the great, calm Buddha, seated on the lotus in the pillared halls of the monasteries, and the wild bees hung their nests from the beautifully-decorated ceilings, and the jungle plants crept in, forming festoons over the fresco paintings of Buddhist legend above the pillars." Of Ajanta, where not only the architectural progress, but the doctrinal development of Buddhism during 1,000 years can be traced, Mrs. Bridges writes with enthusiasm, observing that the caves are alone well worth a journey to India to see; yet few Englishmen, she adds, "take the trouble of turning a few miles out of the beaten track to visit them." By her Highness the Begum of Bhopal the travellers were received as guests, and on being escorted to the palace, a building "of the wedding-cake style of architecture," a line of very irregular cavalry was drawn up to receive them. The daughter of the Begum understood a little English, or the reception would have proved a dumb show. However, actions speak more than words, and the Begum showed her friendliness by sprinkling Mrs. Bridges with eau de Cologne and attar of roses, by throwing over her shoulders a garland of jessamine blossoms with tassels of crimson roses, and presenting her, after the ancient custom, with a preparation of betel-nut and spices wrapped in gold-leaf. Nor was this all. The Begum fed the travellers royally, and in one of her carriages, and guarded by her soldiers, they were able to visit the Buddhist Tope at Sanchi, "probably one of the oldest existing monuments in India." Excursions were also made on an elephant, but Mrs. Bridges found railway travelling preferable, though less romantic. Some time was spent at Delhi, where, however, we must not linger, unless for a moment, to quote the following passage:—"It was pleasant to see by the fresh flowers laid on the grave of Khusree that a poet's memory was still green in the hearts of his countrymen, though 500 years have passed away since, lyre in hand, he sang his still popular songs." Neither shall we halt with the writer in the Vale of Kashmir, where Adam is said to have found another Eden; but "one thing is quite certain, the inhabitants of this Paradise very much resemble fallen angels,—nothing can surpass their capacity for dirt, lying, or cheating."

Taking boat from Kashmir, which was reached after a march of 170 miles, the writer landed at Srinagar, "a Venice built of wood," where the self-denying labours of two Missionaries receive a due meed of praise from their countrywoman:—

"They employ 1,400 coolies, at a very small sum, just enough to sustain life on, in useful works, such as repairing the tracks—there are no roads in Kashmir, the Native Government consider such things ridiculous and unnecessary—in spite of much secret opposition on the part of native officials. Of course, conversion is not attempted, to do so would be worse than useless; but civilising influences, together with soap and water, are brought to bear on the 400 orphan or neglected children in the Mission school, rescued by the Missionaries from starvation."

In the Himalayas, Mrs. Bridges underwent no trifling fatigue, while climbing by slow degrees to the roof of the world, Leh, in Thibet, which was for a long time her resting-place, being nearly 12,000 feet above the sea. Her adventures in this abode of snow are graphically described. So, too, is the account of a Lama church, lately decorated with frescoes by artists from Lhasa, one of the few places in the world to which the traveller is unable to gain admission. A Mr. Manning, indeed, managed to enter the sacred city, more than a century ago, but no one, it is said, has since made the attempt successfully. The Thibetans are not clean people; indeed, they do not even wash their hands and faces, and "the babies are kept in a bag of dried manure, supposed to be warm and healthy for them." Yet they are not without some refinement of taste, and, like the Japanese, are passionately fond of flowers. "When there is nothing else to be had, the women wear bunches of grass and leaves behind their ears and over their foreheads." At Leh, husband and wife parted company for a time, Mr. Bridges starting on a long and perilous expedition to Yarkand, while the writer lived in a comfortable bungalow, guarded by Sepoys. Some expeditions were made in the neighbourhood, and one chapter is devoted to an account of a religious festival held at a Lamasary, where the lady was housed under the same roof with 500 Lamas. The description of the ceremonies on this occasion shows that the devotion of the people is not always associated with reverence:—

"The personification of the sacred Trinity of 'Buddha,' the 'Law,' and the 'Church,' is the most popular representation, but all are sufficiently unlovely. The Deities, about half-a-dozen in number, personated by Lamas, sat on a raised bench just below us, choir-boys holding large silk umbrellas and sacred emblems over their heads, while attendant priests swung incense and rose-leaves in front of them, and the red-clothed, mitred choir chanted out prayers and invocations. But the Tartar love of fun showed itself in the pranks played on the Olympus bench of Deities, by two Lamas dressed up to represent mendicants or clowns. While the attendant priests' backs were turned, these wags played all sorts of tricks; pretending to pay homage to the gods, they made sly hits at their sacred noses, and otherwise molested them, till chased away by a lion-faced mask. The masks representing the 'dragsheds,' or gods who protect men from demons, were particularly hideous. Their countenances are supposed to be inflamed with rage and fury against the evil ones, and their wrath aggravated by the many malicious tricks played upon them by the latter. At one time during the ceremony (considering that it was meant to symbolise a spiritual combat) the fight became extremely lively. The gods got knocked about in quite a surprising fashion, much to the delight of the spectators, who enjoyed it as London children do the fight between our old friend Punch and the bailiff."

Like most travellers, Mrs. Bridges is struck with the resemblance between Lamaism and the ceremonial of the Romish Church, monasticism, vestments, holy water, relics, confession, rosaries being all in vogue among the Lamas. Bidding a sorrowful farewell to the good-natured, dirty-faced Tartars, to the jolly-looking Lamas, "to the pig-tails and praying-wheels, and the pleasant climate and grand snow mountains," the travellers descended into the Valley of Kashmir, which is ruled, we are told, by one of the worst Governments in the world. We shall not follow this route in India, nor halt with them at Burmah or at the Straits Settlements, though the author has much to say that is interesting even of a place so well known as Singapore, where the tigers no longer eat a Chinaman a day, a "happy despatch" which was at one time looked upon as a matter of course. Of Java and the Culture system a short history is given, and Mrs. Bridges wishes that the material prosperity of that island could be secured also in Ireland and British India. The population is enormous, but there are no signs of poverty. "All look well fed, healthy, and happy; a careless, cheery, indolent, and good-tempered people, without arts, without religion, and almost without education or clothes, life comes to them very easily. . . . On the whole, we think them the stupidest and cheeriest race we have seen." The change was great from Batavia to Canton, the wealth and size of which surprised the travellers. "Except in Paris and London, we never saw such well-filled shops, and yet we had not seen a European face all day." The dark side of human life in Canton, the tortures inflicted in the name of justice, the prisons in which men and women are done to death by the slowest and most ingenious processes of cruelty, of these nothing is said; but we read that the Government shows a paternal regard for the national morals, that religious care is taken of the pigs, that Chinese ladies "get up" very well, that Chinese dentists extract teeth instantaneously and almost without pain, and that Chinese mothers never kiss their babies, but only sniff at them in an uncomfortable manner.

If the writer seldom looks much below the surface, she has a ready apprehension of whatever is strange to Europeans. And there is always something new to be said about Japan, the next country visited by the travellers. It is true, as she observes, that Sir Rutherford Alcock's work on Japan is now ancient history, for in no part of the world have such rapid changes occurred. The old order has given place to the new; but how far the progress is solid, and how far superficial, it is impossible to say. Mrs. Bridges spent four months in the country, and has many incidents of travel to relate. She had the good or bad fortune to feel the strange horrors of an earthquake, the severest shock that had been felt at Yokohama for five-and-twenty years. "What is one to do," she exclaims, "when, as an American friend says, 'the houses are waltzing round,' and one feels 'just scared out of one's boots?'" There are pleasanter experiences to record. Though the Japanese can be cruel enough, witness their treatment of native Christians ten or twelve years ago, the writer sees only the bright side of the national character, and observes that "it is delightful never seeing anything or anybody ill-treated." Top-spinning and kite-flying, once the national sports of the country, are now, it is said, like everything else that is "old," going out of fashion. Yet despite steam-engines, model training schools, electric bells, and many other innovations, "one never quite gets over the impression of being amongst dolls and living in a toy-house, so neat and natty is everything in Japan." How charming it all looks in a stranger's eye! yet we are reminded, while visiting a girls' school, that if anything goes wrong with them, they will fill their sleeves with stones, and throw themselves into the nearest pond. The Mikado's palace was visited, and its simplicity presented a striking contrast to the gaudy magnificence of European palaces. His bedroom "had absolutely no furniture, nothing but the finest bamboo matting on the floor and delightfully-painted storks on the door-panels." On the other hand, the pagodas and shrines blaze with crimson lacquer and gilding, and dragons with jewelled tails. Like Miss Bird, who was troubled by sight-seers day and night, Mrs. Bridges and her husband were objects of unceasing curiosity:—

"The people," she writes, "seemed to swarm round us, rushing on in front to secure good places for a stare, or diving down side streets to cut us off; for half a mile ahead our road was lined with spectators, not in the least rude, not an unkind word or look,—only, wherever one turned hundreds of eyes were gazing, gazing with all their might. I came back with a sort of hunted-animal feeling. But even in our tea-house rooms, if there was the slightest slit in the paper walls, there one was sure to see a pair of black, bead-like eyes gleaming down, to be supplemented by two small fingers making two more holes for another pair of inquiring eyes, till literally the paper walls, behind which you have taken refuge after the day's journey, seem to stare at you, and the crowded solitude becomes insupportable."

The varnish of European civilisation has not as yet concealed the natural manners of the people. The necessity of privacy is unknown to them, neither do they always see the necessity of clothes. At a fashionable watering-place, the Aix-les-Bains of Japan, where the large tanks of warm mineral water are open to the street, Mrs. Bridges, while writing in her room, observes a lady and her child sitting down to cool on the door-step:—

"Neither of them has a scrap of clothing on, only some long tortoise-shell pins in the hair; and now I see she has slipped on her straw sandals, while a gentleman, also unclothed, has come up to talk to her and hang himself out to dry. It is really very startling at first. . . . Other people are sauntering up and down, as on the promenade at Homburg, but seem entirely comfortable with nothing whatever on."

Our "globe-trotters," to use the familiar Yankee phrase, visited British Columbia, and saw also some of the wonders of the States, including the Yosemite Valley, Salt Lake City, and Colorado. Mrs. Bridges was especially struck with the ugliness of the women at Utah. Polygamy is said to be a sore subject. "The young folks like marrying single, and feel bad when there is another wife now-a-days." At Leadville, Colorado, a two-year-old town of 20,000 inhabitants, the travellers were recommended to a hotel by a man proclaiming in a very decided manner,—“If any man says the Clarendon ain't a first-class house, I'll put a bullet through him.” And here we must close Mrs. Bridges' volume, heartily thanking her for the entertainment provided. The illustrations of the book add considerably to its attractiveness.

PHYSIOLOGICAL CRUELTY.*

THIS is a very wordy volume, and contains little that will be new to any one tolerably familiar with the literature on the subject. After a short introductory statement, we have in chapter ii. a somewhat elaborate discussion on the question, "What is Pain?" which might almost convince us that animals rarely suffer anything worthy of the name of pain, and least of all when being subjected to experiments, did we not remember how horrified the physiologists are at the "sufferings" caused in other ways than through experimentation, and did we not recall how one of their number was able to produce to his own entire satisfaction the various degrees of pain, up to "most atrocious suffering" (dolori atrocissimi). Chapter iii. deals with the question "What is Cruelty?" It is, doubtless, interesting for physiologists to discuss whether, for instance, the man who poured boiling water into the stomach of a living dog may properly be considered cruel. But it is a question they may be left to decide among themselves. The outside public are less concerned with the exact meaning of any particular word than with the suffering to which, under one pretence or another, animals are subjected. Noteworthy is the confession that, "The widest and highest aim of physiological experiment, whether painful or painless, is the advance of physiological knowledge; and this is the one which scientific medical men regard most highly, and which it is most difficult to make laymen regard at all." The quasi-mathematical manner in which the author endeavours to find a common measure by which to gauge the respective values of "pain," "lengthened life," and "restoration to health," is certainly the most original part of the book, but it cannot be called successful. When we read the following, we are inclined to ask whether the sub-title of the volume has not been accidentally inverted by the printer:—"As new lives come into being, the number of those who thus benefit goes on ever increasing. The consequence is that, though we cannot always assign the precise share of vivisection in any investigation of which it has formed a part, yet we can always know that, whether it be great or small, it is multiplied by a practically infinite factor. . . . Thus the greatest pain suffered for the smallest actual result would in time be fully counterbalanced, since the lowest figure, when multiplied by infinity, exceeds the largest definite sum." We seem to have heard also, on good authority, that the number of problems demanding solution will increase ad infinitum, or at any rate in geometrical progression, as time goes on. So, with ever-increasing experiments the least important of which bears infinite results, we ought indeed some day to be freed from disease; but, unfortunately, one of the conditions for the attainment of the desideratum is that the time shall be infinite.

The gist of the next chapter, on "Our Rights over Animals," seems to be contained in the following sentence:—"So far, the general principle of dealing with animals, which is in a vague way accepted by most humane persons, but seldom distinctly formulated, seems to be that we may kill, inconvenience, or pain them, for any benefit, convenience, or pleasure to ourselves, but that the pain must be within moderate limits (of course, undefined), and that it must form no element in our pleasure;" for which the author proposes "to substitute the far stricter rule, that we must commit no cruelty towards them,—defining cruelty as the infliction of pain without an adequate good object." Why "the advance of physiological knowledge" should be regarded as an adequate good object, more than any other benefit or convenience is not explained; and since by the former rule the pain is, at any rate, kept "within moderate limits," while we have no mention of such limitation in the latter, it may be doubted whether animals would appreciate the "far stricter rule," especially if physiologists were to be sole judges of the adequacy of the object. A considerable portion of the next chapter, which deals with the question, "What is Vivisection?" is taken up with irrelevant matter about other methods of research. When at length we come to the point, we learn that "in the few cases where pain must be given, it is generally very slight." In support of this assertion, the Parliamentary reports are quoted; but these are compiled from information supplied by the vivisectioners themselves, and do not, moreover, establish the author's statement. We cannot congratulate him on this part of his book.

With the author's remarks on the inconsistency of our laws with regard to animals, we can fully agree. What could be less satisfactory than that a law nominally to protect animals should have been turned into a means for licensing the very persons whose acts first made it necessary to legislate? From the final chapter we learn, amongst other "facts," that "deductions drawn both from bed-side observation and dissections may remain vague and inconclusive, while one series of experiments upon a living animal would either confirm or disprove them. But at the touch of experiment, theory crystallises into fact." All our reading in the works of vivisectioners has gone to show that the reverse of this is the fact. The author's description of physiology without vivisection seems to us very aptly to describe that method of investigation, as exemplified in their own books,—“A vague and hazy pseudo-science, working by guess, rashly trying by-paths in the dark . . . taking up a theory to-day and dropping it to-morrow, nebulous, inconsistent, untrustworthy.”

SOME MAGAZINES.

In the general interest and opportuneness of its articles, the Fortnightly Review of this month is considerably ahead of the other magazines. It leads off with two articles on the Egyptian and Suez-Canal policy of the Government. The first is by M. Léon Say, a Frenchman of liberal and enlightened opinions, and a warm supporter of the Anglo-French alliance. If Lord Salisbury and Sir Stafford Northcote will read his paper, they will no longer wonder that anybody should imagine that negotiations affecting the Suez Canal and M. de Lesseps can have any connection with questions of high policy. "M. Ferdinand de Lesseps," says M. Léon Say, "is one of the glories of France. The country knows that the total value of the nation is augmented by the fact that she counts him among her sons. He has shared his personal renown with his fatherland, and every one in France feels that whatever happens to him attains the proportions of a national event. In thinking of him, men spontaneously repeat the saying of Terence: 'Naught that affects him is indifferent to us.'" And this "national affection" for the man, M. Léon Say proceeds to explain, is due to the fact that his great achievement has been on Egyptian soil. An equally great, or even greater, achievement elsewhere—on the Isthmus of Panama, for example—would not have roused the same national interest. "And the reason is that Egypt has always filled, and still fills, every imagination in France; and that the traditions of France, ever revived by new events, incessantly carry her thoughts back to the banks of the Nile. Thus, when M. de Lesseps was seen planting upon this spot the banner of his noble enterprise, he was deemed to be France herself, in one phase of her natural evolution." So that "nothing could efface from the French mind the conviction that there is a national dignity to be upheld in all that affects the great work to which M. de Lesseps has bound his name." This is not written by a vapouring Chauvinist, but by a cool and clear-headed French economist, who knows England well, and respects and esteems her. M. Léon Say, however, admits that by deserting England in the crisis of the Egyptian complications France forfeited her right to an equal voice with England in Egyptian affairs. But this very consciousness makes her all the more jealous in respect of whatever moral influence still remains to her. So long as the Suez Canal remains substantially French, the amour-propre of France, M. Léon Say thinks, will be satisfied. She asks no more than that France in Egypt, whether she "be the guest of the Khedive or of the Empress of India, has a right to be treated with the consideration due to an old ally and friend." Not that M. Say would at all object to equitable concessions to the legitimate and reasonable demands of the British shipowners. All that he bargains for is that the Canal should remain essentially French. He enters into speculations as to the possibility of France requiting this concession on the part of England by redressing the balance in the matter of silver currency in India. "Having the same currency as India, she can bring back, via Suez, to Europe all that might escape by way of America and California." Another consideration is that "Europe will more and more have its granaries beyond its boundaries. Where shall we place them? With the help of France, and by means of the highway of the Suez Canal, England can place them in India," which, in M. Léon Say's opinion, is capable of supplying the needs of Europe in that commodity. Practically, M. Léon Say's article in the Fortnightly is a conclusive reply to Mr. Edward Dicey's on the same subject in the Nineteenth Century. Mr. Dicey's proposal is based on "the good old rule, the simple plan" of substituting might for right. He affirms dogmatically that M. de Lesseps's "monopoly has no existence in fact; that even if it did exist," "the rescission of the monopoly is demanded on grounds of general utility, in the interest of the world's trade, of which England is the chief representative;" and, lastly, "that the position of England as master of India and occupier of Egypt makes the possession of the Canal of such importance to her, as to justify her in insisting upon the water highway to the East being placed under her control." The Khedive is assumed to be so much of a puppet in our hands, that any opposition on his part is left out of the reckoning. But the Sultan? He must be bribed into acquiescence, replies Mr. Dicey; and if that should not suffice, "the sanction of the Porte can be still more easily dispensed with." What would Mr. Dicey say of such political morality, if he found it applied by a Russian publicist to the acquisition of Constantinople by the Czar? But what about France? Mr. Dicey reminds us that M. Waddington, when in England six years ago, assured all our leading statesmen that "the feeling in France about Egypt is so intense, that any attempt to dislodge her will give rise to a bitterness of resentment against England which will render any co-operation between the two countries impossible for years to come." Mr. Dicey patronisingly vouches for the "good faith of M. Waddington;" but Mr. Dicey knows Frenchmen better. "Englishmen, as I believe, make a mistake in supposing that Frenchmen regard the Suez Canal with the same feeling as a similar work would be regarded by us, if it had been constructed by this country. The self-concentration which constitutes the strength of France renders her almost incredibly indifferent to all interests which lie outside her own area." Let Mr. Dicey read M. Léon Say's article, and then tell us whether he thinks he understands Frenchmen better than M. Léon Say. Mr. Dicey does not recommend us to appropriate the Suez Canal without any compensation to M. de Lesseps's Company; but he suggests that the British Government should give the Company £30,000,000, "exclusive of the amount paid for the Khedive's shares in 1875," and then appropriate their property. Setting aside the morality of this advice, the wonder is that any sane man should have succeeded in persuading himself that it is practicable. Mr. Waterfield's paper, on "The Negotiations with M. de Lesseps," is a temperate discussion of the subject in a sense hostile to M. de Lesseps' claims. But the reader should read with it Mr. Reid's very able paper on "The Suez-Canal Question" in the Contemporary Review.

Next to the Suez-Canal question in present interest is Dr. Creighton's paper in the Fortnightly Review on "The Importation of Disease." Dr. Creighton makes out a strong case for thinking that pleuro-pneumonia among cattle is not a contagious disease, spreading from animal to animal like small-pox, but may, on the contrary, break out spontaneously from a variety of causes. Dr. Creighton, therefore, inclines to the belief—and he cites the high authority of the eminent Professor Virchow on his side—that stringent rules against the importation of foreign cattle are of no avail, at least as regards pleuropneumonia. And of still less avail, in his opinion, are quarantines and cordons sanitaires as precautions against cholera. He gives some striking statistics and facts, which go far to show that all such precautions are positively mischievous, and really intensify and propagate the disease.

Both the Fortnightly Review and the Nineteenth Century have articles on Mr. Jeaffreson's "Real Lord Byron," the former by Mr. Gilbert Venables, the latter by Mr. Froude. In both articles Mr. Jeaffreson is chastised severely; but Mr. Froude's punishment is likely to leave its mark not only on the literary reputation of Mr. Jeaffreson, but still more on the memory of Lord Byron. Some of the insinuations of Mr. Jeaffreson were calculated to stain the memory of Shelley with infamy. Sir Percy Shelley was thus constrained to place in Mr. Froude's hands documents which clear the memory of his relative, the poet, but which also convict Byron of meanness and untruthfulness amounting to dishonour. Mr. Venables has fallen into several inaccuracies, as he will see by reading Mr. Froude's article, and the article on the same subject in the Quarterly Review. Lord Lytton's second article in the Fortnightly, on "The Stage in Relation to Literature," is very interesting and suggestive; and there is a great deal of information, with occasional inaccuracies, in Captain Conder's paper on "France and Syria." Sir Julius Vogel, as might be expected, takes the colonial view of the annexation of New Guinea; and Mr. Clark takes, as naturally perhaps, the Boer view of the Transvaal question. Both papers, however, are well worth reading. We have dealt elsewhere with Mr. Macrea's article on "Criminal Jurisdiction over Englishmen in India," and need only say here that it is the most succinct and lucid exposition of the principles and facts of Mr. Ilbert's Bill which has yet appeared in England. Mr. Macrea is himself an English barrister practising in India, and therefore speaks from personal knowledge and experience. He is thoroughly in favour of the Bill, for reasons of policy as well as justice.—The writer of the two previous articles on the Radical party returns to the subject in this month's Fortnightly, and sets himself to explain the machinery on which the Radical programme must be carried out. This consists of manhood suffrage, redistribution of seats based on scrutin de liste, and payment of Members. He meets the objection that this last article of the Radical creed would be likely to "vulgarise the people's House, and would deteriorate its social qualities," with the question whether the demeanour of men like Earl Percy and Lord Folkestone, or that of Mr. Broadhurst and Mr. Burt, is more likely to deteriorate the manners and social amenities of Parliament. Such a question, however, only shows that a selection of names can be so made as to tell in favour of the proposed change as well as against it. No man in his senses would deny this; but that does not show that the raising up of a great class of purely professional politicians would not injure the British Parliament. The present article is to be followed next month by an article "containing a comprehensive scheme of legislative action, which, in subsequent numbers, will be examined and explained in detail." The review of "Home and Foreign Politics" is able and fair. Altogether, Mr. Escott has furnished his readers this month with an interesting and admirably selected bill of fare.

There are several articles in the Nineteenth Century besides those on which we have already commented which will be found to be of interest, such as Miss Nightingale's; on "Our Indian Stewardship," "The German and British Armies," by Captain Hozier, "The Cholera and our Water Supply," by Dr. Frankland, and "France and the Slave-trade in Madagascar," by Mr. Goodrich. Mr. Holyoake's "American and Canadian Notes" are both interesting and instructive. But, on the whole, the Nineteenth Century this month contains nothing striking, either in its subjects or in their treatment. Mr. Pearson's speculations on "After Death" we may, perhaps, discuss separately, but must add here that he altogether misstates both "the doctrine of Churchmen" and of the early Christians on that subject. Like many others, Mr. Pearson confounds the eschatology of historical and ecclesiastical Christianity with the repulsive eschatology of Calvin.

The Contemporary Review of this month is hardly up to the mark. We have already noticed Mr. Reid's valuable article on "The Suez Canal Question." Besides this and one other, there is no article on topics of the day. Mr. Froude is always worth reading, whether we agree with him or not, and his pen has lost none of its cunning in his second article on Luther. Mr. Michael Davitt contributes an interesting and suggestive article on "Penal Servitude," written with great moderation, good sense, and knowledge of the subject. Mr. Lilly's "Saints of Islam" will interest students of that politico-religious system; and Mr. Llewelyn Davies criticises with acuteness and ability M. Renan's most egotistical and interesting autobiography. Mr. Haggard's article, on "Europeans and Natives in India," should be read in conjunction with Mr. Macrea's in the Fortnightly Review. It is an able defence of Mr. Ilbert's Bill.

It evidently takes a long time to awaken the "dormant talent" of the Tory party, at least in the pages of the National Review. There is not an article in this number which rises above mediocrity—few which reach it—nor is there one which discusses any of the subjects of the day, except Mr. St. George Mivart's on "National Education." Tory writers of name appear to prefer the pages of other magazines for their contributions, at least this month, a fact which may be accounted for by a generous desire to leave the National Review as a field for the resurgent energies of the "dormant talents." Nor will poverty of subjects and of treatment be held, even in Conservative minds, to be atoned for by rabid violence of language towards political opponents. Mr. Ilbert's Bill is described as "negotiations with Brahminical disloyalty." The Suez Canal "provisional scheme" was "an idiotically bad bargain for English merchants and shipowners." If Mr. Gladstone "got his deserts, he would be driven from public life." "He does not know what love of country means." "He is not a patriot"—a superfluous piece of information, one would think, after the previous sentence; "all the resources of his nature, and all the expedients of his intelligence"—which are not included, apparently, among "all the resources of his nature"—are not employed "for the advantage of England, but for the indulgence of a colossal self-love." He is "the curse of his country." In short, the Cabinet does not contain one statesman, and Mr. Gladstone "and his colleagues have no real touch of the reason and serious wishes of their countrymen." But it is no wonder that writers who are too angry to master the details of political events passing before their eyes should fail to gauge the minds and characters or understand the policy of their opponents. The editors talk repeatedly of M. de Lesseps's claim to "an absolute and eternal monopoly" in piercing the Isthmus of Suez, the eternity in question being, in fact, bounded by a term of ninety-nine years. The metaphors, too, of the dual editorship are as confused as their reasoning and facts. "The Government," we are told, "are reaping distinct benefit from the variety and multiplicity of their blunders." The public thus become as "much embarrassed and baffled as a man finds himself to be who tries to drive half-a-dozen cows out of a field into which they have all broken at the same time." We are thus left to conclude that the "baffled" man in question, failing to drive out the intruders, suddenly changes his mind, and persuades himself that the presence of the cows in his field is a "distinct benefit." It is from no ill-will to the National Review that we make these observations. On the contrary, we should welcome with pleasure a magazine which should discuss contemporary politics with temper and ability from a Tory point of view. But wild and insensate vituperation is not discussion.

There is a good deal of pleasant and some profitable reading to be got out of the cheaper Magazines this month, although the languid quarter has begun. Blackwood is mixed; its political article, "Liberal Subservience to France and its Results," is not very violent, while it is more than commonly dull; so that our old friend fails to amuse us so much as usual. On the other hand, we find a capital paper on the late King Mtésa, of Uganda, an African potentate who has never ceased to interest Europeans since he was introduced to them by Captain Speke more than twenty years ago; also a curious description of the Belka Arabs. Most authentic accounts of the Desert tribes are disenchanting; this one is no exception. The dignified Sheik, who, after lavishing lofty sentiments upon the travellers, decamps with their pewter teapot in his saddle-bag, disappoints us as much as Mr. Sala's noble Indian chief. A criticism of three recent French novels and Coppée's "Vingt Contes Nouveaux" is an exceedingly common-place production, strangely below the usual standard of similar articles in Blackwood.

So vast an amount of nonsense has of late been talked and written about actors and dramatic matters generally, that it is refreshing to read in Macmillan the cool and discriminating remarks of Mr. Mowbray Morris, "On Some Recent Theatrical Criticisms," and to find him protesting against the ridiculous exaggeration which surrounds our most popular modern actors with a destructive atmosphere of adulation, and would persuade the world that interpreters of Shakespeare are almost the poet's peers. The writer puts the moral of his clever essay into one telling little paragraph, as follows:—"He who clearly understands how vast the gap which separates, and must ever separate the actor from such a poet as Shakespeare, will have done far more to lessen the gap, than he who claims for himself a place with the poet on the farther side." "A Review of the Month," admirably done—as comprehensive as the "Quinzaine" of the Revue des Deux Mondes, and more crisp—is an attractive feature of Macmillan, which also contains a very pleasant article called "Ranche Life in the Far West." The new series of Cornhill does not remove by the second number the dubious impression that the first created. We fail to see the reasonableness of the change of a magazine whose chief raison d'être was a refined and elevated choice of literary articles—for we presume any magazine could have procured a similar class of fiction by paying at the same rate for it—into a sixpenny collection of stories and papers in nowise superior to the Argosy, which had already "the sixpenny public" for its clientèle. The old Cornhill has decidedly left a gap; we do not think the new Cornhill has found one. The best paper in number two is the first, a vivid and sympathetic description of scenes at a veterinary college, under the title of "Some Sick Poor."

In Time, we find an interesting account, by Mr. Dutton Cook, of two notorious criminals, Wainewright the poisoner ("Janus Weathercock"), and Madame Lafarge. It is strange that in the case of the first, the writer makes no reference to the well-known and horrible story of Wainewright's threat to the dying man whom he attended in the prison infirmary at Hobart Town; and in the case of the second, he seems to be unaware of the ultimate fate of the criminal. Madame Lafarge was liberated from the modified imprisonment which her state of health had procured for her, by Louis Napoleon, when he became President of the Republic, and died very shortly afterwards, in an obscure French town, tended by an old servant. No member of her family visited her or attended her funeral, and her relatives forbade any inscription to be placed upon the slanting cross which marks, but does not indicate, her grave. If the memoirs of M. Lachaud are ever given to the world, we shall, no doubt, learn much that will be interesting about the cause célèbre which was such a stepping-stone to fame for the afterwards great advocate. Otherwise, Time is rubbishy.

Belgravia is, as usual, strong in fiction, having the beginning of a story by Mr. Charles Gibbon, and the continuation of one by Mr. Justin McCarthy, with two clever, short stories, and a "dialogue" by Onida, besides. Mr. Phil. Robinson on feline creatures, or, as he puts it, "The Heptarchy of the Cats," is as felicitous and quaint as usual. A would-be historical article, called "How the Comte de Chambord's Crown was Lost," is "weakness indeed." Its style is that of a school-girl's essay, and the accuracy of the writer's knowledge may be tested by the fact that she is unaware of the existence of any member of the "elder branch" of the Bourbon family, except the Comte de Chambord. The recent dissensions of the pretended movement of the Legitimist party on behalf of Don Jaime might have corrected her history to that extent.

The two Roman Catholic magazines, The Month and Merry England, are fairly up to their respective standards. We note a very fine etching, by Mr. Tristram Ellis, of the principal entrance to the New Law Courts, as the attractive frontispiece of Merry England.

Aunt Judy is thoroughly delightful. We are glad to see the zeal, spirit, and variety with which this periodical, so valuable to the young, is kept up. The stories are very good, and the competition questions interesting and attractive. This department of Aunt Judy's Magazine is of solid educational value.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Edinburgh Review, July. (Longmans.)—This seems to us a number of more than ordinary value and interest, except for its strange deficiency in politics. The first article, "Don John of Austria," is nominally a review of a work by the late Sir William Stirling Maxwell, really an original essay on the subject, and gives with much force and liveliness of writing a compendious view of a striking career. It is not unworthy to be ranked with the historical articles of the Review's best days. Another historical article, "Charles VII.," sticks more closely to its text, the Marquis de Beaucourt's "Histoire de Charles VII." With these may be ranked an excellent review of M. Glasson's "History of English Law." Science is represented by an article on serpents; the belles lettres by essays on the "Ancient, Mediæval, and Modern Stage," the conclusion of which on the morality of the stage is expressed with admirable force and gravity; by "The Angler's Library," and "Pedigrees and Peerages." Some very valuable information is given about the social and economical condition of the rural population of Italy. The terrible incubus of a vast military expenditure weighs upon Italy more heavily than on any other Continental country, and the peasantry seem to be, for this and for other reasons, worse off. The political writer of the Review, wearied, he tells us, of English politics,—and probably not very loyal to Liberalism,—turns to the Far East, and reviews the proceedings of the French in Anam and Tonquin.

A Moment of Madness. By Florence Marryat. 3 vols. (F. V. White and Co.)—This is a collection of short tales and miscellaneous papers, that have done service before, we presume, as padding for magazines. The motive of the first story is the passion of a married man for a woman not his wife. The second repeats the incident, with an addition which we cannot but think makes it remarkably offensive. Captain Norton (the story is entitled "Captain Norton's Diary") falls in love with a young woman who comes to stay with him and his wife; and the young woman falls in love with him. There is not the least excuse, in domestic unhappiness or in any other conceivable reason. It is an act of sheer fickleness and wantonness. The story ends thus, with words supposed to be written ten years afterwards: "There was a time when I used to think and say [to his wife, we suppose] that all my happiness lay buried in the grave of Lionne; but I have lived to learn and believe that at the Last Day it shall rise again, with her to bloom, ten thousand times renewed, in heaven!" Was there ever anything more nauseous? There are two or three ghost stories, fairly good of their kind; and some miscellaneous stories, of which it is sufficient to say that they are of a medium quality. Of course, in "Mother" the law is wrong. If Charles Vere's father died intestate, the real property, including the house, came to him, and the wicked wife who suddenly reappears had no right over it beyond that of "dower," and certainly could not turn him any one out of it. There is an interesting account of the life and death of the Duke of Brabant, King Leopold II. of Belgium's only son, and one or two other readable papers. "In propria personæ," we may remark, by the way, is not the usual form.

We must be content with acknowledging a work any detailed examination of which would carry us far beyond the province to which we are limited in these columns. In The New Golden Age (Blackwood and Sons), Mr. R. Hogarth Patterson has related the history of gold discoveries since 1848, discussing simultaneously "the influence of the precious metals upon the world." The first book deals with the early days of the discovery, both in California and Australia; the second book is entitled "a retrospect," and gives a history of the precious metals down to the beginning of the present century. The third book treats of "the period of renewed scarcity," the fourth discusses the relative effects of "cheap" and "dear" money, the fifth shows how the new supplies of gold brought about a vast increase of commercial enterprise. An appendix supplies figure of gold production since 1492. Mr. Paterson's theory that increase of gold means increase of wealth certainly derives support from income-tax statistics. In 1842, each penny produced £772,000. In twelve years this had not risen higher than £809,000. Then came the discovery of gold, and a progressive rise till the sum reached in 1879-80 was £1,840,000.

NEW EDITIONS.—It is a good proof that the race of those who buy books is still sufficiently numerous, when we find a publisher undertaking so serious a work as the reissue of Sir Walter Scott's edition of Dryden. The first and second volumes of The Works of John Dryden, with Notes, Life, &c., by Sir Walter Scott, revised and corrected by George Saintsbury (Paterson, Edinburgh), are now before us. The first volume contains the life, the second some of the plays. Mr. Saintsbury's purpose is to re-edit the whole as it may be supposed, Sir Walter Scott, had he been alive to do it, would have re-edited it. He makes use of whatever additional materials have come to hand since Sir Walter Scott's work came out, Pepys' "Diary" being the principal item; and he has carefully revised the text. Personally, we are inclined to think that the ordinary editions of Dryden give quite as much as we want, and that the plays might have been left in the obscurity to which a common consent has relegated them. Still, if a complete edition was to come out, it could not have been entrusted to better hands than Mr. Saintsbury's; nor could it have had a more handsome form than the publishers have given to the volumes before us.—We welcome heartily a collection by Professor S. R. Gardiner of his works relating to the history of the earlier part of the seventeenth century. These are now to take the form of a History of England, 1603-1642, which is to extend to ten volumes. The first volume, reaching down as far as the year 1610, is now before us. Professor Gardiner has had at his disposal much additional material, manuscript and other, since the contents of this volume first appeared, and they have been accordingly, he tells us, thoroughly revised, and in part rewritten.—Lectures on the Science and Art of Education. By the late Joseph Payne. Edited by his Son, Joseph Frank Payne, M.D. (Longmans).—Mr. Payne was one of the earliest preachers in England of a doctrine which was then almost new, that there is an art of teaching. Here we have collected some of the lectures in which he set forth his theory, lectures of solid value, which are well worth preserving in a permanent shape.—We have received a reprint of the Secrets of Angling, by "J. D.," 1613, with an introduction by Thomas Westwood. (W. Satchell and Co.)—Mr. Westwood proves, satisfactorily, it would seem, that "J. D." was a certain John Dennys, of Pucklechurch, in the county of Gloucester. This reprint is "a strictly faithful and literal transcript of the edition of 1613." We may give, as a specimen of "J. D.'s" verse, a stanza in which he describes the first of an angler's three requirements:—

"The first is Faith, not wavering and unstable,
But such as had that holy Patriarch old,
That to the Highest was so acceptable,
As his increase and offspring manifold
Exceeded far the starres innumerable.
So must he still a firme persuasion holde,
That where as waters, brookes, and lakes are found,
There store of Fish without all doubt abound."

Alas! it was easier in this, as in other matters, for our ancestors to have faith, than for us.—XVII. Opusculi, by Juan de Valdes, translated from the Spanish and Italian, and edited by John T. Betts (Trübner and Co.)

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE Egyptian question has been twice raised in the Commons this week,—once on Monday, and again, with more elaboration, on Thursday. On Monday, Mr. John Morley put to the Prime Minister a question intended to elicit a declaration that our troops would soon quit Egypt. Mr. Morley referred to the well-known declarations of the British Government that they had no intention of occupying Egypt for an indefinite term, and to Lord Hartington's remark early in the Session that our troops would probably be evacuating Egypt within six months, and asked what steps the Government proposed to take, in order to give effect to their various declarations. Before Mr. Gladstone replied, Mr. Bourke thereupon asked whether certain passages which he cited from Lord Dufferin's despatch of February 6th did not lead to the conclusion that the Government were pledged to secure for our intervention an "enduring" as well as a "beneficent" result, and whether it is clearly understood by foreign Powers that "no subversive influence shall intervene between England and that Egypt she has re-created." Further, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, wishing to fortify Mr. John Morley, asked whether Lord Dufferin had not declared, in a despatch dated April 29th, that "the material tranquillity of Egypt" is absolute from one end to the other.

To this little sheaf of questions Mr. Gladstone replied in a way which appears to have comforted Mr. Bourke and the Conservatives, more than it comforted the two advocates of immediate evacuation. He answered Sir Wilfrid Lawson in the affirmative indeed, and said that "nothing could well be more satisfactory than the effects produced in Egypt, not merely by the presence of a British force, but by the reorganising operations steadily in progress." There was no change at all in the intentions of the Government, as expressed at various times by various members of it, but it was only fair to remember that Lord Hartington, when he spoke nearly six months ago and named six months as the probable duration of our further occupation, guarded himself by saying that he was speaking on mere conjecture, and not in the least giving an undertaking. No statement was made to the other Powers of Europe as to the duration of the occupation, in any terms whatever, though they were assured of our general intention, which, Mr. Gladstone believed, they fully understood. The object of the Government in Egypt is "not merely to secure tranquillity for the moment, but likewise to obviate future perturbation." Now, the cholera epidemic which has been prevalent has very seriously interfered with the organisation of the institutions of Egypt and with the collection of the revenue, and has raised new questions as to the collection of the revenue, and this prevents Mr. Gladstone "from being able to anticipate any very early withdrawal of the troops." The Government wish, when they leave Egypt, to leave something "more firm and stable than the fabric which was overthrown." "We cannot in such a case command the future, all that we can do is to take means which are rational and equitable with reference to the future." There was not the least reason to apprehend any interference by foreign Powers.

On Tuesday Mr. Gladstone read the résumé of a letter from Lord Dufferin on the subject of the progress made in Egypt. The Egyptian Army Lord Dufferin reports to be in a quite satisfactory condition; the constabulary is not so forward, and the police need a great deal more organising. Lord Dufferin thinks that a fair body of Judges has been secured, but it had been necessary to translate the Judicial Code into Arabic, and that had caused delay. All the arrangements for the election of the elective portion of the Legislature had been drawn up and published, but Lord Dufferin did not know what had been done in relation to the nominative element of the Legislature. An English engineer had prepared a plan of irrigation which was favourably regarded by the Government, though no decision had been taken. And a plan had been submitted for the taxation of foreigners. That was all Lord Dufferin could say as to the progress of the new Egyptian institutions.

On Thursday, a debate on Egypt was raised by Mr. John Morley, who, on the occasion of the vote for the Diplomatic Service, called attention to our occupation of Egypt, in order to urge our speedy evacuation. He denied that we could prevent anarchy in Egypt, which was there when we went, and would be there while we stayed; but so long as we had even a corporal's guard there, we should be held responsible for everything that happened. Mr. Bourke spoke in the other sense, that of our responsibility for establishing a good and stable order in Egypt. Sir Charles Dilke, in a very able speech, cordially accepted the policy of a gradual reduction of our force and an ultimate withdrawal. He held out the prospect of a large reduction of our force—now not much over 6,700 men—before the winter, by which time the Egyptian Army would be effective. He held that the happiness of the people of Egypt was the great object of our policy, and he did not expect that we should leave anarchy behind us when we withdrew.

Sir Stafford Northcote deprecated annexation or permanent occupation, but thought that language indicating a fixed intention to withdraw without giving any guarantee for the order of Egypt might be dangerous. And this called up Mr. Gladstone, on whose speech we have commented at some length elsewhere, and of which we feel bound to say that it throws more doubt than we like on the intention of the Government to back firmly the restored order of Egypt, after they have withdrawn their troops. That is the real question. Have we gone to Egypt to set up what any one may pull down, so soon as we leave, or have we gone there to establish a system which we intend to support?

Spanish politics seem very unsettled. At Badajoz on Sunday there was a small military rising, pretty easily put down, a rising apparently due to a Republican feeling in favour of the constitution of 1869, though others attribute it—without, however, much plausibility—to the desire to conceal some peculations of public money. But this explanation is rendered very improbable by the little risings which have since taken place near Barcelona, Logroño, and Seo de Urgel. On Wednesday there was a rising of the Numancia cavalry at Domingo de la Calzada, near Logroño; and on the same day, at Hostelfrancho, close to Barcelona, there was a demonstration of armed citizens against the Government, and apparently in favour of a Republic. On Thursday the troops rose at Seo de Urgel. None of the risings seem to have been in any degree formidable, but scattered risings throughout the country seem to indicate a good deal of discontent. It is said that the constitution is to be suspended.

The Lord Mayor gave a banquet at the Mansion House to her Majesty's Ministers on Wednesday, at which Mr. Gladstone spoke. The newest Ministerial statement made had reference to the proceedings of the French Admiral at Tamatave, hitherto reported by telegraph only. "My Lord Mayor," he said, "her Majesty's Government have now received some further intelligence by the ordinary methods of communication. When the telegraphic news came from Madagascar, we felt satisfied that it contained nothing that need present to us any difficulties, except such as would be solved by frank communications between the Governments concerned, and by those generous and honourable dispositions which I trust will always prevail amongst friendly nations, and especially, if I may say so, between ourselves and our great neighbour across the Channel. I will only now say that that further knowledge which we claim at this moment to possess, which has hardly come to our eyes, though it has partially reached them,—I have not yet been minutely acquainted with all the particulars,—justifies me in saying that those cheerful hopes which we entertained are confirmed by the better and larger means of judgment which we now possess; and I feel confident,—reasonably and even sanguinely confident,—that nothing will arise out of these transactions that can disturb the long accord between England and France, which has now survived an anxious and interesting struggle."

The rest of Mr. Gladstone's speech contained a sentence as to the occupation of Egypt, which we quote in another column, a review, not too optimistic, but by no means disheartening, of the achievements of the Government in pacifying Ireland and in English legislation, and a passage on the experiment of Grand Committees, in which Mr. Gladstone adhered strongly to his hopeful view of the work to be done by invoking the principle of division of labour and of devolution, and he declared that it is by expedients of this kind alone that the House of Commons can hope to overtake the arrears of work for which it is called upon. We sincerely hope that Mr. Gladstone is right. Certainly, if the discussions in the Grand Committees are likely to be so far trusted that the House will consent to read a third time and pass in the middle of August, all measures which have come back from the Grand Committees,—and if the House of Lords will pass those measures at the end of August,—the experiment will prove a success. But certainly, the experiment of 1883 ought to be improved upon in 1884, if the Grand Committees are to do all that Mr. Gladstone hopes. It will hardly do in general to leave so much to the fag-end of a Session as has been necessarily left to the fag-end of this Session.

Of the other speeches, Lord Hartington's, on the too hasty depreciation to which our Army organisation is subjected, was interesting, as he showed that the deficiency in our Recruiting system had already been got over, and that 5,000 more men had been enlisted up to the present time than had been enlisted last year up to the same period. Lord Kimberley made some rather dubious remarks on the value of the House of Lords as a Revising Chamber, declaring that he did not think there was any second Chamber which discharged the functions of a second Chamber better than the House of Lords. We should be inclined to think that in many respects the American Senate, the French Senate, and even the German Council of Princes discharge the functions of a second Chamber better than the House of Lords,—and certainly that the first two cause a great deal less embarrassment by their fixed prepossessions. But no one can deny that the House of Lords is still very popular in England, and that its historical hold on our imagination is great. Moreover, England certainly is not a soil in which brand-new institutions flourish. Nevertheless, of no revising Chamber in the world is it more difficult to anticipate the action than to anticipate the action of the House of Lords; nor is there any whose independent action, when it thwarts that of the popular Assembly, is so dangerous, and so likely to excite a conflict between class and class.

On Tuesday the House of Commons read the National Debt Bill a second time, after a very careful exposition by Mr. Childers of the mode in which he proposed to redeem £173,300,000 of Debt in twenty years. He reminded the House that, notwithstanding the passing of this Bill, the taxpayer would, before 1887, get a remission of £1,100,000 a year in consequence of the expiration in 1885 of the annuity of £800,000 a year raised to meet the preparations sanctioned by Parliament in connection with the Russo-Turkish war, and of the expiration of £500,000 a year in 1887 on account of the Afghan war. These together would bring a relief of £1,300,000; only this had to be reduced by about £200,000 a year increased charge for the local-loan sinking fund, leaving £1,100,000 to go to the relief of taxation within the next four years. Sir Stafford Northcote spoke hesitatingly against the Bill, chiefly on the ground of its being too late to discuss the details. He also made some highly inaccurate comments on Mr. Gladstone's Budget speeches of 1853 and 1860, and on their supposed inconsistency with the policy of the Government as indicated in the present Bill; to which Mr. Gladstone replied with great force and eloquence, correcting Sir Stafford Northcote's erroneous history, and showing that the Government are proving a better stepmother to Sir Stafford Northcote's plan of 1875 for redeeming Debt, than its own mother ever has been.

Mr. Anderson and Mr. Illingworth spoke from the Liberal side against the Bill—Mr. Rylands and his amendment had prudently vanished into space—and Sir G. Goldney from the Conservative side warmly in its favour. Sir John Lubbock also made a very powerful speech for the Bill, showing that we require local authorities to repay debt within fifty years, and yet make no adequate provision at all for repaying the Debt of the whole nation in spite of the rapid increase of wealth,—an increase for the continuance of which we have no adequate security, when our coal is obtained at a greater and greater cost every year, and the competition of other nations is running us so close. After speeches against the Bill from Mr. W. H. Smith and Lord George Hamilton, Sir S. Northcote declared it his intention to record his vote against the Bill, when its second reading was carried by 149 votes against 95 (majority, 54).

The trial of the Liverpool dynamiteurs before Mr. Justice Stephen ended on Thursday, with the conviction of four of them—Timothy Fetherstone, Dennis Deasy, Patrick Flanagan, and Henry Dalton—for treason-felony. O'Herlihy was discharged on Wednesday, on the ground that there was not sufficient evidence to identify him with the crime committed. The speech of the Solicitor-General on the evidence was very masterly, and, to our mind, final; and Mr. Justice Stephen's summing-up left so little doubt in the minds of the jury that, after an hour's deliberation, they brought in all four prisoners guilty. They were sentenced to penal servitude for life,—a wholesome warning to future meddlers in the policy of dynamite.

The French prospects in Anam are somewhat altered by the death of Tu Duc, the "Emperor" of Anam, as he was called,—though he never for a moment failed to assert his allegiance to the Emperor of China,—on July 20th, at Hué, and the nomination of Vianlan as his successor by the Anamite Mandarins,—Vianlan being committed, as it is said, to a very active anti-French policy. Vianlan is believed to be a brother of Tu Duc, but, in any case, it is understood that he represents the party which is most hostile to the French claims.

In the House of Lords, on Tuesday, the second reading of the Agricultural Holdings Bill was moved by Lord Carlingford in an able speech, in which he insisted that it was quite right to give the tenant compensation for his improvements in proportion more or less to the actual advantage which they brought to his successor,—always refusing, however, to include in the tenant's improvements extra-yield clearly due to the inherent excellence of the soil; so that if sometimes a tenant lost by an intended improvement which was not successful, he should, on the other hand, sometimes gain even more than his outlay by an improvement which was eminently successful. He insisted also on the necessity of not making this compensation permissive, i.e., on not allowing a landlord, by previous compact with the tenant, to contract himself out of the law. Tenants were not always able to insist on having justice done to them, but what was more to the purpose, it was for the good of agriculture,—for the benefit of the country at large,—that tenants should feel secure that any prudent investment in the land could not be lost to them through either the landlords' or their own fault. The Royal Commission on Agriculture had recommended a compulsory measure, and the permissive measure of 1875 had, in fact, proved inoperative.

seding freedom of contract, the early part of his resolution being described by himself as merely "padding." He thought it an ominous thing that the same Irishman who had in the Commons moved the second reading of the first Irish Land Bill, should now move in the Lords the second reading of a Bill which threatened England with the principles of the Irish Land Act. He regarded free contract as the very marrow and pith of all sound trade and agriculture, and he was not disposed to give up that view at the bidding even of the Richmond Commission. He declared that when Lord Beaconsfield heard that the Richmond Commission had reported in favour of protecting the tenant against an arbitrary increase of rent, Lord Beaconsfield had cried out, "By God, if they have done that, then the Government can carry any Land Bill they choose!"—an assertion disputed by the Duke of Richmond, who declared that the reports of that Commission had been submitted to Lord Beaconsfield, and were "published with his sanction and approval,"—an instructive light on the subserviency of the Commission to one who was not a member of it. The Duke's statement, however, does not appear to us to be at all inconsistent with Lord Wemyss's story, for which he declared that he had the personal authority of the gentleman who spoke to Lord Beaconsfield on the matter, and who heard his exclamation. According to Lord Wemyss, Tories and Liberals were both playing for the farmer's vote, and willing to violate all sound economic principles in order to obtain it.

The rest of the debate was discursive, and not very real. The Duke of Richmond said that a great deal of the new Bill was taken from the vilified Permissive Act of 1875, and that in 1875 it would have been perfectly impossible to pass the compulsory Bill for which the country was now prepared. He approved the Bill generally, though censuring the Government for sending it up so late to the House of Lords. Lord Bramwell followed in the high-scientific wake of Lord Wemyss, condemning every interference with freedom of contract. Lord Carnarvon thought the Bill quite unneeded—chiefly, it seemed, because he had never had any difficulty with his own tenants—but yet intended to vote for its second reading, and move amendments in Committee. Lord Kimberley commented ironically on this rather odd line of action, and Lord Salisbury complimented Lord Wemyss for assuming the position of leader of a volunteer Opposition, though he himself thought the Bill innocent of the original sin of the Irish land legislation imputed to it by Lord Wemyss. Lord Wemyss's amendment was negatived by 55 votes to 9.

The debate on the South-African policy of the Government came off on Monday night in two separate instalments,—the first on their Transvaal policy, and the second on their Zulu policy. First, Mr. Gorst moved to reduce the vote for the charges of the Government in South Africa by the salary of the Transvaal Resident, on the ground that the presence of a Resident in the Transvaal was absolutely useless for any purpose whatever. The British Resident had acted as an agent to procure guns for the Transvaal Government, to be used against Mapoch, who was under our protection; and there were plenty of other evidences that the British Resident was perfectly useless for all the purposes for which he was appointed. Mr. Forster generally supported the same view of the case, insisting that with regard to the Bechuana tribes, we were bound in honour to support them against the Transvaal freebooters, and that Sir Hercules Robinson held that 500 mounted men would be a sufficient force for effective intervention. Mr. Evelyn Ashley denied that the British Resident was of no use, and gave instances of his representations being attended to by the Transvaal Government; moreover, he anticipated the best results from the Transvaal delegation which is to come here in October, and which is to consist of Mr. Kruger, General Schmidt, and the Minister of Education. Mr. Gladstone, while remarking that the Government could not agree with Sir Hercules Robinson in his vague estimate as to the force that would be necessary to put everything right in Bechuanaland, and observing how grossly they had often been deceived in this sort of estimate of the South-African authorities, urged that what the Government had to consider was the danger of bringing on a general war with all the Dutch population of South Africa. He maintained that the natives were better and not worse off than they would have been had the British Government intervened. Finally, Mr. Gorst's amendment was negatived without a division.

Then Mr. Dawnay moved to reduce the charge for South-African purposes by the salary of the Resident with Cetewayo, and made a very strong attack on Cetewayo and the policy of the Government in restoring him,—a speech, in fact, of sympathy with John Dunn. Mr. Evelyn Ashley, in reply, threw a good deal of blame on Cetewayo for attacking Usibepu, but defended the policy of the Government in restoring him as the only policy which gave the hope of any sort of Government in Zululand. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach also attacked the Government for restoring Cetewayo, and especially for restoring him in the way they did; to whom Mr. Gladstone replied that it was one thing to carry destruction into a country, as the policy of the Tory Administration had done, and quite another to try to piece together "the broken fragments which were the monument of the statesmanship of the right honourable gentleman." In fact, the discussion came to very little beyond this,—that the Tory Government and Sir Bartle Frere did the mischief which the present Government has been as yet wholly unsuccessful in repairing; and that is the simple truth. Mr. Dawnay's amendment was negatived without a division.

It is stated from Natal, and now admitted in England, that Cetewayo was not killed, as was said, in the recent action with Usibepu, but that he escaped, and is lying concealed with only two insignificant wounds in his leg. Mr. William Grant, the Resident Adviser of Cetewayo, tells the Standard's reporter that he has no doubt as to the truth of the story of Cetewayo's safety; and Mr. Evelyn Ashley has confirmed the report in the House of Commons. Whether Cetewayo attacked Usibepu, as the Government believe, or Usibepu attacked him, as Sir Wilfrid Lawson seems to believe, it is at present impossible to determine with certainty, though the official view is in this case all the more likely, that Cetewayo was, before this military outbreak, rather in the good graces of the Government. But, for the present at least, Cetewayo will probably count for less in the politics of Zululand than he has ever done before, except, of course, during his captivity at the Cape.

Mr. W. H. Smith made one of those bitter party speeches at the London and Westminster Working Men's Conservative Association on Monday which, coming from so mild and business-like a man, produces the effect of a lion's roar in the mouth of a beaver. He was particularly fierce with the Government for not resigning on the Suez-Canal agreement,—an agreement which the Government negotiated at the request of the commercial men of all parties, and announced their intention from the first only to propose subject to the approval of commercial men of all parties, and of Parliament. Lord Beaconsfield's Government never said this of their Water Bill; yet did Lord Beaconsfield ever think of resigning because the Water Bill introduced by Sir Richard (then Mr.) Cross was contemptuously repudiated by the country in general? Mr. Smith must know perfectly well that the Tory Government never dreamt of resigning on that ground, though the contemptuous rejection of that measure by the country probably hastened the dissolution which Lord Beaconsfield saw other reasons for advising. Yet no reference was made to the withdrawn Water Bill in Lord Beaconsfield's appeal to the country.

Mr. Blake, M.P., told a good story to some Irish fishermen with whom he made an appointment at Billingsgate Market on Tuesday morning, for the purpose of expounding to them some of the secrets of the fish market. The supply of lobsters at Dunmore, in the county of Waterford, had, he said, some years ago begun to fall off, and it was supposed that the introduction of male lobsters from Northern Europe would improve the breed. Scandinavian lobsters were brought, but the Irish lobsters resented the advent of these Scandinavian males so furiously that their corpses were found strewn,—claws, legs, and bodies all dismembered,—on every shore in the neighbourhood of Dunmore. An old lobster fisherman from Connemara listened to Mr. Blake's tale with glistening eyes, and then ejaculated, "Begor! after that I'll have a veneration for the lobster I never had afore!" Probably the good man regarded the invading lobsters as Britons, and the Irish lobsters who resented their intervention as good Fenians. But "veneration" for a lobster is a delightfully new form of enthusiasm.

THE OCCUPATION OF EGYPT.

MR. GLADSTONE'S speech in the House of Commons on Thursday night will be a very serious disappointment to all those who had, with us, sincerely believed that the Expedition to Egypt was deliberately intended to secure a better future for the people of Egypt, and not merely to give what the Prime Minister calls a "fair start" to a dubious experiment. Let us not be misunderstood. Nobody has more honestly desired to see the attempt at establishing a good Native Government in Egypt successful, than the Spectator. We are not eager for annexation. We are not desirous to see the burdens of the Empire increased. We are heartily desirous to see a progressive Oriental State of the genuine Oriental type established on secure foundations, if that be possible; that is, a good English Resident in Egypt, and some arrangement which would secure for his reasonable representations the authority which our Resident can exert, for instance, at Hyderabad. And we believe that such a result is possible. We go completely with Mr. Gladstone when he says, "We must not go to work with the supposition that we can efface every Oriental mark, and bring Egypt by any device of ours into the atmosphere and temperature of the most Western States." That is just the danger to which the often very mischievous interference of the House of Commons in Egyptian affairs directly tends; and we deprecate that tendency as much as Mr. Gladstone. But still, to come to the point of the issue, what did we go to Egypt to do, if we are to leave Egypt without any reasonable certainty that our intervention will have secured the country against the evils with which she was last year threatened? To our mind the expedition to Egypt was either altogether wrong, or it was an expedition undertaken in the interests of the Egyptian people, and one which we are bound to turn to the permanent and solid benefit of the Egyptian people. When Mr. Gladstone says that we went to Egypt only to secure the Khedive a new start—a fresh chance of governing Egypt as a good Oriental ruler would govern her—he says, to our minds, either too much or too little, for we did not secure him even that as an independent Oriental prince; and in order to secure him that as our ally, we must secure him a good deal more, namely, the promise of future support. No interposition of ours which was to cease completely, directly a new Government had been set on its legs, could possibly give the ruler of Egypt the chance of governing as a good Oriental ruler would govern. The mere fact of our intervention has made that impossible. The Khedive is no longer an absolute independent prince. Almost everything we have done has been done in the view of somewhat limiting his powers, and of securing for the Egyptian people some few of the advantages of Western institutions. The Khedive, left to act through such institutions, can never be in any sense a great Oriental Prince, and he himself knows this as well as any one. He knows that if he is to administer semi-Western institutions, he must rely for his support on the authority of a Western Power; and the sooner we face honestly the hopelessness of establishing institutions of the kind we contemplate in Egypt, without giving them some sort of tutelary help from the West, the sooner we shall face the true situation. It is perfectly true that so long as it is well known that such a support as this is really pledged to the Khedive, and that the Resident in Egypt when he does venture to speak authoritatively will have force at his back, there will be no need for a permanent occupation, however small the occupying force. It is perfectly true that there may be very few cases where interference will be needed, and that an able man like Sir E. Baring may be trusted to interfere effectually in the few cases in which there will be need for interference, so long as the ruler of Egypt knows perfectly well what force stands behind Sir E. Baring, and that that force is pledged to support him. But, to speak the truth, it is hopeless nonsense to assume, as some people seem to assume, that the artificial system which we are trying to bring about in Egypt can go on without this confidence at bottom that England means it to go on, and if it should fail, means to restore it. With such a confidence, everything is possible. Without such a confidence, nothing that we have done is of the slightest use. At present, we believe that such a confidence exists, and so long as it exists all will be well. But the Prime Minister's language on Thursday evening as to "the fair start," and no more than the fair start,—the impression he seemed to convey that we are under a far more serious obligation to evacuate Egypt than we are to see that a stable and beneficent Government is established in Egypt—alarms us very seriously, and seems to us to threaten the moderate success we have already achieved. Let us admit freely that we are bound to evacuate Egypt as soon as we have established a Government there which is stable and which is beneficent. Still, are we, or are we not, bound afterwards to see that that stable and beneficent Government is not upset from within or from without? That is the true test of the difference between the two parties to the dispute. We say that we are bound not only to set up such a Government, but to put it in working order, and to support it after we leave Egypt. Mr. John Morley and his friends appear to maintain the opposite. They want us to clear out of Egypt as soon as we can, and not to incur the slightest vestige of obligation to do again what we have once done, if it should be undone. But what side does the Government take? We should have said up to Thursday that the whole drift of its declarations was on our side. But since Mr. Gladstone's speech of Thursday, we confess ourselves in doubt. We fear that it is even more capable of the interpretation which Mr. John Morley would prefer, than of the interpretation which we should prefer.

The Pall Mall Gazette printed on Wednesday a little table of the objects with which the Government went to Egypt, a table defective in itself, and even if it were not defective, enumerating objects which no one who regards the position of Egypt in the most superficial way can regard as fulfilled. Here is the table, with the Pall Mall's estimate of the drift of Lord Dufferin's letter to Mr. Gladstone as to the degree in which the various objects are attained:—

OBJECTS.	HOW FAR ATTAINED.
To suppress the Military Rebellion	Accomplished.
To re-establish the Khedive	Accomplished.
To protect the freedom of the Canal	Accomplished.
To reorganise the Army	Almost completed.
To reorganise the Constabulary ...	Accomplished.
To reorganise the Police proper ...	A good deal still to do.
To reform the Judiciary	Judges secured. Code not yet translated.
To establish a Legislature.....	All arrangements made for elections.
To irrigate the Delta.....	Plan ready, but it awaits Khedive's sanction.
To subject Foreigners to Taxation	Plan also ready, but awaits sanction."

Now, in the first place, Lord Dufferin says that the reorganisation of the constabulary is not accomplished, but only in course of accomplishment. That, however, is a small matter. But as to all the last four heads, the summary here given conveys no idea at all of the utter inchoateness of the institutions to be established. The appointment of what is hoped may prove a fair body of Judges, though they have not yet got to work,—the translation of the Code into Arabic not having been completed,—comes to nothing. It is simply ridiculous to speak of the judicial system as provided for, when the first step only has been taken. The proof of the efficiency of the Judiciary, as of other institutions, is in its effective working; not in the preparation for a work which it is only hoped may prove successful. The administration of substantial justice in Egypt is the very key and the centre of the policy which we went to Egypt to establish. And yet our contemporary wants us to clear out of Egypt before there is the trace of evidence, or of the possibility of evidence, that our policy has been effectual. It is just the same with the establishment of a Legislature. The arrangements for the elections are made, though the nominated members have not yet, it seems, been appointed. But no elections have been held. No Legislature has been convened. No attempt has been made to see whether the Legislature will prove a centre of anarchy and disturbance, or a centre of orderly and progressive reform. What would the Pall Mall have said to a critic who had regarded the Assembly of the Notables before Arabi's revolt as sufficient security for the orderly progress of Egypt? Again, there is a plan for the irrigation of the Delta, there is a plan for taxing foreigners, but whether either plan will work, whether the foreigners, for instance, will submit patiently to be taxed, the Pall Mall no more knows than it knows what the weather of next year will be. Doubtless there are plans for improvements of all kinds in Egypt, but it is not the abundance of the plans, but the steadiness of the work in carrying out some few of them, that will test the value of our reconstructive policy in Egypt. Above all, there is the great question of the condition of the peasantry, and their relations with the money-lenders who have possessed themselves of mortgages on so large a number of their properties. How will that great and most difficult conflict work out? Will it reduce Egypt to anarchy, or not? Doubtless it will, if the new institutions, which are at present mere paper institutions, fail of their intended effect. We can imagine nothing more insane, more inconsistent with the whole policy of the Egyptian expedition, than it would be to evacuate Egypt, and give a sort of engagement never to return, with all these most essential reforms only made on paper, and not the least security for the effectual accomplishment of any one of them. Did we go to Egypt to make a show of restoring order and putting Egypt in the right track, or really to effect this? Did we go there to deliver her from military terror for a season, only in order to hand her over to the prospect of civil anarchy and a new military terror? If we did not, nothing could justify us in abandoning Egypt to her own resources with a lot of paper institutions to work out, which, without help and guidance, her statesmen are absolutely incompetent to work out. Doubtless Lord Hartington spoke not only without book, but without a trace of his usual judgment, when he was so rash as to contemplate that all this serious work could by any conceivable possibility be got through in a few months. But if,—only because Lord Hartington once made a hasty and ill-considered speech,—the Government were to evacuate Egypt, leaving all the most important part of their work undone, not only would Europe have the right to reproach this country with working pure mischief in going to Egypt at all, but the very party in England which was most reluctant to acquiesce in the Egyptian expedition would justly taunt the Government with having failed in the moral courage to achieve what they professed to think it their bounden duty to do.

We are fairly puzzled with this outcry from any party which once approved the Expedition, for a hasty casting-away of all the fruits which it was intended to bear. Mr. Gladstone said of Egypt, in his speech at the Mansion House on Wednesday,—“We have gone there with no selfish aims; we have a great work to perform; our desire is to accelerate its performance; but we must beware lest, by too inconsiderate an attempt at acceleration, we should spoil it. When it is accomplished, we shall disappear from that country; and the earlier its safe and adequate accomplishment can be attained, the more grateful will such a result be to the heart and mind of every one of her Majesty’s Ministers.” That is statesmanlike language, in which we completely agree, though we have our own opinion as to the probability of accomplishing that work within any very brief period. But we are much more doubtful of the effect of such a passage as the following, in Mr. Gladstone’s speech of Thursday night:—“The right honourable gentleman (Sir S. Northcote) has treated us as if we intended to remain in Egypt until we had brought about institutions which would do credit to Utopia. We have no such views. But we thought that in the circumstances in which we found ourselves in Egypt, we should not be justified in simply confining ourselves to the restoration of order and supplying the material means for its maintenance. We might have stopped at that point. But we have regarded it as part of our duty to have a judiciary in a position which could bear fair promise of answering the primary purposes connected with the administration of justice in a civilised society; and going beyond that, we have looked to the provision which was to be made for future legislation. But are we to say that we are to remain in Egypt until those institutions have reached such a condition that there may be no doubt whatever of their future stability? Such a view would be wholly visionary. How many countries are there in Europe at this moment—the most civilised and powerful—with regard to which few men will be bold enough to say what transmutations may not have occurred before many generations have passed over their heads? We have no such views. In popular language, we mean to give Egypt a fair start, and if we secure it order, supply a civil and military force adequate to the maintenance of order, and with a man on the throne in whose benevolence and justice we have confidence, with institutions for the administration of justice under enlightened supervision and in fairly competent hands,—if we have made a reasonable beginning towards legislative institutions, into which is incorporated some seed of freedom, our duty might be supposed to be complete.” Now, that sentence seems to us to involve the future of Egypt in doubt. If Egypt is to understand that we are certainly going so soon as “a fair start” has been secured, and that when we go our duty will be “complete,”—in other words, that we shall not restore what we have established, if it should be over-set, the whole structure is a house of cards. It will be over-set, just because we have given the impression that we will never do our work over again. As yet, everything is in germ. We might just as well fix a date for reaping the harvest when the seed is put in, or if one desires to be very hopeful, when the first green shoots are beginning to appear above the ground, as fix the date for finally abandoning Egypt, on the strength of such fulfilment of our aims there as we have already accomplished. But after all, it is not the evacuation of Egypt by the Army that is the most important point. The most important point is the diffusion of a confident belief that whether we have troops in Egypt or not, we do not intend to let what we have done be undone by either native intrigue or foreign interference. If there is any doubt on that point, our Egyptian expedition will be wasted, and our policy in Egypt will be a failure.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE NATIONAL DEBT.

THE Government is certainly to be congratulated on the division of Tuesday night, and still more on the faint-heartedness even of that part of the Opposition which was actually supported by votes. When the Conservatives found themselves rebuked by so staunch a Conservative as Sir G. Goldney, and told in so many words that under cover of resisting a mere method of reducing Debt, they were, in fact, resisting the only effective method of paying off Debt which had ever been discovered,—the method of terminable annuities,—they must have felt that they were making a bad figure before the country. And Sir Stafford Northcote doubtless did feel this. His reluctance in his first speech to indicate his own vote, his apologetic way of explaining in his second speech why he should give it against the Bill, told a sad story of vacillation and irresolution. The truth is, that only those who, like Mr. Mitchell Henry, Mr. Anderson, and Mr. Illingworth—Mr. Illingworth’s speech we regard with pure amazement, though he does not seem to have supported it with his vote—really prefer the diminution of taxation to the reduction of Debt, had any tenable position in opposing the Bill of the Government. Sir Stafford Northcote and Mr. W. H. Smith had no tenable position at all to take up. They pretended that Sir Stafford Northcote’s measure in 1875 for devoting not less than £28,000,000 to the service of the Debt would be sufficient to secure the devotion of the whole sum falling-in in 1885, by the expiration of the terminable annuities of £6,000,000 annually, to that purpose. Yet they know that even during Sir Stafford Northcote’s own tenure of office, his scheme was substantially trenched upon, in consequence of the financial pressure which Lord Beaconsfield’s policy entailed,—and this though there was no huge booty, such as £6,000,000 a year would be, to dangle before the eyes of the House of Commons, and so to tempt to a deviation from that plan. The first little strain that was put upon it was too much for the virtue of the Conservative Government, who proposed to borrow with one hand while they paid off with the other in order to prevent adding to the burdens of the country. When that took place even in relation to the small difference between £28,000,000 and the actual charge for the Debt which Sir Stafford Northcote had then to deal with, can any one in his senses suppose that with £6,000,000 revenue unappropriated except for Sir Stafford Northcote’s Act touching the payment of Debt, there would have been any possibility of securing the whole of it for that purpose? Would not Member after Member have pleaded, just as Sir Stafford Northcote himself pleaded in 1879, that considering how much had been done in former years for the reduction of Debt, there could be no harm in borrowing again for special purposes some part, if not the whole, of what had indeed been set apart by the Act of 1875 for the reduction of Debt, but only so set apart ten years before any great margin like this was within reach. It may be said, and no doubt it was virtually said on Tuesday night,—How does the hocus-pocus of terminable annuities alter the conditions of the case? Is it not just as easy to borrow, as Sir Stafford Northcote borrowed in 1879, on the avowed ground that so much had been paid off by terminable annuities that there was no immorality in borrowing some of it again, as it would be to stop some of the £6,000,000 on its way to the extinction of Debt, and divert it to the relief of taxation? The answer is that borrowing, as Sir Stafford Northcote found in 1878 and 1879, is held rather discreditable among a rich people, though it would not, probably, be held equally discreditable so to alter the Act of 1875 as to divert a portion of the surplus devoted to extinguishing Debt into another channel. But the terminable annuities, once created, must be provided for. In providing for them, you provide partly for meeting the obligation of a borrower to pay interest, partly for meeting the obligation of a borrower to pay off the principal; and the two processes are so thoroughly blended, that the latter obligation is sheltered under the shadow of the former. In this way the nation helps itself to identify absolutely the two obligations,—as, indeed, so far as the nation's means and wealth go, they ought to be identified,—and to see that it is falling short of its duty whenever it fails to meet those obligations, though the nation might not recognise that it was falling short, if the payment of interest and the repayment of the Debt itself were not inextricably blended. It is all very well to call this a hocus-pocus, as some able financiers did on Tuesday night. You might just as reasonably call it a hocus-pocus to invest the police with the double duty of arresting criminals and of ordering the traffic of crowded streets in the hope that they will gain in their former capacity a certain authority for the discharge of their duties in the latter capacity. There is, of course, no intrinsic reason why you should yield more respect to a policeman when he tells you which side of a street you must drive on, than you would to any person in a plain coat. But the fact that he is commissioned by the law to do one thing, gains him a great deal of additional respect for those duties in which he has not strictly official authority. And so it is with “the hocus-pocus” of terminable annuities. When the payment of interest and the repayment of a certain moderate amount of capital are bound up together in one and the same act, it is a great deal easier to inspire a sense of obligation for that compound act, than it is to inspire the same sense of obligation for the least obligatory of the two duties taken alone. There is many a hocus-pocus, if this is to be called a hocus-pocus, which is of the greatest possible importance in human life. If you can manage to identify the act of paying a debt with the act of paying even a voluntary subscription, the voluntary subscription is sure to be more punctually attended to, and to acquire a sort of factitious obligation from its connection with the weightier obligation; and this is much more true when the second act is a clear duty also, though a duty of a lower order than the one with which it is artificially identified. Anyhow, as a matter of fact, every one knows that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in an English House of Commons would never think of so far going back on the past as to challenge the claim of terminable annuities to be properly provided for, though many a Chancellor of the Exchequer has gone back so far on the past as to encroach on the sum available for an ordinary sinking fund. This is a case of all others in which experience is our best guide. Experience shows that terminable annuities are duly provided for where ordinary sinking funds would not be duly provided for.

Probably the Government are quite right in conceding to the criticisms of some of their opponents that the indefinite rolling-up of each terminable annuity with that which is to succeed it should be limited in point of time. The demand for terminable annuities is not always as active as it might be, and it is quite possible that by the machinery which Mr. Childers has devised, if it were continued too long, there might be more terminable annuities created than the public would absorb. The concession made on this head by Mr. Childers that some fixed date is to be fixed beyond which the rolling-up process is not to be pushed without further legislation, is no doubt a wise concession, and of course if it be found that the fear of creating too large an amount of terminable annuities is not justified, it will be easy to renew the rolling-up process when the date fixed has nearly arrived. But on the substance of the Bill the Government obtained an easy victory over their opponents, many of whom must have voted against the second reading for no better reason than to encourage the Opposition in habits of antagonism. So far as we see, these are not habits in which any Opposition of our day is at all likely to be deficient.

THE REPORT OF THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS COMMISSION.

WHATEVER may be the legislative fruits of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission, it has at least produced a mass of lucidly arranged information of the highest value to the historical student, and which ought to make the reconstruction of our Ecclesiastical judicature tolerably easy to the Legislature. This much is evident from even a cursory examination of the Report just issued by the Commissioners, of which we proceed to give the salient features, reserving for further consideration, if necessary, any points which may seem to require fuller elucidation.

The recommendations of the Commission are preceded by a learned and interesting historical summary, in which is traced the development of the ecclesiastical judicature in England from the earliest to the present time, and which also contains a useful bird's-eye view of the ecclesiastical judicature of the rest of Christendom. After this comprehensive survey, the Commissioners proceed to make their recommendations, which are arranged under three heads. The first head embraces the procedure in cases of misconduct and neglect of duty on the part of Clerks in Holy Orders. There is here little ground for controversy or difference of opinion; so we may pass on to the next head, which deals with cases of heresy and ritual. As the law now stands, the Bishop has an absolute veto on the prosecution of a suit. It is in his discretion to allow the suit to go on or to stop it on the threshold, subject only to the condition of recording his reasons. If he allows the suit to go on, the matter passes at once out of his hands, and he is thenceforth powerless to stop proceedings, whatever mischief may arise from the litigation. This has been proved conspicuously in the cases of Mr. Green and Mr. Mackonochie. The Bishop of Manchester could not have prevented Mr. Green's imprisonment, nor have released him from prison, however anxious he may have been to do so; nor could the Bishop of London have prevented any of the lamentable consequences which have ensued from his initial mistake in allowing the Church Association to set the law in motion. On the other hand, the Public Worship Regulation Act seems, on one point, to be more favourable than the Church Discipline Act to the defendant. Under the Church Discipline Act there is no limit to the qualification of the prosecutors. Anybody may prosecute. Under the Public Worship Regulation Act the prosecutors must be three aggrieved parishioners, resident for one year in the parish. But, in practice, this limitation has been found to be of no use whatever. Whenever the Church Association failed to find the requisite number of qualified prosecutors, they made no scruple to import them from outside for the legal period. In a notorious case one of those importations was a released felon. The futility of this supposed safeguard against mere vexatious and malicious prosecutions has induced the Commission to revert to the old plan, which leaves the right to prosecute perfectly open and unrestricted. This would throw the responsibility for the prosecution entirely on the Bishop. We are sorry to observe that one or two of the Commissioners dissent from this part of the Report. “The Archbishop of York, in signing the Report, is compelled to record his dissent from it in two important particulars.” His Grace, in the first place, objects to trust the Bishops with absolute discretionary power in stopping a prosecution ab initio. “Except with his [the Bishop's] permission, the Courts will be closed entirely to a layman, and no layman will have the right of appeal from this absolute decision, however great the wrong which he may conceive himself to have sustained.” Why does the Archbishop specify the “layman” in particular? He is in no worse plight than the clergyman. Both are placed on precisely the same footing by the recommendations of the Report in regard to the rights of prosecutors. His Grace's ad invidiam appeal on behalf of the layman seems to us a little out of place, for our experience is that the layman is generally very well able to take care of himself; and the Archbishop's concern for the rights of the layman stands in harsh contrast with his next objection. “Great evils,” he says truly, “have resulted from litigation in the past.” How does he propose to lessen the evils? By placing the Clergy completely at the mercy of the Bishop? He thinks that the Bishop's discretion is to be absolutely distrusted where a layman is concerned, but to be absolutely trusted where a clergyman is concerned. “To prevent the evils” of litigation “for the future, something should be done to afford a means of direction and arbitration, without resort to the Courts.” Therefore, “Let the Bishop have the power to make an order in all matters affecting the conduct of public worship, which shall be binding until reversed by the Court of Appeal.” It is a simple fact that if the Bishops had possessed this power during the last fifty years, all the improvements in public worship which have taken place in the interval would have been prevented. The Bishops opposed them all. The Archbishop of York would, in fact, give the Bishops absolute power precisely where experience shows that it would have been mischievous, and would deprive them of it where experience proves that the possession of such power is most beneficial. The Bishop's veto saved the Church the scandal and injury of the prosecution of such men as Mr. Carter, of Clewer. Does the Archbishop of York know of a single instance where the exercise of the Bishop's veto has done harm? The thing to aim at chiefly—at least, by those who wish to avoid Disestablishment—is to discourage as much as possible prosecutions for heresy and ritual offences. The Archbishop of York's two proposals would stimulate them.

Under their second group of recommendations the Commissioners deal with the Diocesan and Provincial Courts, which were practically destroyed by the Public Worship Regulation Act. The Commissioners propose to restore them to their original vitality. They recommend that the Diocesan Court shall consist of the Bishop, with whom shall sit a legal and a theological Assessor. The legal assessor will be naturally the Chancellor of the Diocese, or some other person learned in the law, at the discretion of the Bishop. The Theological Assessor is to be chosen pro hac vice by the Bishop, with the advice of the Dean and Chapter. An appeal, of course, will lie from the Diocesan to the Provincial Court; and here the Commissioners make some important recommendations. The appeal is to go to the Archbishop in person, and it will rest with him either to let the Official Principal hear it, or reserve it for his own adjudication, assisted by the Official Principal as assessor. In the latter case, the Archbishop will be empowered to appoint any number of theological assessors, not exceeding five, to sit with the Court. And these assessors must be either a Bishop within the Province, or a Professor, past or present, of one of the English Universities. From the Provincial Court an appeal will lie to the Crown, which is to exercise its prerogative through an entirely new Court, namely, "a permanent body of lay Judges, learned in the law." The number summoned for each case shall not be less than five, and they are to be "summoned by the Lord Chancellor in rotation." The words which we have printed in italics are important. They preclude the suspicion of packing, which has been occasionally raised, by the mode of selecting the members of the present Final Court of Appeal. The proposed new Court is to be empowered in doctrinal cases, after the manner of the House of Lords in legal cases, to consult experts, namely, the Archbishop or Bishops, of the Province, or of both Provinces. But this consultation is to be obligatory only on the demand of one or more members of the Court. The Court shall not be bound to give its reasons for its decisions; but if it does state its reasons, each judge shall deliver his own judgment separately. One important recommendation is that the bare words of the decree are alone to be legally binding. The reasonings on which the decree is based are to be open to controversy and reconsideration. The effect of this is that the new Court is not to be bound in any future case by any of the past decisions of the Judicial Committee. The Report is explicit on this point. "Considering," it says, "how widely different a matter the legal interpretation of documents must often be from the definition of doctrine, we hold it to be essential that only the actual decree, as dealing with the particular case, should be of binding authority, in the judgments hitherto or hereafter to be delivered, and that the reasoning in support of those judgments and the obiter dicta should always be allowed to be reconsidered and disputed."

The third group of recommendations deals with the constitution, procedure, and powers of the Provincial Courts. The effect is to repeal the Public Worship Regulation Act, and restore the old Courts to their pristine vigour. The Dean of the Arches is to be elected, and is required to qualify, in the ancient way; and all spiritual sentences are to be pronounced by the Bishop in person in the Diocesan Court, and by the Archbishop in the Provincial Court. The two Primate are also to be empowered, if they think fit, to appoint the same person as Official Principal for both Provinces. And whenever the Final Court of Appeal varies the sentence of the Court below, it must remit the cause to that Court for execution of the judgment.

We have now enumerated the principal recommendations of the Royal Commissioners. They are not likely to give complete satisfaction to any party, and this may be one of their chief merits in the eyes of statesmen, as indicating the possibility of an equitable compromise. The Commissioners, however, lay stress on the fact that their recommendations must be regarded "as a whole," especially with regard to the constitution of the Final Court of Appeal. They reconcile themselves to the entirely secular character of that Court, on the sole condition of the acceptance of their recommendations on other points. They plainly warn us that their recommendations as to the Final Court must be considered as cancelled by any important infringement of the rest of their scheme. This must be remembered when we consider the reservations of a few of the Commissioners. We have already commented on the reservations of the Archbishop of York, and shall only say here that they touch the essence of the scheme. That observation does not apply to the reservation of Mr. Freeman, in favour of not restricting the Final Court to laymen "of a single profession." There is much to be said in favour of having persons learned in history or archæology on the Court. Nor do we see why the recommendation of Lord Devon, the Bishop of Oxford, and Dean Lake should not be adopted, namely, that the Final Court should be obliged in any case of doctrine to consult the Bishops. Practically, it would probably make very little difference, since the Court would not be bound in any case to follow the advice given it. It would, however, be a satisfaction to the feelings of a large number of Churchmen, not confined to one party. If the reference to the Bishops is to be optional, there will be room for suspicion of partiality; and this is, above all things, to be avoided. We must also express our dissent from the recommendation which requires the Judges of the new Court to make a declaration of membership of the Church of England. The declaration is quite futile, and mischievous in addition. It would deprive the Court of the incalculable benefit of having such a man as the late Sir G. Jessel shedding the light of his luminous intellect and severe impartiality on its deliberations. Since the Court is to be purely secular, let there be no attempt at impressing a fictitious character of orthodoxy upon it.

We cannot dismiss the subject without calling special attention to an important fact which the Report, by chance or by design, has emphasised. "It has been held," it says, "by the present Dean of the Arches that on a living becoming void, the inhibition comes to an end." Lord Penzance laid this down very distinctly in the case of Mr. Green. He released Mr. Green from prison on the ground that the voidance of his living had exhausted his inhibition, and consequently his punishment. The deprivation of Mr. Mackonochie seems to be in the very teeth of this ruling, for Mr. Mackonochie's living had been voided long before Lord Penzance proceeded to pronounce sentence of deprivation upon him. It is probable that on this ground alone—and there appear to be other grounds—Lord Penzance's sentence would be reversed on appeal. It is, indeed, extraordinary that he should have gone out of his way to pronounce such a sentence,—he, a member of a Royal Commission which has pronounced sentence of death on his ambiguous Court, as well as on the Judicial Committee in its character of a Final Court of Appeal in Ecclesiastical Causes. One inevitable result of the recommendations of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission must be the suspension of all ecclesiastical suits during the interregnum between the moribund Courts and their successors.

LORD WEMYSS ON THE AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.

IT is not an easy matter to compare a man with himself, but, taking him all round, we think Lord Wemyss a more remarkable personage than Lord Elcho. In most cases, translation to the House of Lords makes a man cautious. He is more afraid of committing himself than he was in the House of Commons. But with Lord Wemyss, the change is the other way. He sees an opportunity of committing himself in every debate in which he takes part, and with him, to see and to seize are but two names for one operation. On Tuesday evening, the opportunity took the shape of the second reading of the Agricultural Holdings Bill. There were some things to be said on this occasion which would have come naturally, and even usefully, from Lord Wemyss. In accepting the principle of the Bill, the Conservatives have gone against the whole stream of party tradition, and Lord Wemyss might very fairly have played the part of Abdiel, and shown himself faithful among the faithless. But the dauntless angel had somehow lost his head, and instead of making a straightforward speech against the Bill, and censuring his political friends for concealing a real regard for the farmers' votes under a professed regard for the farmers' interests, Lord Wemyss must needs move an amendment, of which he himself was the sharpest critic. It would not have been of much use to ask the Lords to withhold their sanction from "A Bill which forbids free contract in the future, and breaks it in the past," because the Conservatives have made up their minds that as regards certain classes of tenants' improvements, free contract must be given up. Still, if Lord Wemyss had confined himself to doing this, he would have been within his rights, and even within his duties. Just protests in favour of what the protester holds to be a momentous and practical truth are, at all events, respectable. But is it quite respectable to ask the Lords to give an implied promise which he who makes the request believes to be beyond their power to perform? Now, this is what Lord Wemyss, by his own admission, did on Tuesday. If the Lords had adopted his amendment, they would have pledged themselves to "promote a well-considered measure for the advancement of agriculture, and the improvement, so far as possible, by legislation, of the relations of landlord and tenant." Lord Wemyss thinks the Agricultural Holdings Bill an ill-considered measure, and one that will make the relations between landlord and tenant worse, instead of better. Consequently, he was quite justified in calling upon the Lords to reject it. But why did he call upon them to reject it, in favour of another measure which should do wisely and justly what the Agricultural Holdings Bill does unwisely and unjustly? Or, having committed himself to this extent, why did he not leave the Lords to suppose that he really meant what he asked them to say? No man is bound to call a part of his own amendment "padding." In this case, it was a very true and a very candid description, but things which are true in themselves and candid in him who says them, may be highly indecorous,—and indecorum is what we lay to Lord Wemyss's charge on this occasion. The House of Lords should not be moved to promise to do, "if possible," what he who suggests that the pledge should be given, believes all the time to be impossible. If Lord Wemyss is of opinion that legislation can do absolutely nothing to improve the relations of landlord and tenant, he ought to have said so frankly; or, if this be beyond his ability, he should at least have remained silent. A man who dangles before the mind of the tenant the notion of a well-considered measure for the improvement of these relations, and then airily remarks that when he said "as far as possible," he meant that it was not possible, has plainly not been at the trouble of weighing his words. Lord Wemyss may plead that they are not worth weighing, and intrinsically we quite admit that they are not. But in the mouth of a legislator, they become weighty. It is not for cyphers to forget the importance that belongs to position.

One credit, however, Lord Wemyss may claim. He told a story which, if it were true, would be interesting, and he extracted from the Duke of Richmond an admission which is almost as remarkable as the story it purported to contradict. Lord Wemyss has been told, it seems, that when Lord Beaconsfield was informed that the Richmond Commission was going to report in favour of protecting tenants against arbitrary increase of rent, he exclaimed, "By God! if they have done that, the Government can carry any Land Bill they choose." The story is not, in itself, improbable. But the Duke of Richmond knows nothing of it. He is under the consoling impression that Lord Beaconsfield had seen the Report of the Commission before anyone else, and had pronounced it very good. "What was done was this. The Report, as had been done in the case of the previous one relating to Ireland, was laid before Lord Beaconsfield, and was published with his sanction and approval." This is a striking testimony to the influence which Lord Beaconsfield maintained over those who had been his colleagues after his and their retirement from office. It is not customary, we imagine, for the Chairman of a Royal Commission to lay the Report before the Leader of Opposition, before it is presented to Parliament; nor is it ordinarily a part of a leader of Opposition's functions to give or withhold from such reports his "sanction and approval." But the Duke of Richmond is evidently more anxious to clear himself from the suspicion of having in any capacity gone counter to Lord Beaconsfield's wishes, than to prove that, as Chairman of a neutral Commission, he retained the impartiality which is naturally looked for in such an office. "Don't suppose," he says, "that the report was mine. The first draft, it is true, did come from my hands, but I incurred no responsibility by preparing it. I submitted it to Lord Beaconsfield before publication, in order that the responsibility of publishing it might fall upon his shoulders, rather than mine. If he had disapproved of its contents, I should have taken care that they did not go out to the world as mine." Clearly, Lord Beaconsfield was better served out of office than some statesmen are when in office.

Lord Salisbury's opposition to the Bill was of a more politic kind than Lord Wemyss's. It did not lead him to vote against the second reading; it only armed him with predictions of the mischief the Bill might do to the tenant. There is one of these which deserves, we think, the consideration of the Government. As the Bill originally stood, holdings of less than two acres were excluded from its operation. In Committee this limitation was struck out, and it now applies to any holding, however small, which is held by a yearly tenant. Lord Salisbury argues that when a landlord finds that he cannot let half an acre of land to a labourer without incurring the possibility of litigation when the tenancy comes to an end, he will prefer to let the ground to a larger tenant, from whom he will, at all events, be able to recover costs, in the event of the claim for improvements being rejected. Is it good policy to give small holders a kind of protection which may have the effect of doing away with small holdings?

MR. COURTNEY ON CROWN LANDS.

IT is strange how hard some crotchets die! It might have been thought that the signal overthrow of the official view with respect to Crown Lands in the cases of the Thames Embankment, Epping Forest, and the New Forest, would have settled the principle upon which such lands, when available for purposes of recreation, should be managed. But the traditions of a Department are a very powerful influence. They have a way of ignoring defeat. They impress themselves upon each successive Minister as the accepted doctrine upon which the work of administration is carried on, and it requires more than ordinary vigour of mind or keenness of sympathy with the outside view to resist their power. Few clearer proofs of this could be afforded than the spectacle of such a Liberal as Mr. Courtney—who has, however, since his accession to office, betrayed more of the dangerous bias of officialism than any other man of equal ability in the Government—speaking in the House of Commons, on the motion of Mr. Bryce in reference to Esher Common. He spoke as the mere mouth-piece of the pet theory of the Office of Woods and Forests. We all know what that theory is. The Crown Lands, it is said, are the property of the Sovereign, and have merely been confided temporarily to the custody of the nation. The Heir Apparent is entitled in reversion, and may, for aught that is known, resume possession on the demise of the Crown. It is, therefore, the duty of the Government to act as a Trustee, making what income it fairly can out of the property for the benefit of the present tenant, the nation, and neglecting no means of increasing the capital for the benefit of the next Sovereign. It follows from this doctrine that the Crown Lands must be administered strictly with a view to money value. Any retention in an unproductive state of land which might produce an annual return of a few pounds, or might be converted into cash, is an act of weak and culpable generosity, and should be reprobated as a breach of trust, no matter how valuable a common or forest may be as an open space. That is a sentimental value, which cannot be assessed, or, to put the case in the way preferred by Mr. Courtney, it is a value which only a small section of the nation, and not the nation at large, enjoys. The administrators of Crown Property must turn a deaf ear to the siren whisperings of those who point to the charms of wild scenery, the ruin which will be worked upon a neighbourhood by the destruction of its open space, or the injury to a deserving class from the abolition of its rights. Their duty is to make money,—and that duty must be sternly performed.

Such were the theories upon which the building on the reclaimed land of the Thames Embankment, the sale of the Crown's rights in Epping Forest, and the destruction of the unique beauty of the New Forest were justified. In each case, Parliament distinctly declined to accept the official doctrine. It would not be threatened or cajoled into the absurdity of managing the national property in a way the nation did not wish. The common-sense of the House of Commons revolted against the consequences of the high doctrinaire views presented to it. The cobwebs of a Royal reversion and the supposed necessity of consulting the interests of some national entity differing from the nation as represented by the House of Commons, were brushed aside. It is, of course, perfectly well known that there is not the least chance of any future Sovereign taking the Crown Lands into his own management, while it is clear that the income which is dedicated to Royal uses, in lieu of the rents and profits of such lands, can at any time be increased so far as is just and reasonable, whether those rents increase or not. As for the nation, its mouth-piece is the House of Commons, and not the Office of Woods and Forests. If it prefers to throw away a few pounds for the sake of keeping a national park, it is its own affair. No one has a right to interfere, however shockingly bad such taste may be. The Embankment Garden was therefore made, the Crown's rights in Epping Forest were asserted, though somewhat tardily and feebly, with a view to prevent inclosure, and the destruction of the New Forest was arrested. These events, however, are evidently looked upon as abnormal in official quarters. The nation, it is evidently thought, may have recovered in 1883 from the delirium which possessed it for some years, and may again recognise its true interests. Such projects as the sale of the Southport Foreshore and the Crown Manor of Esher are therefore entertained, and the usual surprise is expressed when complaint is made. It is, however, a serious fact that these proposals find uncompromising supporters in members of the present Government, and public attention cannot be too strongly drawn to their real nature.

The sale of the Southport foreshore has already been the subject of comment in the columns of the Spectator. Southport is a flourishing Lancashire watering-place, and the control of the foreshore in front of it is vital to the interests of the town. An adverse possessor might cut off communication with the sea. The Duchy are believed to be the owners of the foreshore, but a hostile claim is made on behalf of the owners of a neighbouring manor. The Corporation of Southport made overtures for the purchase; a price was fixed; but the negotiations were suspended, owing to requirements on the part of the Duchy as to the mode in which the purchase should be carried out, with which the Corporation thought they had no power to comply. Little more than a year afterwards the Corporation were startled to hear that the Crown had sold all its rights to its opponents, the Lords of the Manor. The price, it should be added, which the Corporation were to pay was £9,500, that obtained from the Lords of the Manor £15,000. Thus for £5,500 the Duchy authorities agreed to place it in the power of private persons to ruin a large watering-place, or to levy black-mail upon its inhabitants at will.

This, it must be confessed, is the worst case which has recently happened. But there are others of a similar character. Esher and Ockshott Commons form a delightful stretch of open land, lying at the back of Claremont Palace. They are well covered with fir, birch, and wild undergrowth. They are within a drive of London, and on the great holidays are visited by picnic and cricketing parties, while at other times they give the means of a secluded ramble to any one who likes to take the train to Surbiton or Esher. They are likely to become places of considerable resort in the course of a few years, since the line sanctioned two years ago from Surbiton to Guildford, by way of Cobham, touches their skirts. They form part of a Crown Manor, and were until lately in the custody of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods and Forests. They have now been sold to Sir Henry Ponsonby, who, it is understood, acts as trustee for the Queen, in her Majesty's private capacity. The Commons are thus transferred from the care of the nation to private ownership. No doubt, so long as they belong to her Majesty they are safe. But they may now be sold again without even the public knowledge. They are withdrawn from the view of the House of Commons, and may be dealt with as other private manors are. Probably there are common rights which, if asserted, may prevent enclosure. But those who have used these rights to the best effect also know best how expensive and cumbrous is the remedy. It is monstrous that the national guardians of such open lands should voluntarily surrender the power which they possess to protect them, and leave them to the hazardous operation of common rights in the hands of private people, whose pecuniary interest it may be to connive at enclosure. This, however, is the course Mr. Courtney has recently defended, on the ground that only the people immediately around the Commons were benefited by their being maintained as open spaces, while the nation at large has the advantage of the paltry price obtained for them. A statement more directly at variance with facts could hardly be invented. The nation at large is benefited by anything which makes life in London or any other great town more healthy and enjoyable. The Metropolis needs every acre of open land in its neighbourhood for the purpose of securing a due supply of fresh air, for, as building extends, the Commons alone remain unoccupied. But, further, these Commons are frequented, as every common near London is frequented, more or less. It is only a question of degree, and, as London extends and new railways are made, the use of every common steadily increases. It would be a poor look-out for the Metropolis, if only well-worn open spaces, like Clapham or Wimbledon, were to be left for it, and every chance of a really rural walk over wild land were cut off. It would have been unfortunate that Mr. Bryce should have initiated the discussion of the subject by a motion to reduce the salary of a Commissioner of Woods, if there had been any other way of bringing the discussion on. But that was practically the only way open to him. Still, it was impossible, of course, that such a motion should succeed. The Commissioners are merely the servants of the Treasury, and it would be the height of injustice to punish them personally. What is wanted is a Resolution of the House that no such sales as that at Southport and Esher should in future be made without the sanction of the House, but that motion could not have been made on the only occasion open to Mr. Bryce. It is probable, nevertheless, that such a resolution would receive general support, and, as there is no knowing what danger may arise while views such as those of Mr. Courtney are entertained at the Treasury, it is a pity that even at this advanced period of the Session some Member cannot be found to take the necessary action.

There is yet another case in which the Office of Woods has this Session attempted, through Mr. Courtney, to push its theories to a disastrous conclusion. By certain clauses in the Crown Lands Bill, it was proposed to extinguish, by way of compulsory purchase, the rights enjoyed by many commoners in the New Forest to take wood to burn on the hearths of their ancient dwelling-houses. These clauses have, at the last moment, in the face of the uncompromising opposition of those who know the Forest best, been withdrawn. The rights in question are strictly limited in character, they can be satisfied, if the Crown authorities choose, without any injury to the wild woods or ornamental trees of the Forest, and they are of the greatest value to that class of small freeholders and tenants who maintain themselves in independence upon their little holdings, and absolutely relieve the district from pauperism. It is satisfactory to learn that the Government will not endeavour to give effect to so mischievous a proposal by the exercise of that power which it undoubtedly possesses in the concluding days of the Session. It is to be hoped that no further attempt will be made to disturb the settlement which was brought about in 1877 with regard to this great national park.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR NEGLIGENCE.

IN the growing complexity of modern society, doctrines of law which were of comparatively small importance, and were, perhaps, laid down to meet circumstances of extreme simplicity, become of far-reaching application, and involve the most important consequences. No doctrine of law of late times has, perhaps, attracted more attention and been more copiously discussed than the law of Negligence. As the growth of towns and increased means of communication have brought us nearer to each other, so the occasions on which the negligence of one will hurt another, either in his property or person, have been multiplied. It is the law of negligence, or, to speak more accurately, the law of liability for negligence, which must determine whether, in any given case of damage, there is any liability thrown on any one to make it good, so far as he can. In the case of liability for damage arising out of contract, the law of negligence was pretty well thrashed out by the Romans, and has been tolerably well settled for a long time amongst ourselves upon the lines which they laid down. The degree of care which must be exercised to escape liability for negligence is in such cases determined by the nature and terms of the contract, and the law has probably little room left for surprise. But as regards the law of negligence which arises not out of any special agreement, express or implied, between the parties, but simply out of the more or less chance relations of two persons to one another growing from casual circumstances, one of the latest judgments of the Court of Appeal in the sittings just ended may fairly be called a surprise. It took the form, at least in the case of the President of the Court (the Master of the Rolls), of nothing less than the statement of a new proposition of law, a new generalisation, or "law" in the scientific sense, which aimed at covering all the possible cases which could arise of liability for negligence in the absence of contract. The sum involved in the case was, as so often happens, as small as the principle involved was great. The claim was one for personal injuries, in which damages were placed at £20. The facts were tolerably simple. A workman in the employ of a ship-painter was painting the outside of a ship in the West India Graving Dock. The ropes which supported the stage on which he was standing to do the work gave way, the platform fell, and he fell with it, and was injured. Thereupon he sued the owner of the Dock for damages in the County Court. He had no contract with the owners. His contract was with his master, who contracted with the shipowner; but the dock-owners supplied the stage with which the work was to be done, in the ordinary course of their business. It appeared that the cause of the break-down was that the ropes had been scorched, and were consequently unfit to bear the strain of stage and man. The County-Court Judge thought the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages, but the Divisional Court, for whom the point was reserved, held the contrary, but were, in their turn, overruled by the Court of Appeal, Sir Balil Brett presiding. The question turned on the point, did the dock-owner owe any duty to the painter? The other members of the Court preferred to rest their finding that he did owe such a duty on the theory that the painter had been incited by the dock-owner to use the stage, and, therefore, the dock-owner ought not to have laid a trap for him, by giving him a stage which would let him down and damage him. But it is clear that this is a very artificial and a very unsatisfactory theory. In the first place, it involves using the word "invitation" in an unnatural sense; and, in the second, there was no incitation at all. This theory is derived from the class of cases in which a person has gone on business to a shop or warehouse, and has actually tumbled down an unfenced trap-door, or stumbled against a piece of dangerous machinery. It has then been said that the shop-keeper, by keeping a shop, invited the people to enter it, and was responsible for setting a trap for them, if they did come in. But a shopkeeper does not invite people to enter. Indeed, a real invitation to enter a place does not impose any liability on the inviter. If you ask a friend to your house to sleep and put him in damp sheets and "give him his death of cold," he cannot sue you for damages. It is, too, misleading to talk of setting a trap for a person, because that implies intention; and a deliberate intention to injure another of course raises a liability; but it is a liability arising not out of negligence, but out of crime. The act is a fault of commission, not of omission. Anyhow, it is a straining of language and of fact to say that the dock-owner in this case invited the painter to use the stage. If he invited any one, it was the shipowner who paid for the use of the dock and its appurtenances, including the painting-stage. Therefore, though the case might, looking at the length to which previous cases had gone, have fairly been rested on the invitation-and-trap theory, the Master of the Rolls preferred to place it on something more substantial.

It might have been put by a little straining into the class of cases of which the keeper of a dangerous animal, or the owner of property which may become dangerous, are examples. Thus, to put an example which has an unpleasant appropriateness in these days of cholera, you must not let your sewage run into another man's well, or, as it was phrased some two centuries ago, "If dirt is created on any man's land, then he whose dirt it is must keep it, that it do not trespass." So if a man builds his houses in such a way that they tumble into the street on the passer-by, he is liable for the damage, because it was his duty to build in such a way that his houses did not fall on other people. In the same way, if you, in the course of your business, stand upon a stage which some one else has hung up where people are likely to stand on it, it might be said that he was bound to see that his property was fit to be stood upon. Such cases would go upon the general principle, "Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non laedas," or, "A man may do what he likes with his own, so long as he does not injure his neighbour." But here, again, language and facts would have to be to a certain extent strained, to square with the conclusion sought to be reached.

The Master of the Rolls preferred to find a "more remote and larger premiss," which would embrace both of those "major premisses" which lead to the same "minor premiss" of the creation of a duty. "The proposition which these recognised cases suggest, and which is, therefore, to be deduced from them, is that 'whenever one person is by circumstances placed in such a position with regard to another that if he did not use ordinary care and skill in his own conduct with regard to those circumstances, he would cause danger of injury to the person or property of the other, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill to avoid such danger.' This is the only proposition which covers all the cases." Applying it "to the case of one person supplying goods, or machinery, or instruments, or utensils, or the like, for the purpose of being used by another person with whom there is no contract as to the supply," he lays it down, "Whenever one person supplies goods, or machinery, or the like, for the purpose of their being used by another person under such circumstances that every one of ordinary sense would, if he thought, recognise at once that unless he used ordinary care and skill with regard to the condition of the thing supplied, or the mode of supplying it, there will be danger of injury to the person or property of him for whose use the thing is supplied, and who is to use it, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill as to the condition or manner of supplying such thing. And for a neglect of such ordinary care or skill whereby injury happens, a legal liability arises, to be enforced by an action for negligence." The consequences of this doctrine would, of course, extend alike to all manufacturers and contractors. The maker of German sausages out of diseased meat would not only be liable to prosecution for keeping such articles for sale, but, what would be more prohibitive, would be liable to damages for illness caused by them. The maker of a bad gun would be liable for the consequences of an explosion. The builder of a defective carriage would be responsible for the consequences of its break-down. But this would only be where the German sausages, the gun, or the carriage was supplied to the immediate user of them. If they were sold by a wholesale to a retail dealer, who is supposed to have sufficient skill and knowledge to test the article sold, the retail, and not the wholesale, dealer would be responsible for the consequences of any evil resulting in the hands of the purchaser.

The new proposition does not directly impose any new liability. It only sets existing liabilities in a clearer light. But, as by clearing up the law it makes the liability easier to prove, it does, to some extent, indirectly extend responsibility for negligence. It is quite right that it should be so. There should be no doubt who is the proper person to be sued, and whether any one can be sued. Whenever a person is injured without fault of his own, it is eminently desirable that his wrong should not go without remedy. In a case like this of the painter, he has at present to study with great care the decided cases, to find out whether he could be said to have used the stage at the invitation of the person to whom it belonged to, or whether he was a mere licensee. Under the rule now laid down, he would merely have to consider to whom the stage belonged, and whether there had been any carelessness shown in letting it be used. Considering the extent to which the workmen or employes of one person have to visit the works or use the implements and materials belonging to or supplied by others, it is eminently desirable that the question of responsibility for injury should not be confused by any technical way of looking at it. The rule laid down by the Master of the Rolls avoids the difficulties arising from the history of the growth of the law of Negligence, and places it on the surer ground of logical and philosophical analysis.

NINETEENTH-CENTURY ROSE-WATER.

MR. NORMAN PEARSON'S article on "After Death," in the August number of the Nineteenth Century, will remind all those who know Cardinal Newman's "Callista" as it deserves to be known, of the striking picture in that powerful story of Polemo of Rhodes, who is called-in in the crisis of the martyrdom to persuade Callista of the folly of her Christian leanings. We need not say that we know nothing of Mr. Norman Pearson himself, and that when we extract the following description of Polemo of Rhodes, as one which his article suggested to our minds, we only mean to say that it was his condescending disgust for Christianity,—of which Mr. Norman Pearson seems to us to know not much more than Polemo of Rhodes himself,—his Olympian fridity of style, his air of touching thoughts in that superfine manner in which delicately-gloved men handle coarse implements which they are compelled reluctantly to touch,—that brought to the memory of the present writer the figure of Polemo of Rhodes. Here is his first introduction in "Callista":—"He comes to the schools in a litter of cedar, ornamented with silver and covered with a lion's skin, slaves carrying him and a crowd of friends attending, with the state of a proconsul. He is dressed in the most exact style; his pallium is of the finest wool, white picked out with purple; his tresses flow with unguents, his fingers glisten with rings, and he smells like Idaliun. As soon as he puts foot on earth, a great hubbub of congratulation and homage breaks forth. He takes no notice; his favourite pupils form a circle round him, and conduct him into one of the exedrae till the dial shows the time of lecture. Here he sits in silence, looking at nothing or at the wall opposite him, talking to himself, a hum of admiration filling the room. Presently, one of his pupils, as if he were praeco to the duumvir, cries out, 'Hush, gentlemen, hush, the godlike,—no, it is not that,—I've not got it, what is his title?' 'The Bottomless,—that's it,—the Bottomless speaks.' A dead silence ensues; a clear voice and a measured elocution are the sure token that it is the outpouring of the oracle. 'Pray,' says the little man, 'pray which existed first, the egg or the chick? Did the chick lay the egg, or the egg hatch the chick?' Then there ensues a whispering, a disputing, and after that a dead silence. At the end of a quarter of an hour or so, our praeco speaks again, and this time to the oracle. 'Bottomless man,' he says, 'I have to represent to you that no one of the present company finds himself equal to answer the question which your condescension has proposed to our consideration.' On this there is a fresh silence, and at length a fresh effatum from the hierophant. 'Which comes first, the egg or the chick? The egg comes first in relation to the causativity of the chick, and the chick comes first in relation to the causativity of the egg,' on which there is a burst of applause. The ring of adorers is broken through, and the shrinking professor is carried in the arms or on the shoulders of the literary crowd to his chair in the lecture-room."

Would there not be the same chorus of applause from our philosophical young exquisites for such a passage as this from Mr. Norman Pearson's prelection in the Nineteenth Century? "Insisting emphatically, as I do, on the strict relativity of our knowledge, it appears to me utterly and hopelessly futile to predicate anything about the Absolute. My belief in a Deity is of a practically negative character, and such a belief, I maintain, is the only one possible. Personally, I am firmly convinced of the existence of a Deity (though I see nothing in the least immoral in an opposite belief), but I am equally convinced of my inability to form any coherent conception of such a Deity's nature or attributes. The universe, as I perceive it, I regard as phenomenal, and its component phenomena must needs have a correlative noumenal cause. This cause I believe to be God; but such a God I cannot by any effort conceive positively, I can merely postulate negatively as something non-phenomenal. This, I trust, may suffice to explain why I am inevitably silent on a point which figures so largely in the ordinary anticipations of the life to come." Polemo himself could not have contrived to say, in phrases more smooth and glib, that, in consequence of "the relativity of our knowledge," God neither means, nor can mean, anything but a blank somewhat, with relation to which, because it is a blank to him, the believer in the blank is "inevitably silent." The clearness of this statement is, however, a little obscured by Mr. Norman Pearson's subsequent remark,—"I am greatly inclined to Professor Fiske's view, that a truer and purer religion will ultimately find ample scope in the profounder recognition which we shall then [i.e., in the future life] enjoy of the relations between ourselves and the Absolute God. This, I suppose, so far as it is possible to analyse prospectively such a mental state, will result in a combination of such feelings as gratitude, admiration, and the gladness of a subdued ecstasy." How, if God is nothing but "non-phenomenal," we are to attribute, even in the next life, anything of specific quality to him, since specific quality must first put in an appearance—i.e., become phenomenal; and why, if God is to become phenomenal to us in some future state, it is simply impossible for Mr. Norman Pearson so to conceive him now, he does not condescend to explain to us. We are only made to feel that there is something philosophic in calmly maintaining a "practically negative" belief in a God, and in being "inevitably silent" on the very centre and heart of all true religion. It can hardly be that in mere deference to Professor

Fiske, Mr. Norman Pearson would admit that in some future state he may cease to be "inevitably silent" about that "non-phenomenal something" which he terms God, and may permit himself to indulge "the gladness of a subdued ecstasy"? In encouraging such expectations, is he not even liable to censure for giving his sanction to "that excessive religious enthusiasm" which, as he has told us in another page, "is now known to be due, in a very large number of cases, to mental disease or a morbid physical condition"?

However, Mr. Norman Pearson is careful not to let common-place emotions like "subdued ecstasy" towards the Absolute, occupy too important a part even of the horizon of the future. He concludes his vision of the evolutionary state of man after death,—of man with his rarified body, and his better adaptation to "the environment"—that physical idol of the evolutionist,—in these magnificent words, which even Polemo of Rhodes might have envied him the power to compose:—"Finally, I may ask where is all this to end? When evolution has finished its work, are we to remain in a state of stationary perfection? And will this state of personal ἀταραξία (undisturbedness) in ourselves, coincide with, and correlate to, a state of stable equilibrium between external force and matter? The answer which I hazard is a pure speculation, but I reply that I neither look forward to such a state of things, nor do I think it likely. We are accustomed to over-rate the value of repose, and to regard activity or change as something of an evil, because in our present imperfect adaptation to our environment, the forces with which we come in contact are partly arrayed against us, and any considerable change in this environment usually entails pain, discomfort, or disaster. But we may fairly anticipate that this antagonism will not endure, and its disappearance will probably produce a corresponding modification in our opinions. Now, a perfectly quiescent force is probably a contradiction in terms, and broadly regarded, it seems far more probable that the end of the universe is activity rather than repose. What, then, if Heraclitus was right, but in a deeper and truer sense than he suspected, when he declared that the Absolute was not Being, but Becoming. Under the physical conditions which I have described above, constant Becoming, or change, as we should now call it, would prove no source of inconvenience at all to us, because our organisms would be capable of instantaneous adaptation to its demands. Consequently, an eternity of Becoming, so far from being a series of irksome disturbances, would mean an eternal succession of varying states, whose variance, however, would bring us nothing but new perceptions of knowledge, pleasure, or beauty." How the theatre at Sicca would have resounded in acclamations, if this sublime anticipation of an ideal satisfaction for the Greek craving after "some new thing" had been expounded to them there by Polemo of Rhodes. Proteus, the type of all perfection! the chameleon, the creature in which the perfect state had been most adequately foreshadowed!—or, as Mr. Norman Pearson would put it, in the more scientific language of our own day, "the environment a kaleidoscope of material beauty! the organism an elastic and perfect response to the stimulus of that environment, one which contracts or expands, dives or soars, vibrates or is still, so as to pass through an eternal flux of sensation, perception, reflection, contemplation, and action, and only attain to self-knowledge through the consciousness of incessant difference." No wonder Mr. Norman Pearson can find none but a "practically negative" conception for God, if his ideal life for transfigured man is to be the response to an inexhaustible tide of spiritual, moral, and physical mutability.

After reading this wonderful paper of Mr. Norman Pearson's, we could hardly forbear thinking that we are indeed returning to that early religion of classical Paganism which Mr. Pearson himself describes as "a faint copy of earthly existence." Achilles, as Mr. Pearson reminds us, remarks to Ulysses in the Elysian shades, "I would rather be a slave in the upper air, even to a poor master, than rule over all the dead." Certainly, the present writer would rather be a slave even to one of the poorer religions of the world, than follow Mr. Pearson in his faint rose-water anticipations of an existence which shall eliminate all that is noblest in our present life, till it be engulfed at last in a sort of eddy of perpetual and continuous change. Anything fainter and rose-waterier than Mr. Pearson's equivalent for faith it is impossible to conceive. We are to have all our definite conceptions of virtue and divine approval, of sin and remorse, eliminated in favour of the sublime notion that "Heaven may be regarded as the name for that complete harmony with our environment for which we are not forbidden to hope, and Hell as the name for those discomforts which must inevitably befall an organism surrounded by an environment of higher development than its own." For our belief in God, as we have already said, we are to substitute belief in a "something non-phenomenal," "practically negative," only to be "postulated negatively," and are to content ourselves with this, at least until an evolution completely indefinite and problematic shall enable us in some far-off future to find qualities in that which is pure noumenon, and to indulge "subdued ecstasy" towards the unknowable substance beneath all we see and know. Further, instead of seeking after the divine "constancy" we are to aspire after the opal-tints of infinite and unrestricted change, to crave the destiny of a Protean flexibility, instead of the blessedness of the beatific vision. If this is a good specimen of Nineteenth-century religion, we must say that we prefer the cruellest Calvinism, or even the most fatalistic Mahomedanism, either of which would be a nearer approach to the vision of a divine order. "Unstable as water, it shall not excel," is written on this feeble compromise between Agnostic and Gnostic philosophy. And even though the water to which we must compare this Gnostic Agnosticism be rose-water, and smell pleasantly of fastidious and literary drawing-rooms, it is not a fluid capable of disinfecting even one putrid thought,—it is not serviceable for the destruction of even one morbid germ. Such a philosophy for the élite would be regarded with a smile of pity even by the élite themselves, if they looked in it for anything more than a faint sensation of novelty, and of that surprise which the supercilious treatment of strength by weakness always produces.

EDUCATION AND BRAIN DISEASE.

WE should hope that Mr. Mundella's answer on Monday to the questions as to the effect of our Educational system on the health both of the children and the teachers, will silence for a time the nonsense that has been talked on the subject of education as a cause of insanity. It not only is not a cause of insanity, but it is a decided preventive of insanity, so far as anything can prevent what arises oftener than not from hereditary causes. It has been well known for a long time that by far the largest proportion between insane people and the general population is to be found in the rural counties where there has been least education and least interruption of mental vacancy,—among the agricultural labourers of Dorsetshire, Wiltshire, and so forth,—not, perhaps, wholly on that account, but partly also because in these counties the people have been under-fed, as well as under-educated. The Lancet maintains that under-feeding tells most where there are calls on the brain,—in other words, that brain-work requires more and better food than any other work of equal duration. That must depend mainly on the tension of the brain-work. It seems to us idle to measure brain-work by the hour. An average child, giving at most only half its attention to any one lesson, with its mind constantly wandering, and resting itself with all sorts of diversions from its immediate task, cannot on any reasonable principle be regarded as having its brain hard at work, or indeed under tension at all in any sense in which a real strain is implied, during most of its school hours. We should be disposed to think that the average child, whether in town or country, though always certain to suffer from under-feeding, would not suffer the more but rather the less from under-feeding for such very moderate brain-work as the education of our primary schools imposes on him. Of course, there may be, and very likely are, exceptional cases, where, from either excessive ambition or some other highly exciting motive, the child under education feels the deficiency of inadequate food more seriously than the child who spends its weary days in pretending to frighten away the rooks from the corn. But we do not at all believe that the average child of our primary schools suffers more from under-feeding than the average plough-boy of the generation before education was made compulsory. The variety of interests attending all good school work, the moderate development of the understanding which it causes, the briskness which it lends to play, the interests which it introduces into the home life, all tend, not to the greater exhaustion of the physical constitution, but to the husbanding of the resources of the constitution as a whole. When the Lancet insists on the necessity for a higher and better kind of food for brain-work than is needful for physical labour, it must mean a better food for persons liable to that extreme tension of the brain which really puts the mental powers on their mettle, and demands continuous and close attention of an anxious kind. That is a very different affair indeed; and it is perfectly true that all anxious and strenuous brain-work of high responsibility does require better and more careful feeding than mere bodily labour. But the true question is whether the ordinary primary education, even when it is the best of its kind, does keep the mind of average children at a painful stretch, or does indeed involve half so much drain upon the tissues of the nervous system as dullness or vacancy of mind itself. It must never be forgotten that, as a matter of fact, under-fed agricultural labourers utterly without education have yielded more cases of brain disease than any other class in society; and does not this show beyond all doubt that, even on an inadequate diet, a blank and sluggish brain, not even moderately worked, is more likely to grow diseased than a fairly active brain on the same inadequate diet? Indeed, the a priori presumption is entirely on that side. It is certain that on an inadequate diet, the child who takes no bodily exercise at all is more liable to illness, than the child who takes a moderate portion of exercise. And why should not what applies to the muscles apply also to the brain? Other things being equal, a certain equable exercise of all the functions of the body is much more likely to minimise the bad effects of under-feeding, than the complete inactivity of any particular bodily function. We do not in the least under-rate the mischief of under-feeding for a child's brain. But we do say that, if the under-feeding be inevitable, less mischief will be likely to follow to the brain that is moderately exerted than to the brain that is not exerted at all. We have seen that the effect of absolute blankness of mind has not been to diminish insanity amongst the under-fed, but, on the contrary, to increase the proportion of the insane to the sane population. And now we learn from the Lunacy Commissioners, through Mr. Mundella, that the effect of education has positively been to diminish the absolute number of children admitted to asylums, and this even in a rapidly-increasing population, a result which tells its own tale of the advantage of education even to the brains of under-fed pupils. Let us welcome heartily every suggestion which promises better food to the children of our primary schools, without pauperising their parents. But do not let us admit that, even while the children are under-fed, the sort of education which they get in the primary schools will cause a dangerous strain upon their nervous systems and their brains. On the contrary, we believe that, so long as the sanitary conditions and the ventilation of the schools are properly attended to, this sort of education will positively diminish the tendency to brain disease among children, instead of increasing it.

Another very interesting point is involved in the reply of Mr. Mundella on Monday night. The Commissioners in Lunacy state, "That of the group described as teachers, schoolmasters, schoolmistresses, governesses, professors, and lecturers, out of 127,140 persons classed under this head in 1871, 154 only were committed to asylums in 1881. This is a lower proportion than almost in any other profession. The clergy, the legal and medical professions, the Army and Navy, and engineers, and others, all show a much higher average. Out of 746 teachers applying to the Education Department for pensions since 1875, incapacitated from continuing their profession, 24 only were returned as suffering from brain affections in any form." That is very interesting, but not, we think, at all surprising. The class of teachers, however ill-paid it may be, is not, of course, so ill-paid as to be often positively under-fed, so that here it is not a question of whether the food is adequate to the nourishment of the brain, but whether the demands made on the brain are in excess of any healthy exertion of it. Now, we should quite have expected to find, what we actually find, that in this vocation the demands made on the brain are at once so steady and so reasonable, are so little of a kind to involve overwhelming pressure at one time and insufficient exercise at another, that they would conduce better to health and less to morbid conditions than those of almost any other intellectual profession. Among physicians, lawyers, and engineers, we know that there are seasons of great excitement and competitive strain which drain the powers of the brain and the nervous system to the very utmost, and often demand much more than can be supplied. On the other hand, among the clergy, and in the Army and the Navy, the chief practical danger has probably been the other way, namely, the danger of too much unemployed leisure, during which the full powers of the mind have never been exerted to the utmost at all. We are aware that in speaking thus of the Clergy, we are laying ourselves open to the charge of censoriousness, and we fully admit that there are very many of the clergy amongst whom the fear is not of too much unemployed leisure, but of too much strain on their very highest energies. But then that, again, may and does tell in the same direction. Such strain as that is not a steady and moderate strain, but an excessive and exciting strain, and there the danger is of the other kind. But from whatever source it may arise, undoubtedly the danger to the clergy of either too much moral and intellectual excitement of the brain, or too little, has been considerable for a long time past. And these are just the conditions which do not tend to mental health. In teaching, on the other hand, there is a steady, though limited, demand on the minds of teachers,—who, if they have been well trained, can almost always trust themselves to meet it adequately,—a demand never too long remitted, and yet not often, perhaps, screwed up to any agonising point. It is a demand sufficient to keep the mind, and therefore the functions of the brain, almost always on the alert, and yet not sufficient to oppress with any sense of responsibility and anxiety to which average minds are not equal. There is among teachers none of that responsibility for advising other men in their most critical affairs which so often disturbs and distresses the sensitive physician, or lawyer, or the conscientious clergyman to the point of sleeplessness, and therefore of disease. The teacher, of course, has his unmanageable pupils, who are a grief and trial to him. At the same time, he is sure to have a good many more who do him a fair amount of credit, and in whose well-doing he can more or less forget his failures. His work is judged, and he himself must judge it, by his average success; while in most other intellectual professions, those critical cases which appeal most to the imagination and concentrate our attention upon them, absorb a great deal more than their fair share of anxiety, partly because they contribute a great deal more than their fair share to the question of success or failure. We venture to think that the teacher, though he has, perhaps, more than any other professional man of the wear-and-tear of a tedious and exacting routine, has less than any other professional man of those crises of excitement which exhaust the brain and rack the nerves to the point of mental disease. And this is surely a great set-off against the seemingly weary monotony of teaching the same kind of lessons year after year, to a long succession of similar pupils. Ordinary teaching and ordinary learning seem to be eminently conducive to mental equipoise.

A SUMMER DAY'S JOURNEY.

A FEW days ago, a party of English folks, three of whom were ladies, went (by Visp and St. Nicklaus) from Geneva to Zermatt, with the intention, after making a short sojourn there, of returning by the road they had come. They had no idea of doing anything more adventurous in the way of climbing than going up the Gorner Grat, a feat that men sometimes perform on mule-back, and women in a chaise à porteur. But it is hardly possible to do so much,—to behold, near at hand, the "dark frowning beauties" of the Matterhorn, the glittering peaks of the Dent Blanche, the Cima di Jazi, Castor and Pollux, and the Dufourspitze; the imposing masses of the Monte Rosa, the Breithorn, the Rothhorn, the Weisssthor, and the Matterjoch,—without wanting to go further and see more; and it did not require much solicitation on the part of a guide, who bore the picturesque and peculiarly Swiss name of Aufdenblattern, to persuade the men of the party to attempt the ascent of the Breithorn. Then somebody suggested that we might cross over the Théodule Pass, into the Val Tournanche, and return to Geneva by Aosta and the Great St. Bernard. The guide-books said that the journey presented no serious difficulty, and that it was often undertaken by ladies, who generally rode to the foot of the Great Théodule glacier, whence the walk to the inn at Le Breuil is under five hours. This proposition finding general acceptance, it was resolved accordingly; but Aufdenblattern, being of opinion that the ascent of the Breithorn and the Matterjoch (Théodule) on consecutive days might be too much, we arranged to substitute for the former excursion a visit to the Schwarz-See and the Hörnli. "If we felt equal to it," said the guide, "we could ascend the Breithorn from the Matterjoch, and still reach Le Breuil the same evening." Going down the Riffleberg, we met a German student and an American tourist (whose acquaintance we had made at the Mont Cervin Hôtel), accompanied by a guide, and equipped for an Alpine excursion. They were on their way to the Riffel Hotel, where they were to stay the night, and start the following morning for the Breithorn. They expected to be back at Zermatt the next afternoon.

All this time the weather, if not brilliant, was passable, but Thursday, July 19th, began gloomily, and ended with rain. At the Schwarz-See a few flakes of snow fell; the Matterhorn was barely visible, and the Hörnli so shrouded in mist, that we did not think it worth while to go to the top. In the evening we held a consultation with the guides as to the feasibility of our projected journey. Both thought the morrow would be fine; the barometer, though low, was steady, and it was finally decided that, if it did not rain, we should rise at two, and start at three. Everything was ordered accordingly, and, the skies being propitious, the night-porter roused us a few minutes before two. Half-an-hour later, we were breakfasting by candle-light, and at three sharp all was ready for a start. Our party consisted of three ladies on mules, three men on foot, two guides, and a porter. In ordinary circumstances, one guide would have been enough; but as one or two of the ladies might possibly require help in crossing the glaciers, Aufdenblattern had suggested that it would be well to take a second guide, and the sequel proved the wisdom of the precaution.

We walked fast, occasionally taking a near cut, and always keeping up with the mules. As we went on, the sky, which at two o'clock was clear and lighted up by a brilliant moon, became overcast, the moon disappeared, and the sun remained invisible. Only once was his position marked in the eastern horizon, by a purple haze; then all was gloomy again, dark clouds stretched from peak to peak without a single break, and the Matterhorn, Rothhorn, Breithorn, and Lyskamm were hidden in a sombre haze. Shortly after crossing the brawling Furggenbach, we entered a wild and wind-swept ravine, and from the mist that rolled down its sides there came a few flakes of snow, an ominous bode of which, however, the guides made light; they still thought that the day, if not brilliant, would be sufficiently fine to admit of the Matterjoch being crossed in comfort. After riding and walking some three hours, we reached a point—about thirty minutes from the foot of the great Théodule glacier—where, as the snow lay rather deep in the hollows, it became necessary to dismiss the mules. They had scarcely gone when it began to snow in real earnest, and we found it desirable to take refuge under an overhanging rock, and there discuss what was best to be done,—whether we should advance or retreat. Aufdenblattern thought we had better retreat. If the party were composed exclusively of guides and experienced mountaineers, he said, he would advise going on; seeing, however, that we had ladies with us, the more prudent course was to return to Zermatt. So we left the shelter of the friendly rock and set our faces towards the valley; but we had not gone far when the wind fell somewhat, the snow abated, and the signs became so much more favourable that the two guides, after a long discussion, came to the conclusion that we might safely resume our journey. The Théodule hut was only two-and-a-half hours' distant, it would surely be fine for that time, and once there, we should have food, fire, and shelter. On this we retraced our steps a second time, and were soon climbing a steep snow-slope; and after toiling up a boulder-strewn moraine, we reached the foot of the glacier. Then the weather became bad again, and the further we went the worse it grew. But we were now four hours from Zermatt, only two from the hut, and it was easier to go on than to go back; and we went on,—on through the blinding snow, which the fierce foehn drove right in our faces, down our necks, and up our coat-sleeves. Every hundred yards or so we turned to draw breath and rest a few minutes on our alpenstocks. Six of the party were roped together, one of the guides leading; the other guide brought up the rear with a lady who required all his help. The view before and behind did not extend more than fifty yards; nothing could be seen but snow, and as the mist settled down more and more, the guides seemed to grow uncertain as to their whereabouts. They stopped, looked anxiously round, and tried the echo. It was an anxious moment; for to more than one of the party a few hours' exposure to that biting blast and blinding snow might have been fatal. But a few minutes later an upright stick which served as a guide post was perceived, then the dark rocks of the Little Matterhorn loomed dimly through snow and cloud, and Aufdenblattern cheered us with the hope that in half an hour more we should reach the hut. But the pull up to the hut was the hardest of all. The path was steep, the snow lay in wreaths, at every step we sank up to the knees, the wind felt like a wall, and if the hut had been an hour further off, some of us might never have reached it at all. At the door we met the German student and the American traveller. They had utterly failed in their attempt to ascend the Breithorn, been nearly lost in a snowstorm, and, unable to get down to Zermatt, had passed the night in the hut. They had seen us coming, and were now hurrying away in order to take advantage of the track we had made, before it became obliterated by the snow. The hut, in reality a small auberge, is about sixteen feet by ten; at either end of it there is a small bedroom, each containing three beds; and after thawing our beards, which were frozen solid, and getting something to eat, most of us went to bed, while our clothes were dried.

Until four o'clock in the afternoon the storm continued with undiminished violence, and there seemed every probability of our having to pass the night in the auberge; but at length the snow ceased, the wind went down, the sun came out, and the guides urged us to profit by the lucid interval to get down to Le Breuil. The crossing of the Lower Théodule glacier was not unpleasant, for though the snow lay deep, the descent was easy and the view superb. But we had not left the glacier-foot many minutes when the heavens were again darkened, mists clothed the mountain-tops, and rose up from the ravines, the rain came down in torrents, and we reached the Hôtel du Mont Cervin, at Le Breuil, wet to the skin, yet safe and sound. In the salon of the little inn, we found, sitting before a blazing fire, three Englishmen, who had been beaten in an attempt to reach Zermatt by the Cime Blanche,—and so ended our summer day's journey.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE "ILBERT BILL."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It is with no small surprise that I have read, in the Spectator of August 4th, an introductory paragraph on the so-called Ilbert Bill, which describes that Bill as one "permitting a few Native Judges, who are members of the Covenanted Civil Service—i.e., who have been educated here and gone back to India under the same conditions as our own Indian Civil Servants—to try Europeans accused of crimes." Will you allow me to assure you that the Bill might with equal accuracy be described as one which is to permit Native Judges who are not members of the Covenanted Civil Service, and who have not been educated here, &c.? I trust you will not consider me captious, when I say that it has caused me profound regret to be obliged to believe that you have approved a Bill, and have condemned its opponents, without knowing its contents? If community of error could excuse such a course, you would be free from blame. Your introductory paragraph confirms the impression made upon the Times' reporter by Mr. Bright's speech. Those who have read the Bill are compelled to believe that Mr. Bright has failed in that accuracy which may, I hope without injustice, be called intellectual truthfulness. The Edinburgh Scotsman gives unmistakeable evidence of the same fact. By a singular coincidence, my private experience has been that in the only instances in which I have discussed the Bill with any of its supporters (three thorough-going advocates), I found, at the tail-end of the debate, that not one knew its contents.

Pardon me for telling you that the Bill proposes to confer powers of jurisdiction over Englishmen upon four new classes of Judges, viz.:—(1), Native Covenanted Civilian; (2), Statutory Civilian; (3), Assistant-Commissioners; (4), Cantonment Magistrates. It is the first class which has exclusively attracted the attention of the English supporters of the Bill. It is singular that the second and third, of which nothing is heard in England, should be those which have fixed the attention and opposition of those Anglo-Indians who do not base their objections to the Bill upon race distinctions. No one is disturbed by the fourth class; it is not likely ever to include any but Englishmen.

Will you allow me shortly to state my reasons for objecting to this Bill? As I am one of the rank and file of Anglo-Indians, they may, without substantial error, be taken as those of a considerable class.

We are absolutely opposed to the trial of Europeans by officials belonging to the second and third classes. These classes are filled from the ranks of orthodox Hindu and Mahomedan families. Their members do not know anything of English society, and they are not educated in England. The deep repugnance, on social grounds, of which the Bill has provoked the expression is, amongst those with whom I agree, in no way personal. It is not that of Englishmen towards natives of India. It rests on a radical fact,—the antagonism of diverse social systems. It is easy, I believe, for Englishmen to realise that their own feelings towards Mahomedanism and Hinduism are intensified in the case of no inconsiderable section of Anglo-Indian society,—its women.

With reference to the first class—Native Covenanted Civilian—our objections are based on different, and, we hope, less irremovable, grounds. In their case, we think the proposal premature. They are too few and too young in the service to have created any general opinion whatsoever concerning themselves. If time had been allowed, we think it possible that they would have won the confidence of those Anglo-Indians who knew them personally, the mass of adverse opinion would have been leavened, and we should have been spared many causes for regret which have been created by a too hasty attempt at legislation.

May I, in conclusion, say, with reference to the general principle of the Bill, that many of its opponents are possessed by the opinion that the question of the trial of Anglo-Indians is primarily an Anglo-Indian question, and that in only a secondary manner does it concern the English at home, or the Natives of India? We do not think it just or reasonable, in any case, that power of trial should be given to such Judges as have not, from whatever cause, the confidence of the class to be tried. —I am, Sir, &c.,

AN ENGLISHWOMAN.

[We were intending, in the paragraph referred to, to summarise Mr. Bright's speech, and not to describe the Bill itself, which we had discussed elsewhere. On referring to the paragraph, however, we see that the sentence, intended only to condense Mr. Bright's account of the Bill, appeared to come from ourselves, and we regret the blunder.—Ed. Spectator.]

TORTURE FOR CRIMINALS.

SIR,—May I, through your columns, call attention to a passage in the last edition of the "Unseen Universe," by Professors Balfour Stewart and Tait, which seems noteworthy, as indicating in a striking manner the tendency of a certain class of minds at the present time? In speaking of the punishment of our criminals, the authors say (p. 144):—

"Imprisonment has been tried in vain, and, besides, it involves great and needless expense. The 'cat,' though thoroughly appropriate, is objected to, as tending to brutalise (!) the patient, and render murder not unlikely. No such objections can be urged against the use of electricity in any of its many forms. For it can easily be applied so as to produce for the requisite time, and for that only, and under the direction of skilled physicians and physiologists, absolutely indescribable torture (unaccompanied by wound or even bruise), thrilling through every fibre of the frame of such miscreants."

It has long been known from the works of physiologists that the nerves of various animals are not unfrequently subjected, sometimes for a considerable time, to the action of electricity; but this is the first time to my knowledge that scientific men have confessed that such treatment produces "absolutely indescribable torture," and it is also new to me to find the same torture advocated for human beings. The passage is the more remarkable as it occurs, printed in parentheses, in a book which treats of very different matters, and it apparently has little connection with what precedes or follows. It seems almost like a "feeler," a trial of the effect of the thin edge of a huge wedge. For if the public do not object, and our "skilled physiologists" are content to accept office as genteel torturers of their fellow-men as well as of animals (always for the benefit of mankind, of course), there does not seem to be any reason or feeling on their part which will restrain them from further utilising such advantageous opportunities of investigation. Might not the delight in the physiological world at the news of a fresh murder prove more demoralising to the community even than the "cat"? —I am, Sir, &c.,

THOUGHT-TRANSFERENCE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In the article on "Mirage" which appears in last week's Spectator, a quotation is made from the "Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research," which quotation, standing by itself, is likely to convey an erroneous impression to some of your readers. At the close of the second Report of the Committtee on Thought-Transference, some preliminary experiments are recorded on the reproduction of drawings, without any discernible communication passing between the agent, Mr. Blackburn, who had momentarily seen the drawing made by one of us, and the percipient, Mr. G. A. Smith, who was blind-folded throughout the experiment. In these early experiments, Mr. Smith held Mr. Blackburn's hand for a few moments, and then releasing it, drew his impression of the figure. In this way, we obtained a rough, but recognisable reproduction of the nine figures which we had drawn. It is these preliminary experiments which are quoted in your article. But, as we say in our third report, just published by Trübner, "We could allow no exception to our cardinal axiom on this subject, that no experiment where contact of any sort is allowed can be decisive; and though, owing to the extreme irregularity of the random figures drawn by us, it would have been difficult to convey a notion of them by a code of pressure-signs, yet some such hypothesis was conceivable. Accordingly, we requested Mr. Blackburn to dispense altogether with the preliminary contact, and the extensive series of drawings which illustrate the third part of the proceedings—with the exception of the first four—were all obtained when a clear space of some two feet intervened between the agent and the percipient, and amid absolute and unbroken silence. However, with the view of removing all doubts that might arise as to possible auditory communications, we made the severe experiment of stopping up the percipient's ears with putty, tying a bandage round his eyes and ears, fastening a bolster-case over the head, and then enveloping the entire head and trunk in a blanket. Fig. 22 was now secretly drawn by one of us, and shown outside the room to Mr. Blackburn, who on his return sat behind Mr. Smith, the percipient, and in no contact with him whatever, and as perfectly still as it is possible for a human being to sit who is not concentrating his attention on keeping motionless, to the exclusion of every other object. In a minute or two, Mr. Smith took up a pencil and drew the reproduction which is shown in our "Proceedings," and which I think your readers will admit bears a close resemblance to the original. Obviously, an incalculable number of trials might be made before pure guess-work would hit upon a resemblance as near as that obtained in this, and in almost every case, by Mr. G. A. Smith.

Whilst we quite admit that the antecedent improbability of thought-transference is so great as to demand an extensive and varied series of stringent experiments before it can be admitted, nevertheless, we venture to assert that the cumulative character of the evidence which we have now amassed, and the extent to which we have eliminated the hypothesis of collusion, chance coincidence, and muscle or sign-reading, render our claim to have established the reality of this novel class of phenomena a very strong one. Much of the criticism we meet with depends on the a priori presumption of impossibility which, natural though it may be, cannot, of course, be legitimately opposed to positive evidence. Of the value and extent of this evidence, your readers will be able to judge from the reports we have published, in the third of which a summary tabular view will be found of nearly a thousand experiments on thought-transference.—I am, Sir, &c.,

NATURAL LAW IN THE SPIRITUAL WORLD.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your number for August 4th contains a notice of Mr. Drummond's new book, entitled "Natural Law in the Spiritual World." Your critical article is worthy of the book, which I have read with the attention it deserves. You recognise generously the high claims of any man who, while cleaving to the most "dogmatic dogmas," shall yet believe in Darwin, Spencer, and Huxley; and who, going beyond this, actually compels the teaching of Huxley, Spencer, and Darwin into the service of revealed religion. It is a great work, and one that must command much of the effort of the current generation. Men will believe in Revelation, and are unable to refute Science; it is much therefore to show plausibly that these do not contradict one another, how much more to prove conclusively their unity of result. Mr. Drummond has written wisely and well; but it happens that the very same task was undertaken ten years ago by Dr. W. Woods Smyth, then of Maidstone, in a book entitled, "The Bible and Evolution," an abridgment of which was issued in 1882, and called "The Government of God" (Elliot Stock, Paternoster Row). The one purpose of both these publications was to trace out and demonstrate unity of principle and method, as well as continuity of purpose, in and through the kingdom of nature and the kingdom of grace. It fell to my lot to review the earlier volume, and of it I wrote thus in 1873:—

"This is a work of unusual character. It is marked by energy, originality, and power. . . . Dr. Smyth would teach that the doctrine of evolution of the world, and the things that are therein, as set forth by Darwin and others, is correct; but that the assumption that this should weaken our belief in a personal Creator is altogether a mistake. His task is to show that, on the contrary, the footprints of the Creator, through the pre-Adamite epoch, coincide with those which lead down to the later times of human history; that not only a Creator, but the same Creator, can be traced, by the principles, the methods, and the details of his Government, as having been God over all, both through geologic and historic times. Dr. Smyth affirms that the intercourse of God with man has harmonized accurately, mutatis mutandis, with the lines upon which he wrought out the development of humbler pre-Adamite beings. He says that Christianity is not preternatural, and, therefore, contrary to reason and difficult of belief, but that it is per-natural, i.e., a consistent and complete carrying-through of the methods of Nature into the regions of Grace; that revelation, animal sacrifice, and atonement are simply harmonious analogues in the latest volume of creative history, of law, succumbing of the unfit, and indirect equilibration, as found in its earlier pages. Of this, speaking critically, we simply say that it is a grand idea, deserving the most hearty prosecution and study. . . . The whole theme is one to broaden and deepen current ideas about the actualities of religion, to interweave more closely and substantially the things of time with those of eternity, and to make men feel that the Government of God is about them now for guidance; that a personal response to its influences is demanded at their hands, and that the penalties of 'unfitness' are irremediable and sure."

Partly as an act of friendly justice to Dr. Smyth, partly to refer Mr. Drummond's readers to other sources of information, and still more to help in keeping alive the public interest in this important question, I take the liberty of asking the insertion of this letter.—I am, Sir, &c.,

BIOGENESIS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Many will thank you for calling attention to Mr. Drummond's profoundly interesting and suggestive book. But may I remark that there is an alternative view, which should be fully considered, before accepting the doctrine of Biogenesis in the spiritual life as a perfectly sound analogy? The view to which I refer distinguishes between life and the consciousness of life, regarding the divine or universal humanity as already latent in all, and the true being of all; while the "dead" self is but the defective condition which obstructs its conscious energy. Regeneration is thus an affair of consciousness. It is a case of germination; not, as with the raising of the inorganic to the organic, or of the vegetable to the animal stage, a case of conversion. Germination does not require contact with a higher order of life; the productive power of the seed is in itself, and it needs external aid only to loosen its integuments. That process has its correspondence for the spiritual life in the unveiling, or "revealing" to consciousness of the Christ or divine humanity in each; the sun seen through the dissolving mist of the false apparent personality. Thus the Christian Revelation fructifies the seed which existed as a principle of regeneration from the first. That is quite a different conception from "conversion," and it has a great weight of religious authority on its behalf. I may instance William Law and the recently published "Letters from a Mystic of the Present Day."

In this view, it is rather faith—the "believing of the heart into righteousness"—than the operation of a personal divine power, that is recognised as necessary to regeneration. But even if the direct action of a higher conscious life is insisted on as essential to the Christian idea, that is still only for the manifestation of the same principle existing, though hitherto unconscious in man himself; and so far, the analogy of biogenesis equally fails. That is especially important, in regard to the theological consequences which Mr. Drummond deduces from his principle. And the question is further interesting with reference to the claims of religious systems other than Christianity to contain a revelation of the essential truths of religion.—I am, Sir, &c., C. C. M.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In the review of Mr. Drummond's book, entitled "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," I notice that the writer refers to the theory of "Biogenesis" as the now certain scientific doctrine of biogenesis, that 'life can only come from the touch of life.' Would you permit me to point out that, so far from that doctrine being generally accepted as "certain" by scientific men at the present time, I believe that even Professors

Tyndall himself would willingly admit that in past epochs the lowest forms of life may have originated in non-living matter. The experiments made some time ago did not prove that abiogenesis never occurs, still less that it never has occurred, but only that, under certain special conditions, the production of living out of certain non-living matter does not take place.

The views of Professor Huxley on this subject are, I think, that although we have no knowledge of any link between living and non-living matter, he should expect to find that the evolution of living protoplasm from non-living matter did occur in remote periods when the earth was passing through various physical and chemical conditions. There are, however, other scientific men who hold that abiogenesis has not only occurred in past epochs, but that it does also take place at the present time, and that they have themselves succeeded in producing living out of non-living matter.—I am, Sir, &c.,

SAMUEL WADDINGTON.

THE LIBERAL DAILY PRESS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your correspondent Mr. Matthews, whose excellent letter appeared in your paper of the 28th ult., has, I consider, done great service to the Liberal cause, in pointing out the defections and unfaithfulness of the Daily News, which I am happy to see have at last received a rebuke not only from your correspondent, but also from your own pen.

I have been an almost constant reader of the Daily News for many years; I say almost, because I have been sometimes so disgusted with its half-hearted support, amounting often to almost an attack on the Government, to say nothing of its intense egotism, that I have for a time, more than once, exchanged it for the Daily Chronicle; but the fact of its being considered the Liberal organ of the Government, and as such, being supposed to contain information not accessible to other Liberal daily papers, has induced me reluctantly to retake it.

I trust that your own recent strictures, as well as the very temperate letter of your correspondent, will have the effect of bringing the paper to a better sense of its duties as the organ of the Government; or if not, that the Liberal party will ere long provide some better channel whereby to convey and advocate its opinions, for to the often very feeble advocacy and half-hearted support of, nay, sometimes opposition to, the measures of the Government, I have attributed the occasional defection of some of the loose Liberal Members; and in that opinion, I have reason to know I do not stand alone.—I am, Sir, &c.,

HOW OUR MEANING IS CONVEYED TO ANIMALS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The following anecdote may interest some of your readers:—Some years ago, when starting for a foreign tour, I entrusted my little Scotch terrier, "Pixie," to the care of my brother, who lived about three miles distant from my house. I was away for six weeks, during the whole of which time "Pixie" remained contentedly at his new abode. The day, however, before I returned, my brother mentioned in the dog's hearing that I was expected back the next day. Thereupon, the dog started off, and was found by me at my bed-room door the next morning, he having been seen waiting outside the house early in the morning when the servants got up, and been admitted by them. "Pixie" is still alive and flourishing, and readily lends himself to experiments, which, however, yield no very definite result. He certainly seems to understand as much of our meaning as it concerns his own comfort to understand, but how he does it I cannot quite determine. I should be sorry to affirm, clever as he is, that he understands French and German, yet it is certainly a fact that he will fall back just as readily if I say "Zurück!" as if I say "To heel!" and advance to the sound "En avant!" as well as to "Hold up!" As in both cases I am careful to avoid any elucidatory gesture or special tone of voice, I am inclined to think that there must be here a species of direct thought-transference. At the same time, I am bound to add that without the spoken word I am unable to convey the slightest meaning to him. This, however, may be due to what I believe to be a fact, that it is almost impossible without word or gesture to formulate the will with any distinctness. If this theory be correct, the verbal sounds used would convey the speaker's meaning, not in virtue of the precise sounds themselves, but of the intention put into them by the speaker. I should be glad to know of the experience of others tends to confirm this theory, which I do not remember to have seen suggested before.—I am, Sir, &c.,

"MISS STANDISH."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I am sure, without intending it, you have really done me rather an injury by your notice, on July 21st, of my last book, "Miss Standish." That story your reviewer mildly praises; but with regard to the second, "By the Bay of Naples," several quite erroneous statements are made. The plot of that story does not, as your reviewer thinks, "turn upon the hideous complication of a man in love with the daughter of a woman whom he has seduced," but upon the wholly different situation of a man in love with the daughter of a lady who had refused to become his wife. There is a deeply tragic element in the story. He had threatened the lady who refused him to make her miserable for ever, if she would not marry him. He accomplished his threat by having her daughter as a baby stolen away from her, thus breaking the gentle mother's heart. Years afterwards, he meets the daughter, and from her likeness to her mother at once falls in love with her, believing her to be some one else. The story is founded on fact. For years it has haunted me, as showing how this man was, indeed, cursed in gaining his wishes,—first, the heart-break and consequent death of the woman he had, as he said, loved; next, the acceptance of the gentle girl, whose life he had devoted himself to marring from her babyhood. I have often thought, perhaps we should all be equally left without anything to wish or hope, if we gained that on which we have set our hearts. It seemed to require a Hawthorne properly to relate the story. But none else tried it. So I tried. Possibly I have failed. But in any case, though tragic, my story has none of the hideous elements attributed to me, probably through a hasty turning-over of the pages, in your notice. Can you remove from the minds of your readers the impression that I have written such a story as that attributed to me? It is particularly painful to me, that people should think I had written anything of the kind.—I am, Sir, &c.,

A. E. N. BEWICKE.

[We are sorry that we did Miss Bewicke a wrong; but it was not caused by "hasty turning-over of the pages." On the contrary, pp. 40-41 in vol. iii. were read more than once, and interpreted to the best of our power. Read again, in the light of Miss Bewicke's explanation, they assume a meaning which we gladly accept, instead of that which we had put upon them.—Ed. Spectator.]

A CORRECTION.

SIR,—The reviewer of Julian Hawthorne's novel in your last week's issue has described the lines,—

MR. GALTON'S INQUIRIES INTO HUMAN FACULTY, AND ITS DEVELOPMENT.*

THOSE who have read any of Mr. Galton's previous writings, especially his Hereditary Genius, will not be surprised at finding in this work an extraordinary amount of curious investigation into matters somewhat apart from the ordinary line of scientific research, pursued with indefatigable industry, great ingenuity, and no small amount of labour.

The author lays no claim to being exhaustive, but aims rather at being suggestive, while, at the same time, something like logical sequence is preserved by an arrangement and revisal of various short treatises, which have previously appeared in a more desultory shape and order in various publications. If his leading ideas are not altogether new, there is certainly much novelty in many of his facts, in his method of exact collection and verification of them, in the importance with which he successfully invests most of them, and in the way in which he has managed to bring all of them to bear upon a common purpose.

The dominant ideas of this curious volume undoubtedly are (1), the very great variety which occurs in the psychological development of different individuals of the human race; (2), the great extent to which this is due to original construction (personal and hereditary, especially the latter), rather than to education and surroundings; (3), as the logical conclusion of all this, that it is possible and is our "religious" duty, both individually and socially, to use every lawful means to further that evolution which is ever going on, more or less rapidly,—to be, so to speak, "workers together" with the great First Cause in that improvement which, with enormous waste of material and force and much suffering, is the slow and gradual result of the constitution of things.

Such is the key-note of the whole book; but in the course of its discussions there is an immense amount of extremely interesting matter, one of the most curious specimens of which is the author's pet method of discovering the typical or generalised features of certain groups of persons by photographs of many individuals (all, of course, in the same position and of the same size), which are rapidly exposed to the camera so as to be superimposed on each other, the traits which are individual and exceptional leaving only a slight shade, while those common to the whole become intensified by the cumulative process. Wonderfully distinct faces, from groups of members of one family, of criminals, of persons of tubercular constitution, &c., are shown on the frontispiece. He gives an anecdote of how the mother of two girls who were not specially like each other, on seeing their generalised photograph, said,—“Oh, that is A.”—“No, it must be B. I never knew before that they were at all like each other!”

The inquiry into the variety of power in different persons to “visualise” their thoughts is one of the most elaborately worked-out portions, and there are very odd illustrations of a strange propensity, that of mentally investing different numbers or different letters of the alphabet with special colours, and of picturing certain series of numbers in peculiar and apparently senseless arrangements as to relative position. These vagaries seem to be much more common than is generally supposed, because the persons so constituted seldom confess their idiosyncrasy, from fear of ridicule. The present writer has all his life been unable to dissociate the printed letters of the alphabet from what seems to him their appropriate colours, and he is quite unable to trace this propensity to any association formed in childhood. It is, perhaps, worthy of notice that all these colours are tertiary, never pure, or even secondary.

Perhaps the most curious chapter is one upon “Twins.” The author must have had an overwhelming amount of correspondence on this subject, as well as on many others which he has subjected to a sort of statistical test. The result of his inquiries is substantially this:—That in that large majority of cases of twins in which the mental and moral characteristics of two brothers or two sisters are as similar as their faces, the former is the result of original mental constitution, apart from and even in spite of great differences of education and outward circumstances. There are also examples of twins, far separate in locality, taking the same disease at the same time, and each feeling assured that his brother had so suffered. The following is a strong instance of similarity; it was sent to the author by the brother of the twins:—

“A was coming home from India, on leave; the ship did not arrive for some days after it was due; the twin-brother B had come up from his quarters to receive A, and their old mother was very nervous. One morning, A rushed in, saying, ‘Oh, mother, how are you?’ Her answer was, ‘No, B, it’s a bad joke; you know how anxious I am;’ and it was a little time before A could persuade her that he was the right man.”

Of thirty-five pairs of twins, sixteen are described as closely similar in tastes and disposition. In the remaining nineteen, they were much alike, but with certain minor differences, the latter mainly depending on greater or less vigour of nerve and vital energy. In twenty cases, the dissimilarity of the twins was very great, both in body and mind, in spite of identity of nurture.

There is a good deal both of fact and speculation tending to illustrate the now common doctrine of “unconscious cerebration,” a hypothesis which, though containing an idea somewhat difficult to grasp, affords the only reasonable explanation of a great variety of phenomena in dreaming, and in many more or less morbid conditions. Mr. Galton applies it to the visual and auditory hallucinations both of the insane and of the sane, these phenomena being undoubtedly much more common in the latter than is generally known. After a summary of facts, many of which are very interesting, he says:—

“The weirdness of visions lies in their sudden appearance, in their vividness while present, and in their sudden departure. An incident in the Zoological Gardens struck me as a helpful simile. I happened to walk to the seal-pond at a moment when a sheen rested on the unbroken surface of the water. After waiting a while, I became suddenly aware of the head of a seal, black, conspicuous, and motionless, just as though it had always been there, at a spot on which my eye had rested a moment previously, and seen nothing. Again, after a while, my eye wandered, and on its returning to the spot, the seal was gone. The water had closed in silence over its head without leaving a ripple, and the sheen on the surface of the pond was as unbroken as when I first reached it. Where did the seal come from, and whither did it go? This could easily have been answered, if the glare had not obstructed the view of the movements of the animal under water. As it was, a solitary link in a continuous chain of action stood isolated from all the rest. So it is with the vision; a single stage in a series of mental processes emerges into the domain of consciousness. All that precedes and follows lies out of it, and its character can only be inferred. We see in a general way that a condition of the presentation of visions lies in the over-sensitiveness of certain tracks or domains of brain-action and the under-sensitiveness of others, certain stages in a mental process being represented very vividly in consciousness, while the other stages are unfelt; also that individualism is changed to dividualism. I do not recollect seeing it remarked that the ordinary phenomena of dreaming serve to show that partial sensitiveness in a normal condition during sleep. They do so because one of the most marked characteristics of the dreamer is the absence of common-sense. He accepts wildly incongruous visions without the slightest scepticism. . . . The brain is known to be imperfectly supplied with blood during sleep, and cannot, therefore, be at full work. It is probable enough, from hydraulic analogies, that imperfect irrigation would lead to partial irrigation, and therefore to suppression of action in some parts of the brain, and that this is really the case seems to be proved by the absence of common-sense during dreams.”

He makes use of the metaphor that there is what he calls “the antechamber of the brain,” a sort of storehouse of ideas not completely within the range of consciousness, but lying close at hand, out of which the conscious mind in the “presence-chamber” summons those ideas of which it is in want when in active exercise, with more or less relevancy, according to its logical power, and the richness of the contents of the so-called “antechamber”:—

“The consequence of all this is that the mind frequently does good work without the slightest exertion. In composition, it will often produce a better effect than if it acted with effort, because the essence of good composition is that the ideas should be connected by the easiest possible transitions. When a man has been thinking hard and long upon a subject, he becomes temporarily familiar with certain steps of thought, certain short-cuts, and certain far-fetched associations, that do not commend themselves to the minds of other persons, nor, indeed, to his own at other times; therefore, it is better that his transitory familiarity with them should come to an end, before he begins to write or speak.”

After a pause, his ideas will have lost their adventitious relations to each other, and stand in those which will meet with ready acceptance in the minds of others.

The hypothesis of one portion of the mind communicating with another portion as with a different person is one not sufficiently worked out by psychologists, either in the form of suggestions from the "ante-chamber" in a normal and active condition of the whole mind, or in those conditions of sleep or of hallucination in which the conscious mind is actually deceived, and mistakes the thoughts or words for those of another individuality. One ingenious writer, the late Dr. Wigan, in a book too little known, suggests that it depends on the fact of division of the brain into right and left hemispheres. This view is scarcely confirmed by modern physiology; but if the "partial-irrigation" theory of our author is correct, it follows that in dreams it is nearly always the same portion or track of brain which is deficient in sensitiveness, those portions which are connected with the sense of improbability or absurdity, whence the absence of surprise characteristic of most dreams.

These are a few specimens of the many corners of anthropology somewhat out of the beaten track of investigation into which Mr. Galton penetrates. If he fails in many instances to convince, the reader cannot avoid having innumerable and most novel and interesting lines of further research suggested to him. The region of Mr. Galton's investigations naturally invests his book with a materialistic and necessitarian aspect; but he seldom states dogmatically what his opinions are, and those who are the most averse to the narrow so-called philosophy of the period, will find little in this work which is necessarily inconsistent with their own views,—an example, among many others, of that strange rapprochement which is frequently made between certain phases of the Calvinistic theology, and that style of thought which a good Calvinist must look upon as the most objectionable of all. À propos of the same remark, we cannot close without quoting our author's words on the ever-present question of the vast amount of evil and of apparent waste on our globe. Anticipating the ultimate cooling and practical extinction of this planet, he says:—

"Neither can we discover whether organisms here are capable of attaining the average development of organisms in either of the planets that are probably circling round most of the myriads of stars, whose physical constitution, wherever it has been observed spectroscopically, does not differ much from that of our Sun. But we perceive around us a countless number of abortive seeds and germs; we find, out of any group of a thousand men selected at random, some who are crippled, insane, idiotic, and otherwise incurably imperfect in body or mind, and it is possible that this world may rank among other worlds as one of these."

In a recent article, we have already adverted casually to Mr. Galton's attempt to prove by statistics that there is no "objective efficacy" in prayer. His argument is stated in all sincerity and simplicity, but he lays himself open to at least two or three damaging observations—(1), he ignores the distinction between the genuine, earnest prayer of individuals, and the formal petitions for the long life of monarchs, &c., which barely deserve the name of prayers; (2), he forgets that the former are generally private (all the more private, the more they are earnest), and therefore utterly beyond the reach of statistical investigation; (3), he also ignores the distinction between praying for a direct reversal of the laws of the material world, which would be praying for a miracle, and asking for that communication of moral energy and mental light which may lead us to use the appropriate means for the production of the desired result,—"Spirit to Spirit, Ghost to Ghost,"—by which no miracle, as it appears to many of us, is implied.

One of the weak points in Mr. Galton's speculations seems to us to be his endeavour to impress his readers with the feasibility of improving the breed of our fellow-men. We fear that there are motives constantly in action, and which will not only ever be so, but will be so in an increasing degree, and some of them connected with the noblest portion of our nature, diametrically opposed to the practical helping-on of evolution by the survival of the fittest. The hope must be a feeble one which is driven to seek for an example of social arrangements tending in this direction, in the abolition of celibate Fellowships in the two old Universities.

DIDEROT AND THE PLAYERS.*

THE centenary of Diderot's death, after modern fashion, will be in the course of celebration in one more year. On July 31st, 1784,

* The Paradox of Acting. Translated from Diderot's "Paradoxe sur le Comédien." By Walter Herries Pollock. With a Preface by Henry Irving. London: Chatto and Windus. 1883.

this oddity of authorship "died suddenly, on rising from table." "He has been censured," an enemy tells us, "for employing needlessly a scientific language, and for having recourse to metaphysical doctrines, frequently unintelligible; and for having introduced a number of definitions incapable of enlightening the ignorant, and which the philosopher seems to have invented for no other purpose than to have it thought that he had great ideas, while, in fact, he had not the art of expressing perspicuously and simply the ideas of others." Nobody ever suggested so many parallels as Diderot. The son of a prosperous cutler, and a Jesuit student carefully educated for a family canonry up to tonsure-point, he rejected priesthood and canonry, and was sent to Paris to ensue the traditional alternative, the study of the law. True instance of the irrepressible bent of letters, he would have none of respectability in that form either, and for a time was deprived of his allowance because he insisted on scribbling. His variety of turn stood in the way of the highest success, as it has often done; though probably, as it has done quite as often, it provided ample compensation in the joy of work and the elasticity of mind. Poetry, science, sentimental comedies, dictionaries (of medicine, and of arts and trades!), speculative metaphysics, political satire (for which he was imprisoned, like most men), critical treatises, and improper stories, the man wrote them all. His manner was many-sided as his matter. He reminds us of Thucydides in his provoking involutions of style, of a mixture of Plato and Aristophanes in his philosophic comedy; and of the Aristotelian spirit in his dissertations, such as that which is our special text. In his variety of irons-in-the-fire, he is like his famous contemporaries Goldsmith and Beaumarchais—who died, the first ten years before, the second fifteen years after him—among other things, in that he wrote one or two stage-plays, with a result not uncommon in the case of those who entangle themselves in that thorny path. The irritation engendered by the eternal peculiarities of actors (speaking of them, of course, as a body), their amazing vanities, jealousies, and littlenesses, their literal rendering of "All the world's the stage," their chartered libertinism in the matter of correspondence and appointments, their funny and dictatorial attitude towards authorship; and, alas! their lax interpretation of the sanctities of honour and bargain—in fine, the separateness of their existence from that of all other men, evidently drove him one day into the outburst of contemptuous protest known as the Paradoxe sur le Comédien; as in other directions, a similar irritation roused the soul of Jeremy Collier, and gall-tipped the pen of Churchill. The same thing may be happening again before very long. The social position of actors has been in appearance curiously changed of late. We are not speaking of the honours (beginning to be a little overdone, perhaps) paid to an exceptional artist like Mr. Irving, any more than a man moralising on the decadence of the House of Commons in the fine old qualities of courtesy, and manliness, and self-restraint, is alluding to the few statesmanlike figures in it. A social revolution appears to be taking place on the stage. To the old actors, it was almost an hereditary art; and from their cradle they regarded it as the serious business of life. By the new, more and more recruited from the ranks of well-born idlers, it is, we fear, looked upon as little less than the pastime which the good-natured applause of drawing-rooms has suggested to them as a means of personal display. Even as these ephemerals have come in, the old country companies, which nursed the real actor, have gone out. And it is probable that none but the dramatic authors, blamed and abused, of course (in the usual fairness of so-called critical perception) for the defects of their material, know how more and more impossible it is becoming every day to find the artist, to say nothing of a company of artists, who can be trusted with the expression of any strong emotion, which defies self-consciousness and demands self-abandonment. We have heard it said that modern audiences laugh at grave love-scenes on the stage. Who would not, as modern actors play them? Yet nobody among the most typical of modern audiences of the upper class—those of the Haymarket—seems much disposed to laugh when Mrs. Bernard Beere plays Sardou's Fédora. The part is one which, without true acting, could be only ridiculous.

The social petting which these society actors receive, and endow some of their fellows with, is but a paltry set-off for the rapid decadence of all vigorous acting; and from another and a painful point of view, such stories as those told of The Squire and Moths, in the papers of last year, do the theatrical profession more harm in all esteem worth having, than invitations to dances and receptions do it good. We cannot but wish that a man like Mr. Irving would use his influential and well-won position, and the many opportunities of public speaking which now fall to his lot, bravely and sternly to rebuke these sins in his body politic (as he did the amateur mania), rather than indulge in new versions of the old common-places about the work and "education" of the Stage. The world will not judge of a body only by its highest members, and where there are such diseases in the limbs as these, the worthiest members suffer together. As for education, surely it is better to face the truth, which is that, whatever it may have been before the days of the novel and the late dinner, the theatre is now a recreation only, though sometimes a high one. Even as a recreation, it need not cease to be an art. But it is ceasing so to be. And a stern reform in certain of its practices would do it, as an art, no harm.

But we have taken up Diderot's parable as he left it, rather than reviewed his paradox. This is what, smarting under the experience of producing two plays, the literary Proteus says of the actors of his day, in Mr. Pollock's able translation, of which more presently:—

"In society, unless they are buffoons, I find them polished, caustic, and cold, proud, light of behaviour, spendthrifts, self-interested; struck rather by our absurdities than touched by our misfortunes; masters of themselves at the spectacle of an untoward incident or the recital of a pathetic story; isolated, vagabonds, at the command of the great; little conduct, no friends, scarce any of those holy and tender ties which associate us in the pains and pleasures of another, who in turn shares our own. I have often seen an actor laugh off the stage; I do not remember to have seen one weep. What do they, then, with this sensibility that they arrogate and that people grant them? Do they leave it on the stage at their exit, to take it up again at their next entrance? What makes them slip on the sock or the buskin? Want of education, poverty, a libertine spirit. The stage is a resource, never a choice. Never did an actor become so from love of virtue, from desire to be useful to the world, or to serve his country or family, never from any of the honourable motives which might incline a right mind, a feeling heart, a sensitive soul, to so fine a profession. I myself, in my young days, hesitated between the Sorbonne and the Stage. In the bitterest depth of winter, I used to go and recite aloud parts in Molière and in Corneille in the solitary alleys of the Luxembourg. What was my project? To gain applause? Perhaps. To mix on intimate terms with actresses whom I found charming, and who I knew were not strait laced? Certainly!"

Wondering if such a shocking and frankly-avowed motive as the last can ever have anything to do now-a-days with the attractions of the stage for its latest school of votaries, we need not point out that, even in his own country and day, Diderot must have been provoked into some angry exaggeration in this tremendous indictment. But French actors were under a ban which has long been unknown with us; and the ban itself must have gone far to lower them. Now-a-days, and in England, when society seems possessed of a kind of craze for actors, whether they are good actors or not, surely the best opportunity ever given is offered to the profession to cleanse itself of all baser taint, and, by reconsidering certain of its ways, to make itself frankly free of the guild thrown open to it. For it is to be remembered, on the other hand, that in many and various quarters the old prejudice is still deep and inveterate, and that it is a trying ordeal for any individual, or for any class, to be set upon a pedestal for some to worship, and for others to stone. Mr. Henry Irving, in his preface, deals lightly enough with Diderot's charges, and, from his point of view, quite naturally; as his withers, and those of any man like him, are entirely unwrung by them. He has attained the place which Charles Keau before him, and Macready before that, and Garrick before the Kembles, held by right, as the tragedian of the day. There is a good deal more noise made over him than them, but that is the vice of the day, applied to his craft, as to all others. There is a pitiful lack of proportion and much insane blowing of trumpets abroad generally (a source of some amused wonder to non-hysterical man), of which he gets his share. Ability and conduct will always maintain the place he holds, as in the case of his predecessors, though in the whirligig of time's satirical revenges, it must cost him a good deal more money to keep up than it ever cost them. In these days of butter-feasts, when the vessels are emptied so freely on his head, it argues much self-control in Mr. Irving to keep it clear. His preface to the translation before us is no mere piece of complementary work. It is thoroughly thought out and thoroughly well written, and would alone prove, if all the circumstances did not, how wisely and lovingly he considers his art. As a criticism upon acting, it is infinitely better than Diderot's treatise, which is what its author calls it, and no more,—a paradox. We do not think that Mr. Pollock has quite adequately conveyed in his translation the meaning of the title. Diderot did not, we imagine, mean so much that Acting is a paradox, as that he knew he was putting forward a paradoxical view of it. That view is told in a word or two, and the treatise is but an enlargement of it. He holds that the best actor is the merest mimic, and in direct opposition to the Horatian maxim,— maintains that the player should have no real feeling at all of what he simulates, but be himself entirely unmoved, if he is to move others. This insensibility really seems to have been true of Garrick, if the well-known story is to be accepted of his putting his tongue into his cheek while playing Lear over Cordelia's body, and saying to one near him through the thunders of applause, "I've got them now." Diderot admired Garrick very much, though that did not prevent a characteristically French disdain for any difference between Hamlet and Macbeth. "If you ask him for the scene of the pastrycook's boy, he will play it for you; if you asked him directly afterwards for the great scene in Hamlet he would play it for you. He was as ready to cry over the tarts in the gutter, as to follow the course of the air-drawn dagger." Very possibly Garrick may have been one of the proverbial exceptions that prove all rules; but we must for ourselves admit, after much reading about him and other great actors of the past, that we have always much doubted if Garrick was ever comparable to the Keans and Siddonses as a tragedian, though as an actor of comedy, no doubt, exceptionally great. In this paradoxical peculiarity, otherwise, he must have stood alone. Mr. Irving disposes of the paradox by quoting Talma at some length in a passage which commends itself to Mr. Irving as a "perfect description of the art of acting." "I call sensibility," says the French actor, "that faculty of exaltation which agitates an actor, takes possession of his senses, shakes even his very soul, and enables him to enter into the most tragic situations, and the most terrible of the passions, as if they were his own." And so forth. With all respect for Mr. Irving, the passage strikes us as windy and pretentious, as, from that same study of the past, we rather conceive Talma's acting to have been. We infinitely prefer the English actor's own quiet exposition:—"It is quite possible to feel all the excitement of the situation, and yet be perfectly self-possessed. This is art which the actor who loses his head has not mastered. It is necessary to this art that the mind should have, as it were, a double consciousness, in which all the emotions proper to the occasion may have full sway, while the actor is all the time on the alert for every detail of his method." That is the best summary description of true acting we have ever seen. Sensibility (not always the same as heart), under the control of judgment, makes a fine actor, and where genius is, a great one. Either will fall short, without the other. Let us look at two leading actors of our day, who have missed the big prize. Mr. Charles Warner has an abundant sensibility, but uncontrolled of judgment. Mr. Hermann Vezin has judgment and method as fine as steel, but there is something wanting in the sensibility. Mr. Irving may not quite equal the second in the one gift, or the first in the other. But he combines the qualities in rare proportion, and ecce signum.

What we have written will, we hope, help to call attention to the interesting old treatise—interesting for its subject and for its author—which, curiously enough, comes forward for the first time, we believe, in an English translation, a hundred years after date. Mr. Pollock has done his part as translator very well, as we take it without the help of a dictionary. A knowledge of both languages sufficiently familiar to dispense with that, is the secret of real success in that direction. For dictionaries give the scholastic equivalents, not the conversational. For an instance, which lately came to our notice, "chambellan du Roi" becomes "King's chamberlain," by right of dictionary. But obviously the true translation is "equerry." Mr. Pollock's translation reads as if it were an original. And, moreover, he has been both careful and skilful in preserving the archaic tone, and even something of the involved construction, so far as it could be kept without the sacrifice of clearness, which distinguish the work of Diderot. And he has supplied notes of his own which add both interest and value to a little book which brings before us once again, in their habits as they lived, the historical figures of Clairon and Dumesnil, of Le Kain and Baron and Molé. He seems to have been rather beaten once, by parade tragique, which he has to paraphrase first and explain in a note afterwards, it having been, apparently, something like the preliminary exposition of "Pyramus and Thisbe" in the Midsummer Night's Dream. Referring the reader to a passage at p. 32, too long to quote, as a very entertaining instance in support of Diderot's paradoxical theory, we conclude by citing two or three short and characteristic extracts, the last of which is the last word in the book, and as appropriate a climax to a theatrical discussion as could well be found. The treatise is in the form of a dialogue between two speakers:—

"Well enough off with the small boxes, they [the actors] have been on the point of deciding either that the author should give up his profits, or that his piece should not be accepted."

"But this project involved nothing less than the extinction of the dramatic author's career."

"What does that matter to them?"

"Have you ever seen a whole piece played to perfection?"

"On my word, I can't remember it. Stop a bit—yes, sometimes, a middling piece, by middling actors." [The italics here are ours, for the passage is a wonderfully suggestive piece of true criticism. A great play crushes the middling actor.]

"It is late. Let us go sup."

THE ORKNEYS AND SHETLAND.*

THIS book is so enjoyable, contains so much solid information, and is in all important respects such a conscientious performance, that we hurry at once to discharge the necessary duty of fault-finding. We should have had nothing but praise for Mr. Tudor, had he not introduced into his narratives and descriptions an exasperating amount of the slang and hideous jocosities of the race-course, the billiard-room, and that portent of the day, the sporting journal. What are we to think of such writing as "Verily, Earls Robert and Patrick had established a healthy funk in the Orcadian mind?" Then Mr. Tudor is so fond of little sneers at churches and clergymen, that when one gets accustomed to his style, one turns over every fresh page in nervous dread lest he find a Dissenting minister described in gamin phraseology as "the reverend bloke," or "the cove in the pulpit," or, "the party with the white choker;" and it is owing in all probability to accident that before we have done with the book we are not asked to sup on such horrors. Finally, there is far more of vulgarity than of humour in writing like this about a mysterious rock carving:—"Now Jarl Rögnvald had a daughter called Ingired or Ingigerd, who was married to Erik Slagbrellir, shortly after her father's return to the Orkneys. Can Erik in a spoony fit have cut this tribute to his young woman's good looks?" The next time Mr. Tudor writes a book for the general public, and intended from its character to be of a permanent value as a work of reference, let him remember that in fifteen or twenty years the School Board system will have swept such monstrosities as "spoony" and "funk" into the dust-bin of oblivion. He should, indeed, have secured for his share of "The Orkneys and Shetland" the revision of his coadjutors, who have written so carefully on the geology of these interesting islands.

When, however, the reader has trained himself to shut his eyes—it is by no means easy to do so, we confess—to the unlovely peculiarities of Mr. Tudor's style, he will find a great deal in this book to admire. Mr. Tudor's enthusiasm and industry place him far in advance of ordinary guide-book makers. He writes as one who had been repeatedly over every inch of the ground he describes and discourses on, and had learned positively to love it. The tourist will find here abundant and accurate information of the kind he needs when he reaches what is to him a terra incognita, about hotels, steamers, land conveyances, and the like. Mr. Tudor has ransacked all the authorities, from the Norse sagas to the daily newspapers of the day, bearing on the history and industries of his favourite islands. The book is everything that could be desired, alike from the historical and the topographical point of view. The maps, the geological and botanical chapters, a very full glossary and index, and appendices, including elaborate statistical tables, also deserve a word of praise. Mr. Tudor has, too, a quick eye, and some of his "graphic" writing is happy enough. Any one who has seen a congregation of those absurd sea-fowl the puffins will recognise the truth of his description of them as "grave, aldermanic-looking birds." When he divests himself of his fantastic garb of slang, he can write, not brilliantly, perhaps, but realistically, and to the point, as thus:—"It was a still, intensely cold night in August, with not a breath of air stirring, and the surface of the sea outside was like a 'painted ocean,' yet the roar of the tide over the shallows was something appalling, the only thing the writer can liken it to being the hurtling rush, on a still, frosty night, down an incline, of a heavily-laden goods train."

It was in 1468 that the Orkneys and Shetland came into the hands of James III. of Scotland, as a pledge for the dower of the Norwegian Princess whom he espoused, and as that pledge they have remained connected with the British Empire up to the present time. Before that date they had enjoyed three centuries of the rule of the Norse Jarls, who figure in the Sagas, of whom the daring Thorfinn and the pious Magnus, who, having been assassinated by his own cousin, became the patron saint of a cathedral of Kirkwall, seem to have been the most remarkable. The Jarls had overthrown a Celtic Christianity, as is proved by many curious antiquarian discoveries of recent date. It may be doubted if the Orcadians, and still more the Shetlanders, benefited, at all events at first, by becoming subjects of the Scotch Monarchy. The Earls of Angus, Strathorne, and St. Clair, and their clerical accomplices or rivals, were every whit as rapacious as the Jarls. The islanders were spared, however, most of the political and ecclesiastico-religious storms that swept the mainland. They had, indeed, visits from Bothwell and Montrose, but it may be doubted if these made very much more stir than the later exploits of the pirate Gow, which are the central incidents of one of Scott's most spirited romances. The Orcadians took much more quickly and kindly to Scotch ways, customs, and laws than the Shetlanders, who "remained till nearly the end of the sixteenth century, to all intents and purposes, as Scandinavian, not only in their customs, but also in their language, as if they had been still subjects of the Norwegian Crown." The Shetlanders are, indeed, essentially Scandinavians still.

There is almost as great a difference in character and pursuits between the inhabitants of Shetland and of the Orkneys as there is between the grotesque and rugged grandeur of the scenery of the one group of islands, and the somewhat flat monotony which characterises the other. There is a world of truth in the shrewd saying, quoted by Mr. Tudor,—"The Shetlander is a fisherman who has a farm; the Orcadian a farmer who has a boat." The Shetlander seems to have been, and, indeed, to be still, a rather easy-going, simple creature, though not without the cunning that is frequently found associated with simplicity. Up to 1826 he allowed the enterprising Dutch to reap the important "harvest of the sea" in the shape of the herring fishing, and even yet the Scheveningen bomschuits "coin money," as Mr. Tudor would no doubt say. The Orcadians have of late made great strides in material prosperity. Mr. Tudor says bankruptcy among the farmers of the Orkneys is unknown, and that during the four months he spent in wandering through the islands in 1880, he never saw a bare-footed man, woman, or child, nor was he once accosted by a beggar. In the bettering of the condition of the Shetlanders, Mr. Tudor makes proposals which we may quote without comment:—

"So long as the present crofter-fisherman system continues, so long will the evils exposed by the Truck Commission, although they may have been lessened since 1872, continue. With the best intentions in the world, so long as farm produce, stock, and fish appear on one side of the account, whilst rent and goods sold and delivered are on the other, a state of things that is inevitable so long as fishing and farming are combined, there will always be an idea, erroneous though it may be, that a lesser price is paid for what is sold, and a larger for what is purchased, than should be the case. Again, at the present time not only are the men, as often as not, compelled to be at their farms, when they might to greater advantage be prosecuting the fishing, but the land itself does not receive the development which it is capable of. To render anything like permanent improvement possible, not only in the cultivation of the land, but also in the condition and morale of the people, the writer believes the following changes to be necessary:—1st. The separation of farming from fishing, and the prosecution of each industry by men who devote their whole energies to whichever pursuit they take up. 2nd. This of course would necessitate larger holdings than exist at present. 3rd. The abolition of the present yearly tenancy, with its forty days' notice to quit, and the substitution of leases of sufficient length to protect the cultivator against loss, and to make it worth his while to cultivate his land on somewhat better agricultural principles than he does at present. 4th. The abolition of the scathold system, or, if it is retained by each proprietor, after his own scathold has been marked off from that belonging to adjacent owners, so far as his own tenants are concerned, the stinting the number of stock kept by each tenant. That many will say the foregoing propositions are impossible in Shetland, the writer is prepared for. Long-line fishing with large boats was said to be impossible in 1876, and in 1877 there were only eleven boats larger than sixareens registered in Shetland, last year there were 117. We have seen the enormous strides that have been made in the Orkneys in the last forty years, and once matters are put on a straight and satisfactory footing in Shetland, there is no reason why a similar improvement in the condition of the district and its inhabitants should not take place, and that, too, without either depopulating the islands or converting them into huge sheep farms."

As might be expected, much of the entertainment provided by Mr. Tudor in this volume consists of folk-lore and "good stories," associated largely with alcohol and clergymen. The Shetland minister who, in the days when wreckers reaped their harvest, prayed, "If it please Thee to cause helpless ships to be cast on the shore, oh! dinna forget the poor island of Sanda," seems to have been almost as frank as his Orkney brother who, on being charged with drunkenness, replied, "Reverend Moderator, I do drink as other gentlemen do." Some of the old Shetland superstitions are interesting, even if they cannot be said to be altogether admirable:—

"Fishermen foretold, from the knots in the bottom boards of a boat, whether she would be lucky at the fishing or not; be upset under sail, or be cast away; and Edmondston stated that he had known boats to be rejected and torn up in consequence of such a prophecy. When on their way to their boats fishermen were careful to avoid meeting any one who was supposed to be unlucky, and especially, a minister. If a man trod on the tongs (clivin), or was asked where he was going to, it was considered useless for him to go to the fishing that day. Once afloat, they were careful not to turn the boat withershins, that is, against the course of the sun. When setting their lines they avoided, and do still, mentioning certain objects, except by certain special words or phrases. Thus a knife is called skunie, or tullie; a church, būanhoos, or banshoos; a minister, upstanda, hoydeen, or preestingolva; the Devil, da Auld Chield, da Sorrow, da ill-health (health), or da black tief; the cat, kirser, fitling, vengla, or foodin. Mr. Arthur Laurenson is of opinion that the objection to the minister or church being mentioned arose from some lingering, half-pagan notion, that the sea-god would be jealous of any reference to the new faith. If, when hauling the lines, a stone should be brought up on a hook, it is carefully taken ashore, as it would be unlucky to throw it back into the sea. Saturday is looked upon as a lucky day for the smacks to sail for the Færoe fishing, though an irreligious Englishman might fancy that the crews chose that day to escape kirk on the following one. It was long considered unlucky to rescue people from drowning. Scott mentions that when the crew of a wrecked vessel were warping themselves ashore in Unst by a hawser, a native cut the rope, lest they should consume their winter stock of provisions. Mr. Laurenson gives three instances as having occurred within forty years before he wrote. In the first instance, a fisherman not only refused to attempt to save a drowning man, but even took the oars out of his own boat to prevent others doing so. In the second, three men looked calmly on at a neighbour drowning, and then walked home. In the third, a man pulled past a floating woman, and took no heed of her. Mr. Laurenson's theory is that there is an idea that the sea must have its victims, and, if defrauded, will avenge itself on the person who intervenes."

SKEAT'S ETYMOLOGICAL DICTIONARY.*

By the publication of this great work, Professor Skeat has worthily crowned his long list of labours in English study, and, while placing himself incontestably in the front rank of modern etymologists, has taken away a serious reproach from English scholarship. His way has been diligently prepared for him in recent years, not only by his own special study, but by the general advance in philological research, by the priceless activity of the Early English Text and similar Societies, and by the new application of the study of phonetics to the Early-English pronunciation. From his predecessors he has inherited but too little, beyond a damnosa hereditas of uninstructed conjecture, persistent inaccuracy, and hopeless vagueness of reference. Under such trying conditions, a busy man could not but relieve his feelings in caustic expressions of impatience, not untouched with the unconscious pathos of single-minded earnestness. In his preface, Mr. Skeat sets forth with humorous frankness his exceedingly low—we may fairly say, humiliating—estimate of the popular apprehension of philological principles; and he handles the professional etymologist no less severely than the etymologising layman. There is "Grimm's law," for example. Now, if one look at it for a few moments, there is nothing insuperable, or arduous, in the understanding of Grimm's law. Yet Mr. Skeat affirms that the popular notions about it "are extremely vague." "Many imagine," he bitterly alleges, "that Grimm made the law, not many years ago, since which time Latin and Anglo-Saxon have been bound to obey it." And he actually goes on to explain, in dead earnest, that "the word law is there strangely misapprehended; it is only a law in the sense of an observed fact." Again:—

"The most extraordinary fact about comparative philology is that, whilst its principles are well understood by numerous students in Germany and America, they are far from being well known in England, so that it is easy to meet even with classical scholars who have no notion what 'Grimm's law' really means, and who are entirely at a loss to understand why the English care has no connection with the Latin cura, nor the English whole with the Greek δλος, nor the French charité with the Greek χάρις."

Nor are the etymologists much better than other folk. "The spelling of Anglo-Saxon in some books is often simply outrageous. Accents are put in or left out at pleasure; impossible combinations of letters are given; the number of syllables is disregarded; and grammatical terminations have to take their chance." "In many cases, writers of 'etymological' dictionaries do not trouble to learn even the alphabets of the languages cited from, or the most elementary grammatical facts." "Statements abound which it is difficult to account for, except on the supposition that it must once have been usual to manufacture words, for the express purpose of deriving others from them." Of course, errors are handed down and multiplied generation after generation; that black spot is present in every department of literary history. Minor troubles need not be referred to, nor need Mr. Skeat's words of complaint be very exactly measured. It is a wholesome frankness. What Mr. Skeat tells us about his own mode of procedure, also, and his openness to correction and conviction, overspread the Dictionary with a feeling of honesty and trustworthiness and reasonableness that adds sensibly to its value.

Apart from the wealth of learning collected in the work, Mr. Skeat's rigid method alone would render the book for a long time to come an example and a standard of scientific etymology. The general plan of arrangement is clear and sufficient. A good many omissions might easily be noted in the vocabulary, probably owing to the somewhat arbitrary principle of selection. We miss cleat, cosey, coupon, crewel, deft, fad, proletariat, quiz, ragamuffin, reboant (E. B. Browning), recalcitrate, tussock, and numerous names of birds, such as fulmar, kestrel, kittiwake, pipit, &c., and of plants; and although some of the omissions are intrinsically of little importance, still, they are as well worthy of notice as imbroglio, manchineel, moonshee, paddy, pariah, pawnee, tom-tom, &c. Much space is saved by the use of easy abbreviations and symbols. Exceedingly important is the brief account of the history of each word, showing especially the approximate date of its earliest introduction and use. In many cases, we should be glad of more information on this head than we can obtain; for, as Mr. Skeat justly says, the tracing-back of the vocables to the first known use is the primary rule of etymology, and all-important. He confesses, as his own experience, that, in the process of following back the words to their original use and sense, the etymology usually presented itself unasked. This result emphasises the necessity of further enlargement of our glossaries, both in new words and in new forms of words already collected, as a first step from conjecture to certainty in a large number of cases. "Kilian's strange error in connecting wood-wale with wood was due, probably, to the loss of the cognate word to wood in Dutch," as Mr. Skeat points out. So in the case of intermediate forms:—For example, Mr. Skeat "almost certainly" identifies quandary with the earlier wandreth, but he quotes no use or undoubted form of "quandary" previous to Beaumont and Fletcher, and thus neglects to assist less agile etymologists over the difficulty of the accent on the penultimate syllable. The successive changes of meaning that words have undergone, if in like manner more fully ascertained, would be helpful etymologically; and Mr. Skeat does record such known changes where he conceives it to be absolutely necessary, although this happens but sparingly. Both as to use and as to sense, the examples of the forthcoming opus magnum of the Philological Society will, no doubt, clear up numerous difficulties that now baffle certain solution. But, after all, the defective literary preservation of words and forms of words will still leave the opportunity of imagining alliances where no alliances exist. A similar line of precautionary remark is much more necessary in the case of tracing words back to roots. Mr. Skeat freely invokes the names of Curtius, Fick, and others, and intends to limit himself to such cases as "scarcely admit of a doubt." The ordinary student, who lacks the experience and caution of Mr. Skeat, will do well to take very good care how he deals with such delicate matters as Aryan roots. Without quite following Mr. Skeat in all cases so far back, we can join with him in his scorn of the absurd treatment of English as an isolated language, and admire how clearly and forcibly he has brought out the relation of English to cognate tongues, and how firmly he has maintained the vital distinction between cognation and derivation. The comments, discussions, suggestions, and speculations, so frequently introduced, might occasionally have been cut shorter; but if there be a fault here at all, it is a fault that leans to virtue's side. A large amount of varied collateral matter forms a useful appendix.

There is endless matter of interest and entertainment in following the vicissitudes of words, on any one of Mr. Skeat's eight hundred quarto pages. It would be pleasant to trace the connection of such apparently dissimilar words as physic, future, fecundity, felicity, be, boor, and of such incongruous words as home, city, quiet, cemetery, comic; such accommodated forms as causeway and crayfish; such utter corruptions as counterpane; such hydraulic compressions as age; the partially common origin of prose and verse; and the secret relations of such an ominous trio as critic, certain, garble; and to show that scissors is, by rights, a plural of chisel; and to smile over the numerous instances of the national dropping of h's. But for all that, we must refer to the volume itself. We will rather turn to disputable points for a moment. Mr. Skeat, who is under no illusion as to his infallibility, will, no doubt, welcome the outspoken criticism of Mr. Hensleigh Wedgwood, who has already announced his dissent from some two hundred of these etymologies. Mr. Wedgwood's articles are learned and ingenious, and although they frequently fail to command agreement in whole or in part, they are still in numerous points to be calmly reckoned with. In spite of a reasonable read of the "reddin'-stroke," we cannot but remark that Mr. Wedgwood points out not a few misapprehensions and inconsistencies of Mr. Skeat's; and that, after chiding Mr. Skeat for too hasty judgment, he at once proceeds to imitate the example he has just censured. Chap ("fellow"), Mr. Skeat says, is an abbreviation of chapman. Mr. Wedgwood fancies he has demolished his adversary, when he says, "This is a bare guess, supported by no evidence that chapman itself was ever used in such a sense." Now, Mr. Skeat might, indeed, have pointed out (as Mr. Annandale does) the analogy of merchant, and especially of customer. (Has not "customer" undergone similar curtailment also in the American cuss?) But surely, since chap was used in the pedlar-sense of chapman, it is wholly unnecessary to require evidence of the use of chapman itself as "fellow." One cannot absolutely and out of hand reject Mr. Wedgwood's derivation from Dan. kiaft (or allied form), "the cheek." But he gives no definite historical explanation of the spread of the usage, and the date of the earliest known use of chap as "fellow" seems to tell against the presumption he raises. The plain fact is, that here we have lighted upon an accidental example of the point we were urging before,—that a more complete investigation of the actual occurrences of the vocables in literature and common speech is needed, to settle definitely even conjectures that compete for public favour on such unequal grounds as these. Or take the case of cave in, which Mr. Wedgwood holds to be for calve in. The same remarks apply; and possibly, in some similar cases, there may have been a union of streams from different origins. Meantime, the disagreement of the doctors seems to recommend tolerance of suggestions, where there is little real basis for inference (always provided that guesses are not elevated into facts), and contentment to acknowledge our grounds of uncertainty, where we cannot show with tolerable clearness the steps whereby we would fain go forward to advanced positions. Surely, Mr. Wedgwood is right as to argosy (for "ragusy"), and Mr. Annandale as to cockroach (Span., cucaracha). Office is given by Mr. Skeat as from opi, crude form of opes (wealth), hardly from opus (work), owing, presumably, to the difficulty of the stem oper-; yet elsewhere (under operate) he admits the derivation from oper-, and we are not aware that any difficulty has been made about the derivation of officina from opus, to which the same objection would lie. Mr. Skeat, unfortunately, does not treat officinal. We are glad to have Mr. Skeat's decided pronouncement that reliable "is by no means a new word," and that it "has completely established itself," although "many frivolous and ignorant objections have been made to it."

The school dictionary is also confined exclusively to etymological explanation. One feature of it we dislike heartily,—the inconvenient grouping of allied words together, in defiance of alphabetic arrangement. Mr. Skeat should have remembered that the principle of shirking unnecessary trouble does not exhaust itself in phonetic modifications of language; it may lead to the neglect of much useful study. If a boy turn up able, average, binnacle, cohabit, debenture, debilitate, debt, deshabille, devoir, due, duty, endeavour, exhibit, or habiliment, he finds in each case a reference to habit, under which they are all explained; because, forsooth, they all come from habeo. This is a profound mistake. Otherwise, it is a thoroughly good book. The great dictionary must find a place in every considerable library, and on the table of every serious student of English; the "Concise" dictionary will regulate the scientific study of English etymology in every secondary school.

NEWMAN has told us in his Apologia that Keble once said, in reply to some one who asked him if he thought a particular sermon good, "All sermons are good;" intending apparently to imply that one who listens to any sermon in the proper spirit, that is, in a reverential spirit, will reap benefit from it. Sermons of very different quality may be almost equally good to the most reverent listeners who are least in want of them; but the hardened sinner who may be touched and converted by true eloquence will listen unmoved to a dry and disjointed repetition of the most sacred truths, being unable to supply from his own dispositions the warmth and sense of reality which the preacher's words and manner fail of themselves to convey.

With regard to discourses like those in the volume before us, presented to the public divorced from the presence and manner of their author which must always be an integral part of sermons as originally delivered, they seem to us to be liable to two opposite faults. Either they will be disjointed, relying too much for their strength upon individual passages or texts of Scripture, which, when delivered with the impressive manner of a great preacher, produce a great effect, but which fall flat when they are read in the pages of a book unless they are developed and connected; or else they will be so carefully elaborated into consistent wholes, as to differ little or not at all from religious essays. Butler's sermons, with all their power and interest, supply instances of this latter defect. They are often theological essays. His chain of reasoning is generally so close, that it would destroy any one of them to cut out any appreciable portion of it. They are carefully-reasoned, argumentative treatises against the rationalism which was so prevalent in his day, and purported to demonstrate against its upholders that religion was common-sense and by no means unreasonably "enthusiastical," but on the contrary, only implied the carrying out consistently, in the order of grace, of principles admitted to be sensible and true in reference to the order of nature. But the element of exhortation, or of vividly picturing the Scriptural records, or the truths which they illustrate, or the grandeur of Christianity, or the horror of sin,—in short, those qualities in a sermon which appeal primarily to the emotions and imagination, are rarely to be found in his calm and carefully reasoned pages. The dramatic element—using the term in its highest sense, as meaning the conveying a lifelike picture of great facts and truths—is generally absent. The power of vividly feeling and conveying to others the pathos and significance of lessons to be learnt from the Scripture, which Newman has so pre-eminently, is mostly wanting in Butler. Newman's sermon on the "Parting of Friends," the last he preached at Littlemore, in which the parting of the Scriptural saints is dwelt on—David and Jonathan, Paul and Timothy, Paul and the rulers of the Church of Ephesus—and this on the eve of his own farewell to those who were so dear to him, a sermon which cannot even now be read by one who remembers the circumstances of the case without emotion, and of which we are told that, before it came to an end, the church resounded with the sobs of his hearers—is a great instance of this species of eloquence. Indeed, to our thinking, that great writer, who has excelled in nothing more than in the art of sermon-writing, has given in practice a better lesson as to the avoidance of the two faults of which we have spoken than any that could be conveyed by the statement of abstract principle. Dr. Pusey, judging by the volume before us, had a considerable share of Newman's power of vividly illustrating a moral lesson from his copious store of Scriptural knowledge. And there are some very beautiful thoughts to be found throughout his sermons,—thoughts which dwell in the mind, and throw real light upon the problems of life. Where he seems, to us, to fail, is in consecutiveness. Butler's strong point is Pusey's weak one. Butler gives us a calm and serious religious essay; Pusey, a series of pious thoughts, exhortations, and lessons from Scripture, the order of which might be inverted, and some of which could be omitted, without injury to the structure of the sermon. Newman seems to combine the excellencies of both. He develops his thought not exactly in finished, logical form, but by those natural stages of human reasoning of which he has spoken in the Grammar of Assent, which, as representing the force of an argument without the tediousness of its full analysis, carry conviction to his hearers without imposing too great a strain upon them; and at the same time he weaves in exhortation and Scriptural illustration in such a way as to distinguish his sermons, both in style and practical effect, from mere essays.

We select for quotation a passage from the sermon, one of the most impressive in the present volume, on "God's Presence in Loneliness":—

"The restless love [in the soul] of amusement, society, outward excitement, even reading, besides any object for itself, has mainly this, to escape being alone with its own thoughts, because there it will find God. Dull often and weary will the employment be, but, like the clay used by savages to dull the pain of hunger, it stifles in the soul the sense of the presence of him whose love it knows not. And, therefore, does God so often create in the soul a still more awful loneliness, rending from it that on which its very being hung, that at length it may learn to live alone with God, when all it loved with God is withdrawn from sight. Then in those sacred, solemn hours, if these, too, it wastes not, it learns to love and to be with him whom 'none loseth but who leaveth,' that only 'place of rest imperturbable where love is not forsaken if itself forsaketh not.' Once, brethren, at least, ye must be alone; and lonely indeed is that journey, if he be not by thee who first trod it for thee, that in it thou mightest 'fear no evil.' None else can then share thy fears; none can so speak to thy heart; none, though he would die with thee, can share thy journey with thee. Alone must each give up his spirit unto him who gave it. Oh, may it not be alone, but in union with him whose words we shall soon hear,—'Father, into thine hands I commend my spirit,' and who with his own commended ours. But will he then, indeed, be with us in death, if we be not with him in life?"

This passage, beautiful and suggestive though it is, illustrates, as it stands in its context, the criticism which we have made above. It might come anywhere in the sermon. There is nothing in the earlier part leading up to it, and there is no development of it later on. Butler would have gone on to explain that the human mind is in ordinary matters limited as to the number of objects upon which it can concentrate its attention, and that if it were supposed to be made entirely for God, there is nothing unreasonable in inferring that in proportion as we fill it with other things, we must fail, in that proportion, to be united with God; and that solitude, as implying the absence of such distracting elements, affords the best opportunity for the closest union with him.

We select another, from among the numerous striking and suggestive passages to be found throughout the volume, from the sermon entitled, "Christ's Acts of Love the Christian's Model":—

"Man mostly follows God in a perverted way. He would imitate God where God is inimitable, and not imitate God where God has formed man to imitate him. . . . Man would imitate God in his greatness, which he cannot, and does not imitate him in his goodness, which by God's grace he can. God alone, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, sufficeth for himself, and needeth nothing out of himself. God alone is, within himself, his own bliss. God alone perfectly knoweth himself, and all things and all beings. God alone is the fountain of all good. . . . In these things, man would idly and sinfully follow God. Man would be independent of God, as God is independent of all things, since all depend on him. Man would form his own happiness for himself, apart from the law, the will, the mind of God, and find his bliss in his own way, and be himself his own end, his God; as God is all things to himself. Man, again, would know all things, even what ought to be (he thinks, God forgive it!) the mind of God, what God ought to do, will, make, appoint, judge, reveal, although 'none knoweth the mind of God save the Spirit of God.' Man would judge the secrets of the heart, and pronounce on the innermost thoughts of the heart, although God only knoweth the heart, who made it. . . . And while man would thus, apart from God, be what God alone can be, he neglects to become what, through God, he may be. God of his goodness promises us his likeness, the sharing of his glory, his bliss, his knowledge, his goodness. Man would have now greatness, happiness, knowledge, glory, joy of his own, apart from God's goodness; and he will not seek that goodness which God will give his redeemed and his children, if they ask him, and will with his Spirit give them all things, be all things to them!"

MR. CARTER HALL'S REMINISCENCES.*

THE uses to which books may be applied are manifold. They may be serviceable from their folly, as well as from their wisdom. They may be instructive in a way that is by no means creditable to the writers. Mr. Hall has spent a large part of a long life in writing books, and should understand the somewhat common-place art of book-making; yet the two thick volumes which comprise the retrospect of his life must, on the whole, be pronounced a failure. The writer is upwards of fourscore, and much allowance is due to the weaknesses of old age. But beyond a few slips of memory, there is no sign here of intellectual decay. Feebleness of judgment there is, and a maundering utterance of pious twaddle, but we do not know that these defects have grown with years; and when Mr. Hall touches on a subject with which, like that of Ireland, he is really familiar, or when he describes a man he dislikes, there is no lack of such power as he possessed twenty or thirty years ago. It is, therefore, incumbent on us to treat the work as we should treat the productions of a younger man, although it is impossible to forget that the writer served his apprenticeship as a journalist more than half a century ago.

The first thing likely to strike a reader's eye is the loose way in which the different portions of the book are strung together. There is no literary form, and no sense apparently that the exercise of art is necessary. Then as we look further, we find, in the first place, a considerable amount of matter that is nearly, if not quite, irrelevant; and in the next, a great deal the insertion of which exhibits neither charity nor taste. Finally, and the observation goes to the good side of Mr. Hall's account, this accumulation of facts and opinions, written "almost entirely from memory," contains much that will amuse the idler, as well as interest the student of our social life.

Let us illustrate the favourable side of the volumes first. Mr. Hall can tell a story well; he is quick to perceive the points of contrast between the England of his early manhood and that of his old age. The author has seen a man flogged at the cart's tail, has seen a wife sold at Smithfield, and has been present at the cross-road burial of a suicide. He has often seen malefactors hanging in chains, was once present at a fatal duel, and relates that at one time a club existed in Galway to which no person was admitted who had not shot his man. "At Castlebar," he adds, "I was shown a pistol marked with seven notches,—each notch indicated that it had sent a bullet into an adversary!" Irish Judges were in the habit of fighting duels, and an officer in the Army seldom escaped from the ordeal. Of imprisonment for debt, and of the filthy condition of the prisons, dismal stories are told; and worse still, in the early years of the century, was the melancholy condition of lunatics:—

"In 1820," says Mr. Hall, "I was intimate with the superintendent of the Public Insane Asylum at Cork, and was frequently his visitor, and a witness of deeds that often made me shudder. Pass through any of the corridors, you were sure to hear the moans, sometimes the shrieks, and always the clanking chains, of the miserable prisoners who were kept in darkness and solitude as a remedy for their mental affliction, and whose appeal for mercy were heard only by the stone wall of a cell ten feet by eight. . . . A keeper, armed with a heavy whip, kept order among the miserable wretches, who in general retained just enough reason to be sensible of fear. As to consideration, sympathy, or mercy, they received none. Yet, as a rule, there was no deliberate or intentional cruelty. The brutal part of the treatment was only part of a system universally believed in."

There were grievances of another order in those days which justified the dogged exertions of men like Joseph Hume. Children of ten were sometimes officers, and in receipt of the King's pay; and a lady was once a cornet of dragoons, her commission having been dated before she was born. Mr. Hall says:

"My brother, killed at Albuera in 1811, was an officer in my father's regiment, wore regimentals, and received pay when he was eight years old. There was no discredit attached to such appointments. It was one of the colonel's 'perquisites.' The abominable practice was put a stop to by the Duke of York."

The writer does not, however, think that change has been always on the side of progress, and asks if aught has been gained by exchanging Vauxhall for those "places redolent of drink and debauchery," the London music-halls? At no period of its existence, he writes, "was the place subjected to any charge of impropriety, far less of vice. The respectable citizen took his wife and daughters to Vauxhall, without scruple or dread." We are afraid this agreeable picture of Vauxhall was not altogether a true one, even in Mr. Hall's younger days. To what uses the Gardens were sometimes turned in the last century may be seen in the Citizen of the World and in Evelina. He is right in saying that the coarse swearing once common to men of all ranks is now unheard in decent society, and under this heading the author relates a good anecdote, which he had from the late Chief Justice Doherty. It is worth quoting, although, like several stories told in these volumes, it may be already familiar to some readers:—

"I remember an anecdote of a Bishop of Cork, who, voyaging across the Channel in one of the sailing packets, was much shocked by the oaths of the captain, and from reasoning and entreaty came to somewhat angry protest. 'Ye see, my lord,' said the captain, 'unless I swear, my men won't obey me!'—'Try them,' urged the bishop; 'try them!' So the skipper at last agreed to do so; but, unknown to his lordship, he arranged a little comedy with the crew. Very soon it came on to blow fresh. 'Tom,' cried the captain, 'coil that rope.' Tom never moved, but stood chewing his quid. 'Jack, Bill, Harry,' said the skipper, 'just oblige me by taking in the top-sail.' Not a man stirred. The wind howled more and more loudly; the vessel plunged heavily through the waves. Then the skipper turned to the pale-faced bishop, who was watching the result of the experiment. 'My lord, my lord!' said he, in a terrified undertone, 'what am I to do? If my men won't obey me, we must all go to the bottom.'—'Well,' said the bishop, slowly and reluctantly, 'under the circumstances I—I think you may—swear—a little.' No sooner said than done; a volley of oaths sent Jack, Bill, and Harry aloft and about as quick as lightning; sails were furled, ropes coiled, and no more warnings against the sin of profanity were heard during that voyage at least."

In order to tell another anecdote, we may turn to a passage upon "Faction Fights in Ireland," now also among the evils of the past. The tale does not illustrate the heading, but it shows how an Irishman will sometimes use his stick from sheer love of the exercise:—

"I was visiting a magistrate in Kerry County, when a stalwart fellow was brought in a prisoner, charged with nearly killing an old, bald-headed man, whose head was a bloody mass. Being asked to swear information against the accused who had wounded him, the injured man was silent, and on being pressed absolutely refused. 'What was it this fellow did to you?' asked the magistrate.—'Nothing,' was the answer. The magistrate turned to the culprit.—'Are you not ashamed,' he said, 'to have half killed this old man, who will not even give information against you? Had you any ill-will to him?'—'Oh! none at all, your honour; I never saw him before to-day.'—'Then what made you do it?'—'Well, I'll tell yer honour God's truth. Ye see, I came late into the fair; luck was agin me, for all the fighting was over; so, as I was strutting about, looking for some boy to cross a stick wid, I saw this poor man's bald head poked out of a slit of the tent that he might cool it; and it looked so inviting that, for the sowl o' me, I couldn't help hitting the blow.'"

Ireland, we may observe, is so blent with Mr. Hall's earliest recollections, that when on Irish ground or describing Irish men, he has generally something to say that is worthy of note. If he has a humorous incident to tell, it is generally of Irish origin. Here is what Mr. Hall describes as a new story illustrative of the ready wit of the Irish:—

"Two boys were sleeping together; one was Catholic, the other Protestant. When they woke in the morning, the latter thought to get a rise of the former. 'Oh!' said the one, 'I had a horrid drame last night.'—'Well, tell it to us,' said the other.—'Well, I will,' said the Protestant boy. 'Ye see, I dreamed that I saw Purgathory opened, and all the Papists fell down into hell.'—'Och, murder!' exclaimed the Catholic boy, 'the poor Protestants,—won't they be crushed!'"

Mr. Hall's weak side is seen in his comments on the character or intellectual ability of the men whom he has known intimately or slightly. He can sometimes praise extravagantly, as in his allusion to the "glorious memory" of Jane and Anna Maria Porter, and in his estimate of Thomas Moore as "one of the best and most upright of all the men that God ennobled by the gift of genius." He can blame, too, with uncalled-for severity, as in his cruel remarks upon Landor. Mr. Hall has, of course, a right to his opinions. His criticisms, if wrong, may be honest, but he is not justified, no writer can be, in attempting to estimate a man's inner life, or pronouncing on his future state. For an illustration of this vice, the reader may turn to page 125 in the second volume of the Retrospect.

Gossip about well-known people, whether kindly or the reverse, will always allure readers, and the author's recollections are likely to secure attention. Miss Edgeworth receives nothing but praise, and deserves it. In figure she must have been as tiny as Scott's Fenella. "Travelling in a mail-coach, there was a little boy also a passenger, who, wanting to take something from the seat, asked her if she would be so kind as to stand up. 'Why, I am standing up,' she answered. The lad looked at her with astonishment, and then, realising the verity of her declaration, broke out with, 'Well, you are the very littlest lady I ever did see!'" A generous, kindly word also is given to Miss Landon, once a popular authoress, and now, unless it be for her sad fate, utterly forgotten. The Rev. Robert Montgomery, "not the poet, but the author of Satan and Woman," is said to have a place "among British poets of the century." Mr. Ainsworth, who, by the way, received a pension from the Government, is stated to have effected an enormous amount of evil, which Mr. Hall hopes was repented of before the novelist died. Then we read of Douglas Jerrold, that no one ever accused him of generosity or sympathy; of Croly, against whom there seems to be a personal feeling, that he hated his opponents with a hatred at once irrational and un-Christian; of Lady Morgan, who was "vain, gay, and charming to the last," that one evening Mrs. Hall said to her, "Why, Lady Morgan, you are really looking very well!" "No such thing, my dear," she answered, "it's the rouge, it's the rouge!" of Lady Blessington, that "God intended her to be good"; of Rogers, that his heart was shrivelled and his soul contracted,—a most unjust accusation; of Miss Martineau, that her nature was without geniality, indulgence, or mercy; of Longfellow, that his place among the poets of the century is, perhaps, next to Wordsworth; and of Coleridge, that he was among the first of talkers, and among the least of doers, a judgment which considering Coleridge's work as a poet and as a thinker, we beg leave to question. His poetry is surely immortal in its loveliness, and no man of the century has scattered more lavishly the seeds of thought. Here we must close a desultory notice of a rambling, but entertaining book. It would be easy to point out errors of quotation and slips of memory, but these are venial faults, in an author who commenced his life with the century.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Westminster Review, July. (Trübner and Co.)—The first article in this number deals with the subject of the blasphemy laws. It is temperately written, and certainly exposes various inconsistencies in legal expositions of these statutes. The conclusion to which the writer comes, that the laws should be repealed altogether, is one to which we do not feel inclined to assent. It is scarcely satisfactory to say that "no one need look at these 'blasphemous' publications unless he chooses." The writer can hardly be aware of the militant character which these attacks on Christian belief have assumed. They are literally "offensive." They are not things which can be ignored. They make themselves felt just as blows are felt. There is an interesting retrospect of the Corn-Law-Repeal movement, and an article, written from the point of view of a person acquainted with the subject, on "Compulsory Compensation for Agricultural Improvements." The other articles are "Lord Chancellor Hatherley," "Classic Conceptions of Heaven and Hell," "Wallenstein in the Drama," while, in the "independent section," the subject of the "Payment of Members and Colonial Corruption" is discussed.

The Magazine of Art.—The frontispiece of this number is Mr. Val Prinsep's "At the Golden Gate," and there is a sketch of the artist's career, containing, by the way, some curious information about the birthplaces of some of our most eminent painters. Another famous Academy picture is Mr. Alma Tadema's "Way to the Temple;" this seems to lose more even than engravings commonly lose from the absence of the brilliant colour. Mr. St. John Tyrwhitt's "Craven and the Dales" is an interesting account of picturesque country, illustrated with some attractive sketches by Mr. W. H. J. Boot. There are some striking illustrations of interior and furniture from Dorchester House. Among the other articles which make up a good number may be mentioned an account of "Later Gothic Glass in England." We notice a curious misprint in the table of contents,— "All Saints, Oxford," for "All Saints, York." "Gothic glass" in Dean Aldrich's classic church would be a curiosity indeed.—Colburn's United Service Magazine (Simpkin and Marshall) does good service by its articles on "Money's Worth in Our Army." The list of offices, which in some cases must be very nearly sinecures, in the department of "Stores" is quite surprising. The "Historical Records of the Household Cavalry" contains some interesting details about the services of the corps at Waterloo, particularly appropriate, now that they have won fresh laurels in Egypt; but surely the private scandals which are mentioned might have been very well omitted. There is nothing "historical" about them. "Navies of the World" supplies us with details about the Turkish Fleet.—Harper's Monthly Magazine (Sampson Low and Co.) gives us sundry readable articles. "The Heart of the Alleghanies" is very prettily illustrated with wood and river scenes; and there is a pleasant narrative of personal experiences of travel, under the title of "The Canadian Habitant." The visitor from the States seems to have been very favourably impressed by the simplicity, integrity, and kindly temper of the French Canadian. He sees in his family circle "an atmosphere of virtue, courtesy, quietness, contentment; but you miss very sadly even a spark of intellectual light, or a suggestion of the possibility of progress." "The British Yoke" reviews the insane proceedings of the British Government with respect to their American Colonies; and there are some lively sketches of French military men and things, from the pen and pencil of Mr. R. F. Zogbaum.

We are glad to see that there has been sufficient appreciation on the part of the public for a poem that, though not of the first rank, is one of the noteworthy productions of this generation, as to call for a new edition of Ranolf and Amohia; a Dream of Two Lives. 2 vols. By Alfred Domett. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.) There is much in Mr. Domett's philosophy and creed, or, perhaps, we should rather say, negation of creed, with which we cannot agree, but we willingly recognise the elements of thoughtfulness and beauty that are to be found in this work. Ranolf and Amohia wants compression, for it can hardly claim to occupy a space not far short of the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey" combined. It has some tedious and prosaic passages; but it has made for itself, we should say, a distinct place in the literature of the day. Of this, however, we have spoken before. Let it suffice, on the present occasion, to welcome its reappearance, and to give readers who may not be acquainted with it a specimen. The poet, in his concluding canto, is combating the theory that man is a creature of chance:—

"What! shall the very winds of heaven that rise,
And sink, and run their seeming reckless round,
Like Tartar cavalry scouring the wide skies,
Intractable and trackless! shall all these,
And every stern that tears the limitless seas,
Ranging the ocean's amplitude, be found
Obedient to fixed Law, to Order bound?—
Shall all that shifting, swift Aurora-dance,
Those phantom revels round the secret Poles,
Be set to God-made music that controls
And bids each brilliant spasm up-leap and glance,
By happy rule, harmonious governance;
Yet this,—Humanity's abounding Mould,
The ever-active matrix manifold
Of Spirit, restless round Earth's millions rolled,
This vast machinery for making Souls,
Be but chaotic Force, the child of Chance?"

Register of Merchant Taylors' School. By the Rev. Charles J. Robinson. Vol. I. (Farncombe and Co., Lewes.)—Merchant Taylors' School possesses a register of scholars admitted which is almost complete since the foundation, in 1561. Mr. Robinson has had the public spirit to publish this register, adding notes to all the names about which he has been able to discover anything. He has thus done good service, not only to old scholars of the school, but to all interested in historical and genealogical study, and we sincerely hope that he will be repaid, if not for his trouble, for this can hardly be hoped, yet for his outlay. The first volume (the only one yet published) begins with a brief historical sketch of the Head Masters. These gentlemen seem, in the earlier days of the school, to have had a somewhat stormy life. William Hayne, the fourth in the list, was removed. William Staple, the seventh, resigned, "for fear of a Parliamentary Committee." William Dugard, his successor, was removed in February, 1649, restored in September of the following year, and then again removed in 1661. During his deprivation, in 1649-50, his office was held by a certain John Stevens; and Dugard celebrated his return by the following epigram, which he wrote in the "Probation" book:—

"Dugardum sequitur Stephanus, Stephanumque vicissim Dugardus: sortes versat utriusque Deus."

Much sympathy seems to have followed Dugard on his second removal. He opened a private school in the neighbourhood ("privatam scholam, in vico vulgo dicto Coleman Street, aperui," he says). Into that school, between July, 1661, and September, 1662, when he died, he admitted no less than 277 boys. His successor, John Wood, was not happy in his place. "He quitted his office, for suspicions of being inclined to the Romish Communion." Ambrose Berwicke, who was next but one to him in succession, was removed for Nonjuring scruples. In the first two hundred years, there are sixteen names of Head Masters; in the next one hundred and twenty, not more than six. In the register of scholars, the first name is Edmund Spenser. Among those that follow are not a few curiosities,—Palaeologus, for instance, and Terrabosco. Under the year 1648, we have the unusual phenomenon of a triple Christian name, "Anastasius Cotton Jackson Lightfoot." There is a strange, dark entry, "John Brand, only son of John, Merchant Taylor, b. at Thurlstone, co. Leic., May, 1638;" and the same name, with another date, "May 29, 1639." To both Dugard appends the note, under the same date, "tabe confectus, vitam cum morte commutavit." Some of Dugard's Latin renderings of modern trades are amusing. "Glover" is chirothecarius; "basket-maker" is victor; "dancing-master," tripudarius; "ostler," stabulo; "om-broiderer," plumarius; and "fishmonger," strangely enough, piscinarius. On the departure of a promising scholar, as we may conjecture, he enters the sarcastic note, "Scholae valedixit, mercatori protinus sese in servitutum dicaturns." It is interesting to observe the effect of the Great Plague on the entries. Under June, 1665, there are but fifteen names, and the usual September list is wanting altogether. Among the June fifteen is the name of "Titus Oates." "A contemporary MS. note in the Probation-book calls him, 'The Saviour of the nation, first discoverer of that damnable, hellish, Popish plot, in 1678.' In another and later handwriting, is added, 'Perjured upon record, and a scoundrel fellow.'"

The Senior Songman. By the Author of "St. Olave's," &c. 3 vols. (Hurst and Blackett.)—This story is of slender material, as this writer's stories are now apt to be, but it is well told. One of the singers in Crawlborough Minster (not a very happy name, we are inclined to think) has loved in his youth an Italian girl. She leaves him for a richer suitor. He takes her daughter to his home, and she also leaves him, not for love's sake, but for fame. Beyond this there is very little incident, though there is a secret, which, however, is no secret at all, about the daughter's birth. There is pathos in the tale, though we get a little wearied of the reiteration, somewhat in Dickens's later manner, of the same point. But there are mechanical defects in the story, which detract from the pleasure of reading it. The desertion of Nanni the elder should hardly have been put so many years after the visit to Italy. She must have been then over thirty, and sympathy is checked by the reflection that a woman of that age ought to have been able to take care of herself. Then there is a difficulty about the age of Dean Barbegan. He is five-and-thirty when the "Senior Songman" is a "little lad," say of ten. When the hero is thirty-seven he is still Dean, and presumably above sixty. Nanni the second now comes upon the scene, an infant of three months. She grows to be seventeen, when she leaves Crawlborough, to win money and fame as a singer. This brings our Dean very nearly to eighty. Another year elapses, and the secret of Nanni's parentage is made known. And then Dr. Barbegan is promoted to a better Deanery in a southern county. Surely this promotion came a little late. We may ask, too, whether a writer versed in cathedral matters should speak of the minor canon and the vicar-choral, as if these officials were unique in the cathedral body? And why is the church sometimes a "minster," and sometimes a "cathedral"?

Hymni Usitati Latine Redditi. By James Anthony Lawson, LL.D. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—Most of these hymns are rendered into classical metres; some are put into the more usual form of rhymed verse. We must own to a preference for the second course, chiefly for this reason, that classical forms seem to demand strictly classical language, and this it is very difficult to apply consistently in these versions. But Mr. Justice Lawson is certainly happier in his classical than in his mediæval efforts. We cannot find much melody in this version of the first stanza of "The Son of God goes forth to War":—

"Deus-homo, bellum gesturus, [presumably, "gesturus,"]
Egreditur triumphaturus,
Coronam regiam sumpturus:
Præcedit illum
Rubrum vexillum,— Quis comitatur Dominum?
Qui plenum poculum mæroris
Exhaust, patiens doloris,
Et crucem sustinet, amoris
Divini signum,
Salutis lignum,—
Is comitatur Dominum."

In others we find many imperfect rhymes,—"reatum, paratam," "inquinatus, cruentatas," "mansurum, naturam," "refugit, loget," "cruciatum, firmitatem." Has the writer any authority for ezortura, and for reclino in an intransitive usage, or for the archaic form moriri in an alcaic? Of course, obserit, in xv., 18, is meant for "obserat." But it would be ungracious to do nothing more than pick holes in what is an elegant and scholarly performance, worthy of its distinguished author. Here is the version of "Lo! He comes, with clouds descending":—

"En! ipse vectus nubibus advenit,
Occisus olim, nobilis hostia,
Pro stirpe Adami: nunc redempti
Millibus innumeris triumphum
Augent sequentes; regna labantia
Mundi recedunt, ipse regit Deus,
Diraque maiestate cinctus
Ante oculos manifestus ardet;
Christum probræ qui dederant neq,
Ausi sacram illudere victimam,
Illi gementes, nunc eundem
Conspiciunt solio sedentem.
Sperata dudum nunc oritur dies,
Superne tandem deveniens, suæ
Ad cœrula arreptos per auram
Exciipiet Dominus Redemptor.
En! Alleluia, læta dies adest,
Amen! per orbem laudibus efferant
Gentes, sedentem sempiterno
In solio Dominum per ævum.
Salvator, assume imperium Tuum,
Regniq; habenas iam Tibi debitas;
Optate tantum, ne moreris,
O Deus! O Domine, advenito!"

Rambla—Spain. By the Author of "Other Countries." (Sampson Low and Co.)—The author has not much to tell us about Spain. How can any traveller have much who, as is ingenuously confessed in this volume, does not know anything about the language? His most novel observation, as far as our experience goes, is that there is a great deal of noise in Spain, more noise, one would think, than is in proportion to the industry of the country. Still, the volume is quite readable. The author writes pleasantly, has a certain power of good-humoured observation, and comments and moralises with fairness and good-sense.

On Blue Water. By J. F. Keane. (Tinsley Brothers.)—"Blue water" is the water that we meet with some three or four hundred miles from land, where the depth is not less than a hundred fathoms. The most remarkable of the experiences which Mr. Keane has to relate concerns sharks, animals of which he seems to have a mean opinion. He gives us an account of some elaborate tackle contrived by himself for the capture of these monsters, and adds some very horrible details, which might, we think, have been very well spared, as to the cruelties—and we quite agree with our author that we may be cruel even to sharks—that are sometimes practised upon them. We have also some incidents of sport, or rather holiday-making, in the Sunderbunds, and a strange account of life on board an American merchantman. Mr. Keane thinks, and is doubtless right in thinking, that there are many things which might be altered for the better in our shipping arrangements; the legal scale of provisions, for instance, he says, is but just enough to keep a man alive. But the system cannot be so very bad, considering that we contrive, somehow, to do so large a portion of the carrying trade of the world. Mr. Keane's book, though it scarcely contains matter proportionate to its size, is always readable, and sometimes more.

Flosculi Graeci Boreales; sive Anthologia Graeca Aberdoniensis. Contextit Gulielmus D. Geddes. (Macmillan.)—This is a collection of Greek verse, chiefly iambic translations from English dramatists, which Professor Geddes has collected and edited, and to which he has himself made a very considerable contribution. There is much elegant work in it, and we especially welcome its appearance, in these days of "rebuke and blasphemy," when men do not scruple to speak light of an accomplishment which our fathers, perhaps going a little to the other extreme, thought a sufficient qualification for a bishop. We give a specimen, not of the iambs, but of a less common metre. It is the last stanza of "A Man's a Man for a' That." We give the English, which every one may not remember:—

"Then let us pray that come it may,
As come it will for a' that,
That sense and worth o'er a' the earth
May bear the gree, an' a' that!
For a' that, an' a' that,
It's comin' yet, for a' that,
That man to man, the world o'er,
Shall brothers be, for a' that:"

"Εὐχόμεθ' ὅν ταχ' ἦκειν
καὶ γὰρ σαφέσταθ' ἔξει, χρόνον τὸν εὐπρόσθιτον, ὅτε πανταχοῦ τὸ κύδος
σοφῆς δίκῃ τ' ἀρείται.
ἀπόλοιτο δ' αὐτόπρεμνα
ἔρις, φθόνος, σκότος τε, ὅμως δὲ πανταχοῦ γῆς
ἄνθρωπον ὡς ἀδελφόν
ἄνθρωπος ἀσπάζεταιτο."

Emanuel Swedenborg: the Man and his Works. By Edmund Swift, Junior. (James Speirs.)—We cannot find that Mr. Swift tells us anything that is new about Swedenborg; but he brings into prominence some facts that are not sufficiently borne in mind, when the character of the man is to be estimated. The common idea of him is included in the one statement that he was a visionary. But it is forgotten that till he was nearly sixty years of age, he was known as an acute man of business, and one who had studied science with very considerable success. It is this scientific eminence of his—and in this respect he was much in advance of his age, anticipating in outline some of the discoveries of modern times—that makes his attitude as a seer all the more remarkable. There is nothing that we can remember quite like it in the history of the human mind. Of course, there is the resource of saying that in his latter years he was deranged. But of this derangement there is no kind of evidence. On the contrary, there is very strong testimony to the fact of his complete sanity. "Never," says one who seems to have been a competent witness, "did he manifest during his whole life the slightest symptom of aberration." Still, the difficulty of classing his mind remains. It must be confessed, indeed, that his habit of interspersing his "personal narrations," i.e., descriptions of his interviews with spirits, good and bad, among his books of exegesis and speculation, produces an impression of strangeness that it is difficult to reconcile with the idea of perfect soundness of mind. Whether he was possessed of this or no, it is certain that in sanctity of life, unselfishness, and complete devotion to duty, he was quite admirable. Mr. Swift's book, though not very attractive in style, may be useful as an introduction to those who know nothing of Swedenborg. He is certainly a phenomenon worth studying.

Sermons. By the late Rev. H. R. Huckin, D.D. (Bemrose and Sons.)—We are glad to welcome this memorial of the life and work of a good and able man, who was cut off in the very prime of his life. Dr.

Huckin, without possessing great abilities or learning, had just that practical power and aptitude in bringing his knowledge to bear on what was in hand that makes a good schoolmaster. The school in whose service he died, when little more than forty years of age, will not soon forget him; while his friends will cherish the memory of a thoroughly genuine man. And these sermons, mostly preached in the chapel of Repton School, are not unworthy of him. They are published just as he left them. He might have elaborated them more, it may be, had he lived to correct them; but they are not the less interesting, because we see them just as they came from his mind. The first sermon, on "Unity," is especially good; it dwells, among other things, on the ideal of a school, and in thoughtfulness and power it rises to and maintains a very high level. Here is a fine passage:—

"You must idealise your school, if you are to feel the emotion of public spirit, which at once can make you a blessing to the place, and the place a blessing to you. You are members of a visible body, but the visible body is but a collection of isolated members, until it is animated with the one impulse which gives it life. It is only when the life-giving spirit, call it by what name you will, loyalty, enthusiasm, patriotism, the consciousness of a great work to be done, a great contest to be waged, a great victory to be won, is breathed into the members, that a school becomes a living thing. And you must rise to this conception; you must shake off selfish aims, put away base, mean, ungenerous feelings, before you can make out of the school that which it ought to be. It is one of the unrealised functions of the imagination to create the truest and most abiding realities."

The fourth sermon, again, on "Unconscious Sin," is full of a very powerful, if somewhat sombre, eloquence. "Absalom," again, is made the subject of an excellent discourse to boys. For its own sake, as well as for the sake of its writer, this is a book to be valued.

Like Ships upon the Sea. By Frances Eleanor Trollope. 2 vols. (Chapman and Hall.)—Journalism, commercial speculation, and politics, as these pursuits are followed in Rome, form the main subject of Mrs. Trollope's novel. We cannot pretend to judge of her descriptions, further than to say that they make very lively reading. The thread of the story to which these descriptions are attached is but slight. A young English girl goes over to Rome, and falls in love with an Italian officer, a young fellow with some good in him, but of doubtful principles, whom she invests with all the virtues under the sun. He is as genuinely attached to her as his nature permits. Anxious to acquire means sufficient to make marriage possible, he involves himself in speculations, which turn out as such things commonly do. Hence a catastrophe, which the reader may discover for himself. Mario Masi—that is the hero's name—is a well-drawn character. The heroine is somewhat colourless. But the best thing in the book, in our judgment, is a personage who comes upon the scene somewhat late, and plays a humble part, but whom we are always glad to see. This is Kitty Low, whom we may describe as one of the Poyser race. Mrs. Trollope has a decided gift for saying smart things, and things, too, that are better than smart; and Kitty Low is a very convenient mouthpiece, when it is not suitable for her to say them in her own person. How true is the following, as a description of two ways of regarding life!—"The Signora liked the poor, misguided Captain, and was kind to him. And besides, she has not got her mind so full of the right and wrong of it as we have. She looks at human beings more as we look at weather,—something that must be taken as it is, and can't be mended." Here are some things of Mrs. Trollope's own:—"His credulity did not extend to dogmas which implied restraining rules of conduct, but it was wide and easy for superstitious and hopeful chances." "These Englishwomen seemed to him to possess that charm of helplessness and inexperience which so endear women to the men who are not called to take care of them through life." And this, à propos of advertisements:—"Advertisements are to modern journalism what gunpowder is to artillery. Your thunderous leading article may be a very heavy projectile, but it is the expansive force of the patent-medicine vendor, the auctioneer, and the silk mercer, that makes it travel."

We have received:—London in 1883, by Herbert Fry, the third annual issue of a handy and useful guide to the metropolis; Academy Sketches, 1883, edited by Henry Blackburn. (Allen and Co.)—Volume III. of A Dictionary of Music and Musicians, A.D. 1540-1883; "Sketches" to "Samer is ionmen in." (Macmillan.)—Johnston's new Map of South Africa, mounted on linen, with index, and neatly bound in cloth.—The Handbook of Jamaica, published by authority, and compiled from official sources by A. C. Sinclair and L. R. Fyfe. (E. Stanford.)—Health in Schools, being an addition to the series of "Health Primers" issued by D. Bogue.—Stepping-stones to Thrift. (Ward, Lock, and Co.)—Needlework and Cutting-out, by Kate Stanley, F.R.B.S. (E. Stanford.)—Home Nursing and Sick-room Appliances, by E. C. C. Lückes. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—Guide to the Isle of Thanet. (Hutchings and Crowley.)

MAGAZINES, &c.—We have received the following for August:—L'Art.—Art and Letters, which opens with the first of a series of papers on "Bookbinding."—Part 10 of Greater London.—Journal of the Statistical Society.—Army and Navy Magazine.—Nautical Magazine.—Pitman's Shorthand Magazine.—The Sanitary Record.—Tinsley's Magazine, and its summer number.—London Society.—Chambers's Journal.—Cassell's Magazine.—Good Words.—All the Year Round, containing the opening chapters of a new serial story by Theo. Gift.—The Leisure Hour and the Girls' Own Paper.—The Sunday at Home, in which a new serial story, by M. M. Pollard, is commenced.—Letts's Household Magazine.—No. 3 of the new series of Africa.—Friendly Greetings.—The Ladies' Gazette of Fashion.—The Ladies' Treasury.—The North-American Review.—The Atlantic Monthly.

We have received a number of penny Guides to The Rhine, The Channel Islands, The Isle of Man, &c. (F. E. Longley), which are undoubtedly cheap and portable, for they do not weigh more than an ounce each. In the same connection, we acknowledge the receipt of Holidays in Holland, A Trip to the Ardennes, and The Moselle, three additions to the clearly-printed and well-illustrated series of penny holiday guide-books edited by Percy Lindley.

The popularity Pepsine has acquired as almost a specific for chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, &c., is due to the fact that it is the nearest possible production of the active principle of the gastric juice of the stomach. Unfortunately, like all other imitations of a like nature, Pepsine has been not slightly discredited by the spurious manufactures that have been issued from time to time; it is therefore necessary as a guarantee of its efficacy to see that each bottle bears the maker's name.

SPECTACLES V. BLINDNESS.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection generally employed by the mere vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDIOT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." The Rev. Professor W. A. Hale, M.A. Cantab., 2 Minford Gardens, West Kensington Park, writes:—"The Spectacles are perfect, and a most decided boon. I had occasion on Monday to write to Lord —, and took the opportunity to mention your name, and the wonderful power of your Spectacles." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age (82). I can now read the smallest type, although suffering from cataract on the right eye." Testimonials from Earl and Countess Lindsay; F. D. Dixon Hartland, Esq., M.P.; the Venerable Archdeacon Palmer, Clifton; Rev. Mother Abbess, St. Mary's Abbey, Mill Hill, Hendon; C. J. Alford, Esq., Gas Light and Coke Company, Horseferry Road, Westminster, &c. Mr. HENRY LAURANCE, F.S.S., Oculist Optician, 39 OLD BOND STREET, W. NEWS OF THE WEEK.

A VERY disheartening and discreditable scene took place in the House of Commons on Monday night, in a discussion on the charges for criminal prosecutions in Ireland. The Irish party, headed by Mr. Healy, while protesting that they did not in the least wish to express sympathy with crime, made a violent attack on the Irish Administration for its prosecutions of criminals, making every individual case in which crime had been detected and punished to which they alluded at all, the subject of violent accusations that the Crimes Act had been used to oppress the innocent and to restrict the liberty of the poor. Mr. Healy spoke of the war between tenant and landlord—including, apparently, assassinations—as civil war for which an "amnesty" ought to be proclaimed; Mr. Harrington declared that "perfect knowledge" of Myles Joyce's innocence was in the hands of the Lord-Lieutenant when he ordered his execution,—"perfect knowledge" being altered, on the expostulation of the Chairman of Committees, into "perfect evidence," if the Lord-Lieutenant had chosen to avail himself of it; Mr. O'Brien said that "in the opinion of nine Irishmen out of every ten," the system of criminal prosecutions in Ireland,—which he described as "infamous,"—was "responsible for the greater number of crimes committed last winter,"—which only shows, if it be true, that that system must have been greatly ameliorated, since the number of crimes committed last winter was so very much smaller than the number committed in the winter previous. Further, Mr. Healy called Mr. George Bolton, the Crown Solicitor in Dublin, "the most blackguard and profligate ruffian in the service of the Crown," and after Mr. Bolton had been most effectively defended by Mr. Gibson, Mr. T. P. O'Connor said that the impression produced in Ireland was that a Court of Justice was being degraded to the position of a Ribbon lodge. But, so far as we can follow Mr. T. P. O'Connor's opinions, that, so far from being a degradation of a Court of Justice, would, in his eyes, be a great feather in its cap.

The saddest part of the exhibition, however, was Mr. Parnell's speech. After Mr. Trevelyan had pointed out in a very able speech that what incensed the Irish party was the successful detection of crime at all, and that in the first ten cases of that detection, capital punishment had been inflicted not for offences against the rich, but for the most horrible outrages on the poor, Mr. Parnell accused Mr. Trevelyan of being almost as bad as Mr. Forster,—a recognised Irish formula for exciting odium against any statesman,—and went on to assert that the Crimes Act, so far from being used to protect the poor, had been used for "the unexampled oppression of the humble people of the country." And, unfortunately, Mr. Parnell's words are taken seriously as gospel truth in Ireland,—one of the most melancholy instances of the strong delusion under which whole peoples labour, which modern history can produce.

Mr. Childers's National Debt Bill passed through Committee on Monday, the Irish party showing a certain unexpected favour towards it, on the very same night on which they had made so grave an attack on the Irish Government. Sir J. McKenna, who evidently wished to defeat the Bill, was ostentatiously deserted by the Irish party. This Bill is a real legislative gain of the first class, and renders the discharge of one of the nation's first duties pretty safe. We owe the Government hearty thanks for it.

The Bankruptcy Bill was read a third time in the House of Commons on Tuesday, amidst something like general acclamation as to the ability shown by Mr. Chamberlain in his conduct of the Bill though the Grand Committee. Mr. Dillwyn especially, who had not been sanguine as to the working of the Grand Committees, expressed, in the most cordial manner, his pleasure at the success of this Bill, and the hope which it raised in him of the utility of these Grand Committees. All that has been said of Mr. Chamberlain's lucidity and tact in the manipulation of this Bankruptcy Bill is fully deserved. At the same time, it must be admitted that he had a very much easier task to achieve than that of Sir Henry James in the Grand Committee on Law. It was different in this way. In the Grand Committee on Trade were gathered a number of men who really desired to have this particular experiment tried for the benefit of trade. They desired this in their own interest, and desired it much more than they desired to gain repute as critics of a Bankruptcy measure. On the other hand, in the Grand Committee on Law were assembled a number of lawyers who cared exceedingly little whether a special penal code were enacted this year or next year, or not at all. Their interests were not involved in either carrying it or rejecting it. But it was for the interest of a great many of them to get a name for acute and successful legal criticism, and hence, to some extent, Sir Henry James's failure. By all accounts, Sir Henry James showed hardly less tact and temper than Mr. Chamberlain; but he had a very much less tractable body of colleagues.

The Spanish military risings have come to nothing,—though it is said that they have occurred at many more places than have been reported,—and it is now asserted that they were the consequences of a hybrid plot in France,—half Republican, half Stock-Exchange,—which was got up for the purpose of combining Stock-Exchange gambling with Republican propagandism. What some of the Spanish journals assert is that £30,000 sterling was subscribed in Paris for the purpose of tampering with Spanish regiments supposed to be disaffected, and so creating a pronunciamiento against the Alfonsist dynasty. Señor Ruiz Zorrilla, whose name was used for the purpose of exciting Republican feeling, has, it is declared, been made a tool of by the Stock-Exchange gamblers of the neighbouring Republic, and the opposition journals in Spain are very indignant with the Ministry for their want of vigilance in the matter, and their failure to denounce the French meddlers. As yet, these rumours are vague and unverified; but certainly the sporadic military risings, destitute, as they have been, of tenacity and zeal, do look more like a bribed and spurious disaffection than genuine sedition,—though it is clear enough that Alfonso has as yet obtained no strong hold on the loyalty of his army. Probably there is a good deal of semi-brigandage still prevalent in Spain. We observe that a train between Barcelona and Granoller was stopped and pillaged on Tuesday by only thirty armed men. That does not look like a political rising, but does look like a fresh access of craving for the old, loose, adventurous brigandage.

Nothing has come out yet as to the nature of Admiral Pierre's arbitrary proceedings at Tamatave, or of the demands made on the French Government by Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet.

The letters from Tamatave seem to show that there was very great irritation on the part of the English there at the high-handedness of the French commander, and it is clear that in denying Mrs. Shaw,—who only reached Tamatave to find her husband in arrest,—the opportunity even of speaking a few words to him from a boat alongside of the French man-of-war, Admiral Pierre acted with unnecessary harshness. Still, there is, we hope, no chance of any international misunderstanding, and the British Government are wise in not making any detailed statement to Parliament on the subject, while negotiations are still going on between them and France. It would be hardly possible to make such a statement without irritating English feeling, and if English feeling were once irritated, it would be hardly possible for the Government of France to make reparation without seeming to the sensitive French people to be yielding to threats.

The latest news from Anam appeared to point to the intention of the French force there to make an attack on the capital, Hué, capture it, and set up some ruler who would favour the French alliance, and be virtually a puppet in French hands. The story goes that Hué is to be attacked about the 20th inst., the Admiral sending gunboats of light draft over the river bar to assist the French forces against the capital of Anam, which, according to the rumour in question, has no real power of resistance. If this be the intention of the French commanders, no doubt they hope to get the Chinese Government to recognise the Sovereign whom France may choose, and to invest him with authority from Peking. That is a very pleasant dream to indulge, but the Chinese Government is not quite wax in the hands of imperious foreigners, and we shall be much surprised if the French diplomacy should succeed. If it fails, it will be almost impossible for the French nominee to secure the allegiance of the Anamites without a regular French conquest of the whole country.

On Friday week, Lord Fortescue asked a remarkable question. He inquired of the Government, in the House of Lords, whether they would consider the practicability of introducing into the Agricultural Holdings Bill some provision for alleviating the great hardship suffered by the family of any clergyman, "if he died while occupying his glebe, as many clergymen had latterly found themselves reluctantly compelled to do." Amidst shouts of laughter, Lord Carlingford replied that he believed he understood Lord Fortescue's drift,—i.e., we suppose, that the excellent though ungrammatical Earl had intended to indicate the reluctance with which the clergyman had undertaken to farm his own glebe, not, as his words said, the reluctance with which he found himself compelled to die,—but that it was impossible to introduce into a Bill intended to give tenants compensation for their improvements, provisions for alleviating the difficulties of freeholders,—which, of course, all clergymen are in relation to their own glebe lands; when they cultivate those lands themselves. So poor Lord Fortescue was "reluctantly compelled" to take nothing but the shout of laughter for his pains.

On Friday week, also, the English Agricultural Holdings Bill passed through Committee in the Lords with a few inconsiderable amendments, mischievous in temper rather than important in effect,—amendments calculated to take off all the grace of the measure, if this very mild measure can be considered likely to be credited with any grace by the tenant-farmers even in the shape in which it first went up to the House of Lords. We have discussed the few amendments insisted on by Lord Salisbury elsewhere, and indicated how petty the spirit seems to have been in which they were passed. But we cannot honestly say that even if all of them were agreed to by the Commons,—which they certainly will not be,—they would, if properly dealt with by the administrators of the measure, greatly affect the value of the Bill. It is rather as indicating a wish to press every legal advantage against the tenants,—and therefore as imposing on the valuers a landlord's bias,—than as weighty amendments in themselves, that the mischief of these petty incisions in the measure consists. On Monday, the Scotch Agricultural Holdings Bill was treated by their Lordships in much the same fashion, the Duke of Argyll being the leading Tory of the day, and displaying what he is said to have himself spoken of as "a cordial reluctance" to accept the spirit of the Bill.

Mr. Forster attended on Wednesday the inaugural banquet of the Stonehouse Liberal Association, which has been formed to promote the candidature of his son, Mr. Arnold Forster, and Mr. Medley, for Devonport at the next election. Mr. Forster had to answer for both Houses of Parliament, and seized the occasion to exhort the House of Lords to such a change in its policy as would render it possible for a Liberal Government to introduce measures into the Upper House without thereby endangering the chance of their passing the Lower House. Speaking of Lord Granville's pluck in leading the House of Lords with a majority against him, he told a story of Lord Granville's school days, when he had to fight a much bigger boy than himself. He knew there was no chance for him eventually, but he also knew that if he could keep up the fight, however often he was knocked down, till the bell rang for school, he should not be regarded as actually beaten. So he kept up the fight till the bell rang, though repeatedly knocked down, and was not actually beaten. That, said Mr. Forster, was exactly what Lord Granville has to do now in the House of Lords. He is constantly knocked over, but he keeps up the fight till the bell rings and wakes up public feeling, and so he is never "actually beaten." As to the House of Commons, Mr. Forster was by no means despondent. He believed heartily in the expedient of division of labour amongst Committees, and was not disposed to admit that the House of Commons was losing influence in the country. Whatever may be the case as to the London Press, there never was a time, he said, when so much space was given in provincial journals to the debates in the Commons, as at present.

In the evening meeting, Mr. Forster spoke again in support of a resolution expressing confidence in the Government, and devoted his speech chiefly to the coming Reform Bill, its dangers and its safeguards. He was in favour of grouping the smaller boroughs, rather than disfranchising them, and of separating the constituencies as much as possible into constituencies with only one Member each, instead of applying what is called the minority principle to constituencies with three and four Members. Mr. Forster thought that the great dangers of democracy in England, were the too hasty formation of an impulsive opinion, and the mischievous power of wire-pullers such as control the elections in the United States. He would do all in his power to prevent public opinion taking final action too rapidly, and he would do all in his power to prevent politics becoming in any sense a business,—and therefore he opposed the payment of Members, except, indeed, such payment of Members as constituencies, to their great honour, contrive to effect for themselves, when they happen to know good and able men who could not, without some payment, afford to go into Parliament. The speech was a very thoughtful and sagacious one, and will do something, we hope, towards converting Devonport to Liberalism at the next election.

Mr. Forster made a very striking speech at Devonport on Thursday, in which he heartily supported not only the present Administration, but the present Administration of Ireland, as one that had made very great changes for the better even since his own resignation of office. He spoke with great cordiality of Mr. Trevelyan's Tramways and Emigration Bill, and even of the experiment in "migration," as an experiment that ought to be tried, though he did not ignore its great difficulties. Mr. Forster ridiculed the idea of looking for "gratitude" from Ireland. The Land Act was not a measure for which gratitude should be expected. It was simply a measure of justice. Of disunion between Ireland and England, Mr. Forster spoke as of an all but absolute impossibility.

The choleraic epidemic is now declining rapidly in Egypt, unless it be at Alexandria, where it appears to have reached its worst on Monday or Tuesday. In an important letter written to Wednesday's Times, by Dr. Mouat, the eminent Anglo-Indian physician, that high authority on all Asiatic diseases supports the view thrown out five weeks ago in these columns, that the epidemic in Egypt, though of a choleraic type, is not genuine Asiatic cholera, but a species of remittent choleraic fever resembling it in many of its symptoms, though it requires a somewhat different mode of treatment, and runs a distinct course. Dr. Mouat believes it to be absolutely certain that it has not been imported from India, and that it is endemic in Egypt and of a malarious character, due probably to the filth and bad drainage of the Egyptian towns. He says that he never knew cholera when brought from India, of which he has watched many instances in three separate voyages of his own, fail to disappear at sea.

He has studied Asiatic cholera in Paris, in London, and in Alexandria, and wherever it breaks out it is always absolutely the same. Dr. Mout has no expectation that this epidemic will visit Europe.

Talking of cholera, it ought, perhaps, to be more generally known than it is that a great many patients have been cured after passing into the apparently hopeless condition which is spoken of as "collapse." Dr. T. M. Lownds, a retired Indian Surgeon-Major of the Bombay Army, who had had many opportunities of treating cholera of the worst type in India, has shown, in a little paper published in the Edinburgh Medical Journal for November, 1881, that cholera patients in collapse, if fed with Liebig's raw soup, which passes into the blood without digestion and therefore without making any demands on the digestive system, may be cured even when collapse has apparently set in for an hour or two before the raw soup is given. Treated thus, the collapse disappears, though the disease often runs on for two or three days more, the collapse being really due to inanition.

There seems to be no doubt at all that Cetewayo is alive and recovering, and we now hear that Usibepu, after defeating Cetewayo, has in his turn been heavily defeated by the Usutus, in a pitched battle lasting two days, and accompanied by great slaughter. The Usutus side with Cetewayo. Usibepu is said to have escaped on horseback and asked assistance of John Dunn, who refused, however, to be in any way identified with a losing cause. Cetewayo, therefore, may have returned not only to life, but to influence.

The Benefit Penny Bank, 17 Bloomsbury Street, which was alleged to have a guarantee fund of £20,000, fully subscribed, and exclusively applicable for the protection of depositors, has been the subject of a sort of riot this week, in consequence of the failure of the depositors to recover their deposits, when they went to demand them. It was stated that the Penny Bank had transferred its deposits to the City and Provincial Bank, and a circular was issued by the former bank, stating that as all the depositors had applied at once, and as their balance was only recoverable by weekly instalments, the depositors could only be paid in the same way. The depositors, who had counted on the £20,000 guarantee fund, and who did not like the prospect of repayment by weekly instalments, invaded the empty bank on Wednesday and wrecked it,—a somewhat useless display of wrath. But it seems certain that if Penny Banks stop payment, there will be a good deal less patience and long-suffering amongst their creditors than there has usually been amongst creditors of Banks of a higher class. A really popular constituency would be very much inclined to inflict capital punishment for the defalcations of those who make away with their property, instead of such comparatively mild measures as our Bankruptcy law authorises.

We are glad to hear that Lord Lynton has given notice that he will call the attention of the House of Commons early next Session to the power of sale exercised by the Crown over foreshores, manors, and moorlands, and to move a resolution, which resolution will, of course, be one conceived in the general sense of our own remarks on the Southport foreshore case, and on the Esher Common case. The officialism of the subordinate members even of a Liberal Government is, as we remarked last week, becoming so dangerous to the rights of the people in these various open spaces which are growing of more importance every day to the health and pleasures of the people, that good unofficial Liberals are bound to apply the goad to the popular sympathies of their official colleagues. Departmental Liberalism is far more difficult to produce than political Liberalism. And departmental Conservatism has a sadly contagious influence over certain minds,—such minds, for instance, as that of the able Member for Liskeard.

It is with great comfort and satisfaction that we now turn month after month to the return of agrarian offences in Ireland. There can be no more consoling index to the happy effects of a generous policy combined with firm administration. The latest published return is for the month of June. It records only three offences against the person. One, in Monaghan, is classed as an assault endangering life; one, in Kerry, as an aggravated assault; the third is a charge of conspiring to murder, in Mayo. There are seventeen offences against property, and among these we deeply regret to see seven cases of the loathsome crime of cattle-maiming, four of these being in Kerry, which still seems to be the most disturbed of the Irish counties. There are forty-seven offences against the public peace, of which twenty-seven are threatening letters and notices, and fourteen are classed under the heading, "Injury to Property,"—a somewhat vague description, considering that offences against property, referred to above, form a class in themselves. As Irish crime is mainly agrarian, the calendar of the country at the present moment would probably compare favourably with that of either England or Scotland.

On Tuesday night, Mr. Trevelyan obtained the second reading of his "Tramways" Bill, for developing the resources of the West of Ireland, and also consented to devote £50,000 out of the sum granted for emigration to an experiment in migration,—that is, to the removal of the starving Irish peasantry to other land in Ireland capable of better cultivation, so far as such land can be found. If Mr. Trevelyan has any real hope of the success of that experiment, we are glad that he has consented to try it. If it be a mere concession to popular pressure against the secret convictions of the Irish Administration, we regret it as one of those blunders which are fruitful of other blunders, because they show the Irish Members the squeezability of the Administration. We trust, however, that Mr. Trevelyan has found some reason to change his mind as to the possibility of at least a limited success.

A very strange and dreadful fivefold murder was committed by William Gouldstone, blacksmith, on Wednesday week (August 8th), at 8 Courtney Place, St. James's Street, Walthamstow. His wife had recently had twins, and either this event, or other facts not at present known to us, appeared to have driven the man to desperation. While his wife was still lying ill, he came home and drowned his three eldest boys, and then, going into her room, struck the newly-born infants who were lying on her breast, so that they also died in a day or two. The man makes no attempt to deny or excuse his crime. When charged with it, he said, "Yes, sir, that is right; I did it. Now I am happy. I did it like a man, too." The coroner's jury returned a verdict of wilful murder against the father in each of the five cases, and the Crown has taken up the prosecution. Of course, the only conceivable defence would be a presumption of insanity, of which at present there is no evidence, except,—if that be evidence,—the complete unconcern and stolid self-satisfaction of the prisoner. The man is only twenty-six years old.

The Deanery of Exeter being now vacant, we wish the Government would give it to Canon Stubbs. He is just the man for a Deanery, and would teach the world far more by means of such books as he could write in the seclusion of the Deanery at Exeter, than he ever will from his Professor's chair or his Canon's stall. Canon Stubbs especially deserves recognition by the Government for the active part which he took in favour of a Christian policy on the Eastern Question.

The Comte de Chambord is admitted now on all hands to be in a hopeless condition.

We hear with lively pleasure that the Bishop of Peterborough is now at last thought to be in a good way to recover. He has hung between life and death for upwards of a month, but there now seems every reason to hope that his great eloquence, abilities, and manliness will exert their influence amongst us for many years to come. Moreover, a strong man who has hung so long between life and death, if he really recovers, is apt to be much less careful of conventional formulæ than those who have never been annealed by physical and mental suffering of this stern kind. We want that sort of strength among our Bishops.

The statistics of insanity and idiocy in the United States are very curious, females showing a great many more cases of insanity than males, and males a great many more cases of idiocy than females. Of 91,997 insane people, 44,408 are males, and 47,589 are females; while of 76,895 idiots, 45,309 are males, and only 31,586 are females. It appears, therefore, that in the United States at all events, the female sex is much more subject to violent mental disease, while the male sex is much more subject to imbecility. Is that true, we wonder, of insanity and idiocy in Europe?

THE IRISH MEMBERS AND THE CRIMES ACT.

THE Irish émeute of Monday night was one of the most disheartening events to the friends of Ireland which has occurred during the present year. Stated shortly, its drift is this,—that the Irish leaders do not condemn, and even lend by their language the clearest sanction to, the disgraceful imputations made on Lord Spencer and Mr. Trevelyan that they are using the Prevention of Crimes Act not to put down murder in Ireland, but rather to fill the prisons with unfairly-trying and often innocent Irish peasants; that they do everything in their power to obtain accusations, whether false or true, that they may detain the persons accused in prison, while they try and persuade them that their accomplices have sworn away their lives, and that they may just as well confess freely their whole guilt, and give up the names of the partners of that guilt. Nay, Mr. Harrington was not ashamed to accuse Lord Spencer of ordering the execution of a man (Myles Joyce) knowing him to be innocent, though, when the Chairman of Committees was about to insist on his withdrawing that most false accusation, he substituted for it the different accusation that Lord Spencer had in his hands the materials for convincing himself of the innocence of Myles Joyce, if he would only have used those materials. And what, after those violent and monstrous accusations, was Mr. Parnell's own language? He expressed his disbelief that the Crimes Act had been enacted for the protection of the humbler classes of Ireland, and denied that it had been used for that purpose. He maintained that "the Crimes Act had been used, in a way it was impossible to describe, for the unexampled oppression of the humbler classes of the people of the country," and he did not even disavow or condemn what his Irish colleague had said as to Lord Spencer's conduct in permitting the law to take its course with Myles Joyce. Everything said by the Irish party, in fact, had the effect of expressing and strengthening the popular prejudice in Ireland against the justice of the Lord-Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary, of intensifying the belief that those honourable men,—among the noblest of their class in Parliament,—catch at every excuse for putting an Irishman in prison and keeping him in prison, and care nothing at all for the protection of the peasantry against such cruel outrages as the Maamtrasna and other analogous murders. On the contrary, Mr. Parnell, while denying in words that there was any dislike on the part of the Irish Members towards those who were instrumental in bringing guilty people to justice, went on to echo all their accusations as to the use made of the Crimes Act for the purpose of detaining innocent persons, and betraying them into admissions founded on false rumours of treachery.

And yet the Home-rule League itself put forth a resolution, on the day after the Phoenix Park murders had become generally known, calling on the people of Ireland to afford every facility for the discovery of the murderers,—which was, in reality, an exhortation to those who knew the guilty persons to give their secret up. Now, however, no one who has followed that advice receives the smallest consideration from the popular Irish party. Carey, who was a hero in the newspapers of that party, before he confessed, has become a villain almost too atrocious to be named since he gave the clue to the detection of the plot which the Home-rule League exhorted Irishmen to expose. Again, Mr. Parnell, Mr. Dillon, and Mr. Davitt put out on the very morrow of the Phoenix Park assassinations a proclamation to the people of Ireland expressing their personal abhorrence of the crime, and stating that till the murderers were brought to justice a stain would "sully our country's name." Well, now the murderers have been brought to justice, and other murderers equally guilty have been brought to justice too. But the very people who exhorted the people of Ireland to lend the promptest aid in bringing them to justice, do nothing but throw doubts on the genuineness of every scrap of evidence given against the assassins, and assail all who are engaged in the attempt to unveil conspiracy and punish murder with the most detestable insinuations as to their motives, and the most open distrust of their desire to shield any but the rich and powerful from terror and wrong. This is all thoroughly heart-breaking. Every crime whose author is detected seems to be the occasion for new reproaches on the part of the very men who expressed their burning desire for its detection, while as yet it was concealed. Of course, we know the explanation of all this. We know that the Irish Members would profess in the abstract the utmost delight in the detection of the author of a crime, but that when he is detected through the agency of an English Administration they are always consumed with a deep disbelief that the English Administration have come upon the right man. In a word, the fact that any criminal is detected by the machinery of the English Government seems to them far more convincing evidence that he is the wrong man, than the evidence elicited can possibly be that he is the right man. Irish Members are most anxious for the detection of criminals—by any other conceivable modes than those which actually exist. But as all the modes for detecting them which do in fact exist are tainted with their British origin, the Irish Members are deep in their incredulity that the methods employed have been just, or that even the motives of those who set them in motion can have been pure. In a word, what it comes to is this,—if Irish criminals had been detected by an Irish Administration, Ireland would have rejoiced. As they have been detected by a British Administration, Irishmen will not believe that they are the true criminals, and try to transfer all the criminality from them to the upright and steadfast men who have brought the criminals to justice. And Mr. Parnell, who cannot for a moment be supposed to share these passionate and disgraceful illusions, is compelled to countenance them, in order to keep even a shred of authority over his wild and wayward party.

We call this condition of things hopeless, from every point of view. It is hopeless from that of the Nationalist party themselves. What they desire is to make the government of Ireland by the British Government impossible; but all they are driving at is a very different thing,—rendering the government of Ireland by the British Government on any true Parliamentary system, impossible. Doubtless, with an Irish party calumniating—for it comes to that—every statesman who makes an honest effort to put down crime in Ireland, there is less and less hope of Ireland being entrusted to the administration of any of the party who carry on this systematic practice of detraction. And worse than this, the detractors render it almost impossible for any Irishman to gain popularity in Ireland who does not adopt this unworthy attitude. Any one can see that Mr. Parnell himself does not really share the views of his more advanced followers; that he only gives way to them, because he fears that he would lose his power in Ireland, if he opposed them and rebuked them. Yet not till we see an Irish statesman who has the courage to rebuke such followers as Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Harrington and Mr. Healy, will it ever be on the cards that Ireland should be entrusted to the care of a popular Irish patriot to administer. Where is the popular Irishman with the courage requisite to tell the truth about Lord Spencer and Mr. Trevelyan? Wherever an Irishman who will tell the truth about those truly high-minded men is to be found, he is a man certain, unfortunately, at the present moment to be howled down in Ireland. And yet, England never can and never ought to give up Ireland to the administration of men who have behaved as the extreme Irish party have behaved, during the present Session and the last.

In the next place, the situation is equally hopeless from the English point of view. We Liberals do not want excuses for governing Ireland without the support of the Irish Parliamentary party. Nothing can be more abhorrent to our feelings. It is contrary to every tradition we have. Yet, how are we to hand over Ireland to the mercy of such a party as that which Mr. Parnell now leads, a party which we are told,—and we fear not without truth,—will be swelled in numbers, and become rather more than less virulent in tone than it is now, after the next general election? Is it possible for us to co-operate with such a party,—a party that, instead of supporting the best Englishmen in their best acts, tries to make government by good Englishmen with a Liberal policy more and more impossible every day in Ireland? If the leader of the Irish popular party commanded the confidence of moderate Englishmen, then, indeed, there would be hope. But when the leader of the Irish party has to make himself appear worse than he is, in order to have a chance of keeping his popularity in Ireland, the moral gulf between the two countries must continue to grow wider and wider, while for that very reason it becomes less and less possible, on any righteous principle at all, for England to throw off Ireland, and to leave to the party of violence the opportunity of extinguishing their quarrel with the reasonable minority by suppressing that reasonable minority itself. As yet, the prospect in Ireland is all darkness. We can only do what is right, and leave the future to the only power competent to bring good out of what looks like unmixed evil.

MR. FORSTER ON EGYPT.

IN Mr. Forster's otherwise admirable speech of Thursday last at Devonport, there is a passage apparently favouring not only an early evacuation of Egypt, but a complete abandonment of the policy of keeping up English influence over that country, which surprises and disappoints us greatly. He said of his son, the Liberal candidate for Devonport, that Mr. Arnold Forster had made some remarks on Wednesday which he himself had thought not badly expressed, "with regard to how earnest we ought to be to withdraw from Egypt as soon as possible," and then he went on thus:—"I entirely agree with that view, but I must say this much—we went to Egypt certainly to protect our interests. I think we were bound to do so. We did not go there merely for the purpose of giving good government to Egypt. If there had been no Suez Canal and no road to India, I suppose we should not have thought it was our duty to go to Egypt. We went there because our interests were engaged. We cannot go anywhere without our duties and responsibilities going with us; we put down the rebellion there, and we are now trying to give them good government. I think that it is a duty imposed on us, and I think every one agrees with us on that point. The difference may be to what extent we are to proceed in that trial, and to see that good government really follows the attempt. There is only one remark I want to make, that which is, perhaps, lost sight of by the newspapers and by many persons who speak on this subject. It is that if we leave Egypt alone with a good government, or with the officials we have got appointed, and do not at the same time make up our minds to leave the Egyptian people entirely at liberty and unfettered in dealing with these officials, we put the Government in a position which is somewhat dangerous for any Government, and more dangerous for an Oriental Government than for any other Government. We remove from them the check against misgovernment. If by the force we have behind the rulers there we make rebellion impossible, we really take upon ourselves the responsibility of the government which is thus conducted." If we understand that passage correctly, it comes to the same view as that which Mr. John Morley has advocated in the House of Commons, and the Pall Mall Gazette in the Press, that we ought to give Egypt what the Government are pleased to call a fair start—on a path, remember, altogether unlike that of any genuine Oriental Government—and that, having given her this "fair start" on a line which it is quite contrary to the political genius of a Mahomedan and Oriental Government to persevere in, we should abandon Egypt to her own devices, and let the "fair start" come to a close in that foul end to which all such experiments are fated from the beginning. All we can say, in answer to that view, is that a "fair start" on a course wholly contrary to the spirit of the uncontrolled Mahomedan genius, is no fair start at all, and ought never to have been given if it were not to be sustained by the same force by which it was given. What would be said if we acted in the same manner in India,—if we set up there a semi-constitutional government under a number of Native Princes, got a fair code of laws translated into a number of different Indian languages, organised for each State a native army and police, and then made our exit from India, boasting to all the world that we had given India a "fair start?" Would it not be said, and truly said, that we should have done much better to leave India entirely alone than to force upon her a system of government quite unlike any for which her own history had paved the way, and then to abandon her to the chance that she would quietly run on in the artificial grooves made for her by European civilisation? Surely it is evident to all the world that if the grafting of English ideas of justice and freedom and commerce are to bear any fruit at all in Oriental States, they must be supported steadily by the Power that grafts them, or that they will result in nothing but confusion. What Mr. Forster seems to advocate is the grafting on Egypt of what is, for Egypt, a highly artificial system of government,—a government conducted by Europeans,—and then the duty of abstaining from any support of that highly artificial system, lest we should be found to be making ourselves responsible for the gross injustice of European administrators. Surely you might almost as well advocate the setting of a watch in motion by the use of a fine mainspring, and then the removal of the mainspring, in the hope that everything would go on just as if it were there. It is perfectly true, of course, that if a European system be grafted on Egypt, and that European system be unrighteously administered, those who grafted it on the country would be responsible for it, especially if they supported it without taking care to regulate it. It is perfectly true that we ought to revise and regulate more or less generally, any system that we support; and that if we do not, we shall be justly responsible for all the evil it works. But then it is equally true that if we first set up an alien system, and then leave it calmly to collapse, which is the policy advocated by Mr. Morley, and, if we understand him rightly, by Mr. Forster also, we shall have been quite as guilty of introducing a demoralising anarchy, and even more guilty of intellectual imbecility. Who can imagine that such a system as Lord Dufferin has established will go on satisfactorily without any support from without? Our experienced correspondent, Mr. Hilary Skinner, says most truly that the danger of an Islamic rising in Egypt is always considerable; and for our parts, we do not for a moment question that if the Egyptian soldiers once get clearly the conviction that whatever might happen, Great Britain would look on calmly, and take no steps to interfere, it would be not simply probable, but certain. It is the strong impression made by our peremptory interference, and the belief that, if occasion were given for it, the same interference would be repeated, and that conviction only that keeps down Mahomedan fanaticism in Egypt, and renders the country so amenable to a very small British force. It is likely enough that if this conviction remains, the Government would be amenable, and would respect all Sir E. Baring's suggestions, even if we had no force in Egypt at all. But if once the conviction is inspired that we have departed and departed finally, for good or evil, Sir E. Baring would be about as useful to prevent the rise in Egypt of another Arabi, as Mr. Trevelyan without Great Britain at his back would be to prevent the rise in Ireland of another Wolfe Tone.

The arguments of the Pall Mall Gazette, and as we are sorry to observe, of Mr. Forster himself, would have been very sound arguments, so far as they go, against any kind of interference in Egypt, unless indeed one solely for the protection and guardianship of the Suez Canal and the Suez railroad. An interference of that kind might be justified, of course, from the point of view of sheer self-interest, or concern for the interests of Europe. But any further setting to rights of Egyptian politics was wholly indefensible unless the force which undertook it were to be used to support it. You cannot usefully interfere to graft European institutions on a Mahomedan State, unless your interference is, however moderate in character, to be steadily sustained. You interfere for objects which the Mahomedan ruler hardly understands, and for which he does not care a single straw. Those objects, no doubt, concern the welfare of a large population; but then, the welfare of the population in that sense, is not what the Oriental ruler desires, and he probably believes that the people would be better off if they were governed as his predecessors have been accustomed to govern them. He will submit, and submit with a good grace, to pressure which he knows to be irresistible, and will not even wait for its application, if he is confident that it is ready prepared. But to expect him to become a moral convert to the doctrines of European statesmen, just because he has submitted to them under the conviction that submission was obviously the wise policy, is not rational,—is even absurd. It would have been far better, in our opinion, to have confined our interference to the Canal and the Railway, than to have raised hopes in the Egyptian people of a class of reforms which we never intended to carry through,—to have given a "fair start" to a system which cannot have a fair start at all, except under a guarantee from outside. We thoroughly detest the Jingo policy and the Jingo ideas. But we do with all our hearts pity the poor Egyptians, wish to alleviate their miseries, and believe that there is now before us a legitimate and great opportunity of succeeding in so doing. Probably, destiny will be too strong for the laissez-faire party. Radicals may preach the duty of leaving Egypt, and watching with perfect unconcern the rapid running-down of all the agencies for good which we have set on foot, but preaching and practice are not the same. Englishmen will listen benignantly to the laissez-faire doctrine, till they see it beginning to produce disaster and disorganisation. Then the cry goes forth that it is simply evading a plain duty to let good work be wasted; and the result is that the non-intervention policy is condemned at the critical moment, and effects no more harm than any false start is calculated to produce. There never was a people so little likely to sit quietly looking on, while all their good work is being undone, as the people of Great Britain.

THE LORDS ON THE AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.

LORD SALISBURY cannot bear to give with a good grace. In the case of this Agricultural Holdings Bill, which no one, so far as we know, regards as anything but the most moderate of measures, he might have very well enjoined on his followers to earn, if possible, some small stock of that supererogatory merit on which he will certainly have to draw freely enough next Session, if he deals with the Government's Reform Bill as Conservatives in general appear to expect. He might at least have posed before the country as saying to his followers, 'See how moderate we Peers are, when the Commons know how to be moderate, too! Here is a Radical Government in power, and they propose to compel landlords to compensate farmers for their improvements; we are almost all landlords, and are the persons on whom the cost of compensating them will fall; but the Government have brought in a measure distinguished by unexpected moderation, and what is the result? The result is that we have accepted the measure in the frankest way, only making a few formal alterations.' Surely Lord Salisbury would have been wise in taking up this attitude. But he has done nothing of the kind. He has given the farmers good reason to think that he will deprive them of any advantage he can, and the House of Commons good reason to believe that he will thwart them where he can, without asserting a single principle for which any one even supposes that he himself cares seriously to contend.

Let us see what amendments Lord Salisbury used his majority to carry. The first was the amendment extending to all tenants' improvements the condition already conceded as regards draining, irrigation, fencing, and improvements of that kind, that no increase of return reasonably ascribable to the inherent qualities of the soil are to be valued as due to work done by the tenant. Now, we have always asserted the general reasonableness of this condition. It is perfectly obvious that a rich soil spoiled by water, or trodden down by cattle, might yield indefinitely more when properly drained or fenced than a poor soil would, if improved in the same way, and obviously enough the difference between the effect produced on the good soil and the effect produced on the poor soil ought to belong to the landlord, not to the tenant. And the same might be said of all improvements, but then there are many kinds of improvements with regard to which the attempt to discriminate between what is due to the soil itself and what is due to the operation performed on the soil, is almost hopeless, especially as the effect produced, whatever it is, is exhausted within a very limited period. Such improvements are those in the Third Part of the Schedule,—the higher manuring operations, boning, chalking, clay-burning, liming, guanoing of land. The good effects of these operations is exhausted within a time tolerably well known, and within that time the attempt to discriminate what is due to the inherent qualities of the soil, and what is due to the artificial aid lent it, must be highly conjectural. Any effort to distinguish them will be certainly regarded by the tenant as an effort to deprive him arbitrarily of an increased production fairly earned by his own expenditure. If Lord Salisbury had been wise, he would not have endeavoured to direct the minds of the valuers to attempt a discrimination highly problematic in itself, and certain to be looked upon by the tenant as a mean attempt to depreciate the effect of what he, by his own expenditure of capital, had fairly earned. If a soil that had previously yielded barely enough to pay expenses, yielded for some years after such an operation as this a large profit, it is reasonable to assume that the difference, so long as it lasts, will be due to the operations effected by the tenant. But Lord Salisbury was inexorable, and defeated the Government by 82 against 51, on an issue which he must know himself to be of the smallest possible importance; and, indeed, chiefly important because it betrays the bias of the Tory Peers. Lord Salisbury will certainly not venture to throw the Bill out, if this amendment is disagreed to by the Commons, as no doubt it ought to be and will be.

Still more foolish was the attack on the Land Commissioners,—really on Sir James Caird,—no doubt for having advocated the cause of "the sitting tenant." Lord Salisbury moved an amendment to Clause 11 to the effect that if any party to a dispute concerning compensation arising under the Bill did not like the umpire appointed by the Land Commissioners, then the umpire should be appointed by the "Council of the Institute of Surveyors." This was a mere slap in the face to Sir James Caird. No one has ever challenged the impartiality of his proceedings under the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1875, and Lord Salisbury would not have suggested that he might be fairly objected to, if Sir James Caird had not endeavoured, with all who care for the better class of tenants, to find a mode of satisfying the sitting tenant that his rent shall not be unfairly raised on his own improvements, even though he give no notice to quit. We have declared the problem to be, in our opinion, an insoluble one, except by the natural good-feeling existing between landlord and tenant; but none the less, Sir James Caird would not have been the man he is, or trusted by all parties as he has been, unless he had desired to satisfy the sitting tenant without compelling him to give notice to quit. This mere snap of Lord Salisbury's at Sir James Caird is very childish, and again will betray to the tenant-farmers, as nothing else could have done, the temper of Lord Salisbury's alterations. Once more, there is the attempt to water-down the concession made in the second clause of the Bill to tenants who have made before the passing of this Bill a class of improvements for which at present they are not entitled to be compensated, but for which this Bill would concede them a compensation. This is to be done by providing that "no compensation shall be claimed under Clause 2, in contravention of any specific agreement existing between the parties in reference thereto," a trivial endeavour to provide against the claim for compensation in those few exceptional cases of hardship in which the Bill is to apply to improvements effected before its passing, as in general it will not do. As the Government said, the valuers are directed under Clause 6 to take into account any set-off against the tenant's claim which can be shown by the landlord, and that is sufficient guarantee against any abuse of this particular section. But Lord Salisbury would not be satisfied without making it plain in every sentence that he regards the tenant as the aggressor, against whom every conceivable precaution is to be taken under the Bill. The effect of that amendment,—to which, like the rest, he will certainly not care to adhere, if the Government resist it,—is simply to tell the tenants how profoundly the landlords distrust them, and how they desire to shut out every conceivable loophole against their disposition to rob the landlord. That is not the spirit in which a serious Tory leader should have dealt with a Bill of this sort. Finally, Lord Salisbury struck out the right of the allotment men to compensation. As we said last week, he has this excuse, that the right of the allotment men for compensation may so frighten small owners, that they will grant no allotments after the passing of a Bill which would give the allotment men a claim for compensation. And that, doubtless, would be a very pernicious effect of the clause. Still, we doubt if it will really have enough effect of this kind to undo the good of putting the allotment men on the same footing of justice as the larger tenant. On the whole, we may safely predict that Lord Salisbury's work on Friday week will result—so far as it has any result,—only in discredit to the Tory party in the country, as well as in some loss of dignity to the House of Lords.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN.

THE third reading of the Bankruptcy Bill was the occasion for a perfect rain of compliments on Mr. Chamberlain for his conduct of that Bill through the Grand Committee. And there can be no doubt that these compliments were thoroughly well deserved. They came as much from Conservatives as from Liberals, and were the genuine expression of the feelings of business men towards a consummate master of political business. Mr. Chamberlain's clear grasp of his Bill, his great candour in considering all the objections stated against it, his courtesy in meeting those objections as far as it was practicable for him to do so, and his skill in keeping the discussion in the Grand Committee to the point, without giving offence to any one, have been attested by all his colleagues on that Committee; nor can it be questioned that so far as Mr. Gladstone's expedient has succeeded and inspired sanguine hopes of further success, the credit is chiefly due to Mr. Chamberlain. And this will go to his credit with all parties. We do not, of course, mean that Conservatives will cease to fear Mr. Chamberlain's Radicalism on the ground that he is a first-rate man of business, and a skilful mediator in business discussions. On that account, they will only fear his influence the more,— and very justly. But though they may fear his influence the more, they will doubtless fear him as a statesman less than they have hitherto done. It is no trivial set-off against what are supposed to be revolutionary views, that they are not so revolutionary as to absorb the man in the partisan; and it is an even greater set-off against such views, that the men who hold them should be found to be candid and courteous towards political opponents, keen in defence of the rights of property, and as eager to prevent their own patronage from being badly used as they would be to guard against the abuse of the patronage of opponents. All this Mr. Chamberlain has shown,—together with very uncommon capacity for business negotiations,—in the Grand Committee on the Bankruptcy Bill, and therefore he has come out of it with that new reputation which a statesman always gains from proving great administrative capacity, and which a young and untried Liberal always gains from convincing the timid party that his attachment to advanced views does not imply any general flightiness and dangerousness of purpose, or any general irreconcilability to the methods and prepossessions of the cautious members of the community.

Mr. Chamberlain was, perhaps, fortunate in having taken it up as the leading idea of his Bankruptcy Bill to fix a slur on fraudulent bankrupts. That is a thoroughly sound moral idea, but it is not only a thoroughly sound moral idea, but also one which Conservatives regard with exceptional approval as an outcome of Radical statesmanship. The general Conservative notion of Radicalism certainly is that it is an "upsetting" creed; and, indeed, no Radical can deny that he does wish to upset some things which exist, and which, in his opinion, ought not to exist. But Radicals do not wish to upset that which exists and, in their opinion, ought to exist, and it is a fortunate thing for Mr. Chamberlain that this Bill has brought him out as the champion of a sound trade morality, and has therefore exhibited him to the Conservative party as the strong and skilful representative of one of the great bulwarks of human society, instead of as the assailant of any of those bulwarks. This was just what Mr. Chamberlain needed to gain greater consideration from the Opposition. They knew him already as a very skilful and effective debater, but rather as a debater inclined to minimise what they deemed national obligations,—inclined to take the side of disappointing the confidence inspired by traditional policy and formal pledges,—than as a debater disposed to invest such obligations with new sacredness, and to enforce severe penalties against those who make light of them. Hence, his dexterity hitherto has been regarded as dangerous dexterity, as dexterity in evading the meaning attached by Conservatives to the engagements of the nation or the State. But throughout these discussions, Mr. Chamberlain has used his swift and supple intellect for the opposite purpose, in order to deepen the sense of personal obligations in commerce, and to induce the Legislature to brand with a real stain those who do not show an adequate sense of these obligations. That has given to Mr. Chamberlain's display of dexterity a greater effect of weight and dignity than before, and enabled those who distrust him most to see in him one who may on occasions be something more than an underminer of existing institutions,—who may, indeed, become what some of the oldest of known Radicals used to call "the repairer of the breach, the restorer of paths to dwell in." Probably no Member of the Government has gained so much in reputation by the Session which is all but over, as Mr. Chamberlain.

THE IRISH MIGRATION SCHEME.

LATE sittings of the House of Commons are naturally a trial to reporters, and they certainly supply an additional reason why some authorised record should be kept of Parliamentary proceedings. Very often, no doubt, the business done in the small hours is of no real importance. Routine measures are carried a stage further, in the teeth of routine opposition. When the Irish Members go on dividing till four o'clock in the morning, it matters little whether the exact point on which each division is taken is accurately recorded. All these journeys into the lobby make no change in the Bill, and it is as well perhaps that no account should be kept of the change they work in the temper of the travellers. Now and again, however, something happens after the majority of the Members have gone home to bed, in which the public outside Parliament takes an interest, and then it is a little provoking that, after a careful comparison of the different accounts, the reports given in the
